U.S. military officials in Kabul say suicide bombings in Afghanistan jumped from 27 in 2005 to 139 last year, while direct- and indirect-fire attacks on Afghan and allied troops nearly tripled. U.S. and NATO officials say the anticipated spring offensive by the Taliban this year could be the most potent since the 2001-2002 U.S.-led campaign.

In Afghanistan, Mr. Cheney landed at Bagram Air Base, about 30 miles north of Kabul. He had planned to travel to the capital, but a steady snowfall made the trip unsafe, and the two leaders hope to meet today, an aide to Mr. Karzai said.

Pakistan Lobbies Against Sanctions As The Senate Takes Up 9/11 Bill (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Pakistan's weeks-long lobbying effort to thwart potential security aid sanctions is culminating this week as the Senate takes up its version of the 9/11 Commission recommendations bill, approved by the House in early January.

Legislation crafted by the office of House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and included in the 9/11 bill has put Pakistan's embassy in Washington on the defensive. Officials there fear such blunt legislation could alter the U.S.-Pakistan relationship.

The lobbying drive's latest lap coincides with Vice President Cheney's unannounced trip to the country, where he expressed Monday the administration's concern that al Qaeda is regrouping in the tribal areas at the Pakistan-Afghanistan border and pressed for a clampdown ahead of a Taliban "spring offensive" in Afghanistan.

Pakistan's role as both a key non-NATO ally of the U.S.-led war against terrorism and a host to an unruly population of Islamic extremists has led to a widening rift between Congress and the White House on how to handle cooperation with Pakistan.

According to a Monday New York Times report, Cheney told Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf that a Democratic-led Congress could cut aid to his country if it fails to hunt down al Qaeda operatives.

The Bush administration, which has been publicly complimentary of Pakistan as an ally, opposed the House legislation imposing security aid sanctions on Pakistan, but now is using Congress as a sledgehammer against the Pakistani government, said a source following the issue closely.

"They know they can't threaten Musharraf directly," said the source. "It is a tactic that has some teeth in it."

A congressional source said Cheney's trip to Pakistan and the threat that Congress may cut off aid will put Pakistan issues on the front burner in the Senate and increases pressure on the chamber to act.

None of the legislation dealing with the 9/11 Commission's recommendations likely to be taken up in the Senate includes any reference to Pakistan. Such language would come under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee, chaired by Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), although any other senator can offer legislation.

A 9/11 bill authored by New Jersey Sens. Robert Menendez (D) and Frank Lautenberg (D) includes Pakistan-specific clauses and has been referred to Biden's committee.

On Monday it was unclear whether Biden or another committee member would offer amendments relating to Pakistan. According to a congressional source, such legislation could be included in the 9/11 bill, but the Senate may want to take a more comprehensive approach toward Pakistan than the House did — potentially in separate legislation.

The House Pakistan language, which received no debate and little notice in the lower chamber, sets limitations on U.S. security assistance to Pakistan.

A license for any item controlled under the Arms Export Control Act may not be approved unless President Bush certifies that the "government of Pakistan is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control, including in the cities of Quetta and Chaman and in the Northwest Frontier Province and the Federally Administered Tribal Areas."

The president, however, can waive the limitations if he certifies that lifting them is important for national-security reasons.

The certification would be difficult for the administration to meet, according to a congressional source. "The administration has not done anyone any favors by saying preemptively that they would be able to certify that," the source said. "It shows a large degree of contempt towards Congress by certifying something that is not truthful."

The House legislation also directs the president to impose sanctions for transfers of nuclear technology involving foreign nationals. It also requires the president to identify nuclear proliferation network countries and suspend arms sales to such countries.

If applied retroactively, it could apply to Pakistan and the A.Q. Khan network. A.Q. Khan, considered the father of Pakistan's nuclear bomb, confessed to proliferating nuclear technology to Iran, North Korea and Libya. Pakistan will not turn him over to the United States, as such move would constitute a national humiliation, said a source close to the issue.

The House acknowledges that Pakistan has been an important partner in helping the United States remove the Taliban regime in Afghanistan and combat terrorism in the frontier Pakistan provinces.

Pakistan's ambassador in Washington, Mahmud Ali Durrani, led a concerted push in the Senate, the administration and also the House to try and repeal the language proposed by the House.

"Pakistan has done more for counterterrorism than anybody else," Durrani said in an interview. "It seems people tend to forget all our contributions. Since 9/11 we put our military where our mouth is, so to say — all our assets."

He said that Pakistan continues to support U.S. efforts in the region however it can. He cautioned that the issues arising between the United States, Pakistan and Afghanistan stem from poor coordination.

"We need to be clear on what we are expect[ing] from each other; we need to be clear about what each other's capabilities are and we need to sit across the table, roll up our sleeves and start discussing," he said.

Instead of following the spirit of the 9/11 Commission report, the House used the report to "bushwhack" Pakistan, Durrani told The Hill. "A bill like H.R. 1 is grossly unfair."

The legislation could backfire in Pakistan, where Musharraf is taking heat from those who think he is a puppet of the United States as well as from others who say that he has managed to strengthen the religious parties, the congressional source said.

In addition, there have been doubts about the loyalties of some members of Musharraf's intelligence service, and assassination attempts against him have been linked to al Qaeda.

"The House legislation sends a strong message that the status quo is not acceptable," said the congressional source. "But could we do something more? If our goal is to achieve greater cooperation, is this the most effective method?"

Instead of rushing to pass legislation of a symbolic nature, the Senate and Congress should develop a more comprehensive strategy that would secure cooperation, the source said.

Rather than being used to curry favor with the military elite, the source explained, more money should be allotted to non-military sectors to win the hearts and minds of the Pakistanis.

Pakistan's military, meanwhile, is boosting its presence at the border with Afghanistan and has increased the number of posts at passing points, Durrani maintained. Pakistan also is shutting down about 50 percent of the less-frequented border crossing points to better monitor those that will remain open.

The military also is toying with the idea of planting minefields approved under the Geneva Convention to enforce border control.

Durrani added that Pakistan is introducing biometrics systems to keep track of people without identification papers.

Pakistan has also placed security elements inside and outside refugee camps.

"We have appealed to top senators and representatives and have tried to give them the true picture to the best of our ability," he said.

Britain To Send 1,400 Troops To Afghanistan (FT)

By Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Britain will send 1,400 more troops into Afghanistan, along with aircraft, to bolster the fight against the Taliban in the south of the country, Des Browne, defence secretary, told parliament yesterday.

This will take the number of UK troops taking part in Nato's Afghanistan mission to 7,700, significantly more than in Iraq. The UK is also sending four more Sea King helicopters, four Harrier GR9 aircraft, and another Hercules C-130 transport aircraft.

Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, chief of the defence staff, acknowledged the forces would continue to operate at a high tempo, but said UK overseas troop commitments would fall. Tony Blair announced last week that the number of UK troops in Iraq would drop from 7,100 to 5,600.

Liam Fox, Conservative defence spokesman, said Nato partners were not doing enough to support the effort in Afghanistan. "It is scandalous that only four Nato nations . . . the UK, the US, the Canadians and the Dutch, surprise, surprise, are contributing by far the greatest to the security in the south, and the most dangerous parts of the country. We are taking a disproportionate burden."

Mr Browne said: "I have lobbied our partners consistently for more help but it is increasingly obvious that at present, when it comes to the most challenging parts of Afghanistan, only we and a small number of key allies are prepared to step forward."

Democrats Back Away From Iraq Plan (AP)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

AP, February 27, 2007

Democratic leaders backed away from aggressive plans to limit President Bush's war authority, the latest sign of divisions within their ranks over how to proceed.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Monday he wanted to delay votes on a measure that would repeal the 2002 war authorization and narrow the mission in Iraq.

Senior Democrats who drafted the proposal, including Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, had sought swift action on it as early as this week, when the Senate takes up a measure to enact the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

Reid, who will huddle with Democrats Tuesday to discuss whether to postpone the Iraq debate, cited pressure from victims' families for quick action on the Sept. 11 bill as the reason for doing so.

"Iraq is going to be there — it's just a question of when we get back to it," Reid said, predicting it would be "days, not weeks" before the Senate returned to the issue. The war reauthorization legislation also appears to lack the 60 votes it would need to pass the Senate.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., meanwhile, said she doesn't support tying war funding to strict training and readiness targets for U.S. troops.

The comments distanced her from Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who has said he wants to use Congress' spending power to force a change in policy in Iraq, by setting strict conditions on war funding.

Pelosi said she supports holding the administration to training and readiness targets, but added: "I don't see them as conditions to our funding. Let me be very clear: Congress will fund our troops."

Asked whether the standards should be tied to a $100 billion supplemental war spending measure — as Murtha has proposed — Pelosi demurred, saying it was up to the panel that drafts funding bills.

The developments on both sides of the Capitol reflected a new level of disarray in Democratic ranks on Iraq. Swept into power by voters clamoring for an end to the war, Democrats have seen their efforts falter under a reality more complicated than they found on the campaign trail.

While the public is fed up with Iraq, there is little consensus over what to do.

Internal divisions, Republican opposition and a president who — while weakened — still appears to have the dominant voice on the war have all left Democrats flailing for a way to change the war's course.

The Democrats' symbolic measure disapproving of Bush's troop buildup passed the House only to stall in the Senate. The House plan to place strict restrictions on war funding appears to lack enough support within Democratic ranks to succeed, and looks likely to be scaled back, considering Pelosi's latest comments. The Senate bid to narrow the 2002 resolution authorizing the war appears to lack enough votes to be approved, and action on it now is likely to be put off — at least for the week.

The first signs of impatience among Democrats' allies are sprouting.

"The public is saying, 'We hired you to get out of Iraq — now figure it out,'" said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of the anti-war group MoveOn.org. "There is a risk that without action, frustration boils over into anger."

Democrats argue that their failed efforts to thwart Bush's war plans will ultimately pay off by ratcheting up pressure for a change.

"The administration is increasingly isolated and they are increasingly at odds with where the American people are," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman. "We're going to keep on going at it until the administration changes course."

But Democrats also are worried about being at odds with public opinion as House and Senate leaders push divergent measures.

House Democrats, who enjoy a 32-seat majority, will try this week to determine if there is enough support among themselves to pass the Murtha plan. Senate Democrats will discuss whether to postpone action on the war reauthorization, as Reid suggested.

Bush told governors Monday that he looked forward to a "healthy debate" on Iraq, but warned Congress against limiting funding for the war or commanders' flexibility in waging it.

"I do not believe that someone is unpatriotic if they don't agree with my point of view. On the other hand, I think it's important for people to understand the consequences of not giving our troops the resources necessary to do the job," Bush said.

Democrats' troubles finding a strategy on the war reflect a wider lack of consensus among the public about what course to take in Iraq. AP-Ipsos polls show that while a clear majority are pessimistic about the war and oppose a buildup, most people do not support cutting funding for the troops.

Zbigniew Brzesinski, Jimmy Carter's former national security adviser, said Democrats "run the risk of losing momentum."

They would be better off pushing some simple policy statements that could garner Republican support — such as opposition to establishing permanent bases in Iraq or to further expansion of the war — than trying to find a way to tie Bush's hands, he said.

"One has to be very careful not to get involved in micromanaging a military engagement," Brzesinski added.

Bush still enjoys substantial advantage when it comes to trumpeting his message on the war, even though his image and clout suffered major blows in last fall's elections.

Democrats, by contrast, have a cacophony of voices — including several presidential candidates — weighing in on what to do next in Iraq.

"The party's not unified. Until you control the executive branch, you really don't have a party — you have all these independent actors," Lawrence Korb, a Reagan administration Defense Department official, said of the Democrats' plight.

Reid Looks For Edge On Iraq (RC)

By John Stanton And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) will huddle with his fellow Democrats today to gauge support for reworking the Iraq War authorization — and to bring a more united front to the debate with Republicans, Senate aides said Monday.

Although a number of top Democrats — including presidential hopeful Sen. Joseph Biden (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (Mich.) — have endorsed the plan and began publicly pushing for it during the Presidents Day recess, it has not yet been presented to the full Democratic Caucus, making it unclear whether Reid could even muster a majority of support within his own party.

Today's weekly Caucus luncheon marks the first time Reid will be able to meet with his rank-and-file membership to discuss the issue following the surprise announcement of the reauthorization strategy more than a week ago.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley reiterated Monday that the Majority Leader has not yet decided to pursue a new authorization. According to Manley, while "obviously the authorization is outdated and needs to be reformed," Reid will not decide whether to pursue a full-blown reauthorization until after he has met with Caucus members today.

Reid — despite polls showing Americans remain unhappy with President Bush's plan to boost troop levels and his own claims of victory following a rare Saturday vote earlier this month on a nonbinding Iraq resolution — finds himself in a difficult position politically this week.

Republicans went into the Presidents Day recess on a relative high note thanks to the House GOP leadership's success in limiting defections on the resolution to only 17 Members. GOP leaders also have been successful in amplifying divisions between Democrats' anti-war wing led by Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania and the bulk of the party's lawmakers who oppose the president's handling of the war but are fearful of moving to cut off funding for the conflict.

Republicans have used those competing interests to paint Democrats as being fractured and unable to settle on any sort of a substantive plan.

According to several sources familiar with the debate, there is mounting pressure on Reid from within his own party to avoid starting the debate this week. Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) on Monday called on lawmakers to not turn this week's bill implementing the 9/11 commission's recommendations into a political grudge match over Iraq. Similarly, families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks wrote Monday to McConnell and Reid urging them to avoid mixing the politically charged debate over Iraq with the 9/11 bill.

Several Democratic aides also expressed frustration privately with the decision by Biden and Levin to announce their desire to reauthorize the war during the recess — thus increasing pressure on Reid to take it up during the 9/11 debate. A clean bill "would really be a win-win situation for all of us," one Democratic aide said, since both parties could claim victories.

Reid spokesman Manley said the two leaders are having ongoing discussions over whether Iraq will come up during the 9/11 debate and that a decision likely will wait until after both parties hold their luncheons today.

Manley also dismissed suggestions of divisions within the Democratic Party, arguing that "there is one thing all Democrats are united on and that is the absolute need to change course in Iraq."

But privately, Democratic aides argued that divisions have arisen, though not along substantive lines so much as over how best to proceed. Many Senate Democrats have supported much of Reid's political strategy over the past two years because of his slow and often-methodical approach to messaging and political trench warfare, which has allowed ample time for the Caucus to hash out internal differences.

For instance, Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) were able to defeat Bush's Social Security proposal in large part because they kept the focus on what both liberal and conservative members of their party could agree on — opposition to privatizing the program. Similarly on Iraq, Reid and Pelosi have maintained loyalty and a unified voice over the past two years by keeping their focus on a general sense that Bush has failed in his prosecution of the Iraq War.

And while Democrats acknowledge that they must produce their own proposals now that they are in the majority, that process has moved too quickly and no consensus position has been fully developed.

A GOP leadership aide agreed, arguing that "There's nothing for us to do. We just react to whatever proposal they're putting out today."

Senate Republican Conference spokesman Ryan Loskarn said Democrats largely have boxed themselves in over the past few weeks.

"Democrats are in a tailspin over Iraq funding. They are facing serious division within their ranks over troop funding and it has become impossible to keep that fact under wraps. The further along Congress gets in the Iraq debate the more difficult it gets for Democrat leadership to refuse a vote on funding support," Loskarn said.

Dems' Iraq Quagmire (HILL)

By Ron Christie

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Despite all of the talk on Capitol Hill that the Bush administration has failed to articulate a way forward in Iraq, congressional Democrats find themselves in real danger of over-reaching in their own zeal to score political points rather than demonstrate real leadership of their own.

This impotence in leadership only reinforces the perception that congressional Democrats are reflexively opposed to anything President Bush supports; the true test ahead will be to demonstrate they can put forth meaningful, binding legislation that will receive majorities in either body. The track record thus far with two failed attempts to pass non-binding resolutions in the Senate condemning the war and the iron-fisted manner in which the House majority pushed through a similar measure without allowing the minority to offer a resolution directly supporting the troops has been less than inspiring.

This week, watch for two key leaders in the Senate to take center stage as the Iraq war debate continues. The first is Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.). Later today, Byrd is expected to take up the president's $100 billion supplemental to fund ongoing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Peter Pace, are all expected to testify on behalf of the president's request.

Will Byrd work constructively with senior administration officials to tackle tough questions about winning the war on terrorism under way in the Middle East, or will he and pointed Bush critics such as Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) use the opportunity to posture while appeasing the anti-war left that appears to have taken over the soul of the party in recent years? Things could get even more interesting should Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.), a strong supporter of the war in Iraq, make good on veiled hints to become a Republican should Democrats overplay their hand to constrain the president's authority as commander in chief.

Byrd's Appropriations Committee hearing will garner particular interest this week given the recent criticism of House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John Murtha's (D-Pa.) plan — endorsed by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) — to condition funding of the war supplemental to tactical decisions regarding troops on the battlefield. Blue Dog Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.) likened Murtha's plan as being as "risky as catching a falling knife" while former admiral and current Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.) noted that Congress should refrain from making tactical war decisions. House Democrats have yet to find their voice in constructively addressing legitimate concerns about progress in Iraq without looking partisan.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) is also expected to take a prominent role in the Iraq deliberations this week. Author of a new resolution to curtail the 2002 authorization of force by the president in Iraq, Biden now favors a plan to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq by March 31, 2008. A declared candidate for president himself, Biden now joins the chorus of fellow Democrats hoping to succeed President Bush as commander in chief as one who strongly supported the war in 2002 before expressing regret for their votes when currying favor with anti-war activists.

Cut off funds for the war? Work with the administration to put forth a bipartisan solution? When confronted with the most pressing issue facing the American people today, congressional Democrats appear to be in a quagmire of being unable to put the best interests of the country ahead of their own political aspirations.

Democrats Battle Over Policy On Iraq (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats face a crucial question as an Iraq war-spending bill begins moving through the House: Can Congress continue to fault U.S. policy from a distance, or must lawmakers take hold of it and risk owning the outcome?

The new Democratic majority has followed the politically safer course of nonbinding resolutions and a Senate proposal to revisit the 2002 war authorization. But with action needed on a $93.4 billion Iraq-spending request, harping from the sidelines may no longer be enough to satisfy independent voters who looked to Democrats in the 2006 elections to effect real change.

The package includes $5.6 billion to help sustain a planned increase of at least 21,500 U.S. troops in Iraq, a commitment many in Congress opposed. About $14 billion would help replenish worn equipment, and, recognizing the strain on troops cycled in and out of Iraq, the Pentagon wants $3.6 billion to create two Army combat brigades and three Marine battalions to ease the load. "The rapid cycle is not sustainable," budget officials say.

In the wake of their election losses in November, Republicans have their own divisions over the president's policy. But Democrats face greater pressure, and the debate exposes internal politics and warring personalities, especially in the House.

After proposing restrictions on the funds, the bill's manager, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), has been pummeled by Republicans and fellow Democrats eager to bring him down a peg or two. His friendship with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) and past rivalry with Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) adds spice to the story. And fearing the entire bill could collapse, House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.) has sanctioned the drafting of waivers to the Murtha-backed provisions that would restore more flexibility to the administration.

"They want to end the war, but they want to fund the war," said Mr. Murtha, frustrated by his party's reluctance to exert its power over spending.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Democratic caucus chairman, is cautious about crossing this line and argues any conditions on funding should focus on the Iraq government, not U.S. forces. "Congress has the job of oversight and holding the administration accountable, but the war is owned and managed from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue," the Illinois Democrat said.

"Congress will fund our troops...as long as they're in harms way," said Ms. Pelosi yesterday. She has asked Mr. Murtha to speak to the full caucus this evening, and the 74-year-old lawmaker symbolizes how much the politics of the antiwar debate has changed since the Vietnam War, in which he fought in the 1960s.

Vietnam was a bigger, bloodier war than Iraq, but the burden was spread among many more, including draftees who served typically one-year tours. Iraq is the first prolonged test of the all-volunteer military, with a much smaller universe of soldiers and Marines bearing the burden and serving multiple tours.

That has fundamentally changed the debate, ushering in the likes of Mr. Murtha, a longtime Pentagon supporter who has come to fear that Mr. Bush's policy is wreaking havoc with the military. He said he believes the war is sacrificing not just troops but the military's long-term readiness. More than a year ago, he leapt the chasm between criticizing the war and offering a plan for early withdrawal.

Mr. Murtha predicts a full-fledged Iraq-spending debate won't come until Congress deals with the 2008 Pentagon budget this summer. And the timing of the supplemental spending bill now is a problem, both for the military and lawmakers.

Hoping to quell sectarian violence, the administration will focus the new troops on a set of mixed Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods accounting for about a third of Baghdad's population. But the Army is so short of combat-ready units, it will take until May to complete the "surge" of five brigades.

This makes it dicey for lawmakers to intercede in the midst of deployments; on the other hand, the continued shortage of personnel will make it harder for the administration to maintain the higher levels after May. The White House has been vague about how it will do this. The president asked for money only through Sept. 30, after which none is requested in his 2008 budget, even though military planners assume more time is required for the added troops to be effective.

Mr. Murtha recommends providing ample money for the military, but attaching restrictions that effectively create a cap allowing deployment of three or four brigades, not five. The bill would go beyond the president's request by adding money to build up strategic reserve units at home and require Marine and Army chiefs to certify in advance that any unit deployed be "fully mission capable" with personnel and equipment.

Most controversial, he would add provisions to make it harder for the administration to stretch personnel either by extending combat tours for units already in Iraq or sending them back faster to the war zone. The ban on extending tours would immediately affect the Army's plan to have 20 brigades in Iraq by May, and the problem would recur in June and July.

Republicans and the White House have attacked the limitations as a "slow-bleed" strategy that will endanger units in Iraq. "It's not me that bleeds the troops," Mr. Murtha said. "It's the president who is bleeding the military by overdeploying them ."

He remains opposed to allowing the administration to waive the requirement, but appears resigned to see amendments that would weaken the bill added in the Appropriations Committee next week by fellow Democrats. "They can always offer amendments," he said.

Majority In Poll Favor Deadline For Iraq Pullout (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

With Congress preparing for renewed debate over President Bush's Iraq policies, a majority of Americans now support setting a deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces from the war-torn nation and support putting new conditions on the military that could limit the number of personnel available for duty there, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Opposition to Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq remained strong. Two in three Americans registered their disapproval, with 56 percent saying they strongly object. The House recently passed a nonbinding resolution opposing the new deployments, but Republicans have blocked consideration of such a measure in the Senate.

Senate Democrats, led by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), are preparing another resolution that would have the effect of taking away the authority Bush was granted in 2002 to go to war. The measure would seek to have virtually all combat forces withdrawn from Iraq by the end of March 2008.

The Post-ABC poll found that 53 percent of Americans favored setting a deadline for troop withdrawals. Among those who favored a deadline, 24 percent said they would like to see U.S. forces out within six months and 21 percent called for the withdrawals to be completed within a year. The rest of those who supported a timetable said they do not support withdrawing all troops until at least a year from now.

This is the first time a Post-ABC News poll has found that a majority of Americans supported establishing such a timetable for withdrawal, which has long been resisted by the president and even some Democrats.

Growing numbers of Americans also favored withdrawing U.S. forces even if civil order in Iraq has not been restored. The poll found that 42 percent favored keeping troops there until order is reestablished, while 56 percent said the troops should be redeployed to avoid further U.S. casualties, even if the sectarian violence is continuing.

Some Democrats have called for cutting off money for the war. The Post-ABC News poll found that 46 percent of Americans supported restricting funding while a bare majority, 51 percent, opposed doing so.

There was clear support, however, for the kinds of conditions proposed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who wants to establish requirements for the training and resting of military units that would have the effect of limiting the number of troops available to send to Iraq.

Murtha's plan has drawn fire in the House, including from some of his Democratic colleagues, after it was announced on a liberal Web site. The Post-ABC News poll, which did not associate the plan with Murtha, found that 58 percent of Americans said they support such new rules. Even some Americans, 21 percent, who supported the president's troop increase said they would favor rules for training and resting troops.

On questions relating to withdrawing troops or setting conditions on the military, there was a substantial gender gap. For example, 51 percent of men said they favored keeping troops in Iraq until civil order is restored, while 35 percent of women supported such a course.

Nearly seven in 10 women supported establishing some rules for training and rest time for troops to limit the number available for duty in Iraq, and 47 percent of men favored those limits. Similarly, a majority of men opposed setting any deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, while an even larger majority of women would like to see a deadline established.

The poll also registered a new low on the question of whether the Iraq war was worth fighting. Thirty-four percent responded that it was, while 64 percent said it was not -- 51 percent strongly. On this question, 51 percent of military veterans and 53 percent of veteran households said they strongly believe that the war was not worth fighting.

Seventy percent placed primary blame for failing to control the violence in Iraq on the Iraqi government, while just 18 percent said the United States is more at fault.

Bush's overall approval rating stood at 36 percent, up slightly from 33 percent last month. Sixty-two percent disapproved of the way he is handling his job, with 49 percent of those indicating they strongly disapproved.

Approval of his handling of the Iraq war remained near its all-time low. Thirty-one percent said they approved and 67 percent said they disapproved, a slight improvement from December, when 28 percent approved.

Bush also received negative marks on the campaign against terrorism (52 percent disapproved) and on his handling of the economy (55 percent disapproved).

By wide margins, Americans said they trust Democrats in Congress more than Bush to deal with Iraq, health care, the budget, the economy and terrorism. The Democrats' advantage on health care was 37 percentage points, on the budget 27 points, on Iraq and the economy 20 points and on terrorism 13 points.

Overall, however, 41 percent said they approved of the way Congress is doing its job, while 54 percent disapproved.

The disapproval level was marginally higher than it was a month ago. The low point for congressional approval in the past year came a few weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, which resulted in Republicans losing their House and Senate majorities, when 31 percent gave Congress positive marks.

Asked about the performance of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), 50 percent said they approved and 31 percent said they disapproved.

Her disapproval rating a month ago was 25 percent.

On another issue, the poll found that a majority of Americans now distrust the Bush administration on its handling of intelligence. Thirty-five percent said they can trust the administration to report potential threats from other countries honestly and accurately, and 63 percent said they cannot.

The administration has been challenged on the quality of the intelligence underpinning its assertions that Iran is helping insurgents in Iraq.

Forty-seven percent of those surveyed said they believed that the administration has solid evidence to support those claims, and 44 percent disagreed.

At the same time, 41 percent expressed confidence that the administration will do a good job of handling current tensions with Iran, compared with 58 percent who said they were not confident.

The Post-ABC News poll is based on telephone interviews with 1,082 adults and was conducted between last Thursday and Sunday. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

Glenn Close in "Fatal Attraction," a taunting lunatic who will "boil our bunny" if upset by the party, writes a Vermont blogger.

But a review of the Connecticut senator's voting record since his return to Congress as a self-styled independent suggests another label: Dependable Democrat*.

The asterisk, of course, refers to Iraq. Lieberman has fought Democrats with the pluck of a third-grader in a dodge-ball tournament, advancing the view of him as a rogue ready to bolt the Democrats, where he caucuses, for the Republicans. And in a Politico interview last week, he once again refused to rule out the possibility.

Yet, his newfound freedom hasn't reshaped his voting patterns. He broke with the majority of Democratic senators on only five of 52 votes he's cast in the last two months.

By this measure, Lieberman is more true-blue than Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who split from the party more often but generated a fraction of the blog traffic on Technorati and far more glowing descriptions. Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) diverged from the Democratic majority on four votes, yet, like Nelson, never on Iraq.

The different perceptions underscore how indelible Iraq has become as the base line for determining party loyalty. Lieberman emerged as a decisive vote last month in the minimum-wage debate -- twice giving Democrats a one-vote edge in defeating Republican amendments -- but that party fidelity on domestic issues gets lost in his disobedience on Iraq, where he twice sided with the GOP to block a rebuke of the president.

"There are Democrats in recent years that have been quick to criticize Republicans who apply a litmus test: If you are not with us 100 percent, you are not with us," Lieberman said. "That is what I feel has happened too much within the Democratic Party."

Lieberman "doesn't digress from the party that much," acknowledged Jane Hamsher, the Connecticut-based author of firedoglake.com who worked for Lieberman's 2006 opponent, Democrat Ned Lamont. But, she said, it is Iraq that matters.

"The damage he does is fragging Democrats from behind party lines on Iraq," Hamsher said. "He gives the administration bipartisan cover."

Lieberman aides dismiss speculation that the senator will eventually go Republican -- an extraordinary move that would flip control of the Senate. Simply put, Lieberman would be out of place among Republicans, aides say.

Yes, he looked awfully cozy nestled between Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) in the Senate press gallery this month, talking up their counterproposal to Democratic legislation critical of President Bush's troop surge in Iraq.

"Reid doesn't want to create holy hell in the Democratic blogger world," Graham said, speculating why Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was refusing to allow votes on certain Republican amendments.

And yes, despite pre-election promises to caucus with Democrats, Lieberman frequently fans the divorce talk by holding it out as a possibility, even laying down markers last week on what could provoke proceedings: A move by the party to cut funding for the war.

"We will see how that plays out in the coming months," Lieberman said.

Republicans don't hide their thirst. Lieberman hears from them -- "mostly joking, lately. 'We would love to have you,' " he said. "I have no desire to change parties."

A warm post-election welcome for Lieberman -- Democrats gave him a standing ovation -- has cooled as the Iraq debate grinds on, aides acknowledge.

"Since the debate on the surge, it has been hard," said Dan Gerstein, a former Lieberman aide who continues to serve as a paid adviser. "It is definitely putting some strain on his relations within the caucus.

"But when he spoke out against President Clinton (during the impeachment debate), it put some strains on his relations with the caucus," Gerstein added. "Over time, when you have friendships with family, not every day is a love fest. Sometimes people get a little too fixated on the hints of discord. The truth is there are a lot of friends in the caucus."

Aides take cues from Lieberman's actions. He voted with Democrats 90 percent of the time before the November election -- a point he raised on the primary campaign trail -- and continues to hold that average in his first two months as an independent.

"If he was seriously thinking about becoming a Republican, the last thing he would do is propose a new tax," Gerstein said.

That's a war-on-terrorism tax, proposed early this month to ease the pressure that military budgets are placing on domestic programs. Hardened critics went squishy -- for about a half a second.

"This may come off as blasphemy, but I support the latest idea of Joe Lieberman," Democratic consultant Cliff Schecter wrote on his blog.

Lieberman also lined up against every Republican amendment to the minimum-wage bill that would have tinkered with tax policy. Nelson, by contrast, backed several of the Republican tax-cut initiatives. But his Democratic disobedience earned little of the scorn heaped on Lieberman.

Rep. Marshall's Iraq Vote Could Help Inoculate Him For 2008 House Race (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 27, 2007

When Rep. Jim Marshall (Ga.) voted against the House non-binding resolution on the Iraq war, he stood out as one of only two House Democrats who bucked their party. But that vote could bolster his chances for reelection in 2008, when he will undoubtedly find himself running against the wind as a Democrat in a conservative district.

Marshall and Rep. Gene Taylor (Miss.) were the only two Democrats to oppose the measure. By contrast, 17 Republican members voted in favor of the resolution, which passed 246-182.

Marshall narrowly defeated former Rep. Mac Collins (R) last year in a race so close that Collins has yet to concede defeat. Collins is widely expected to challenge Marshall again in 2008, in a district that President Bush won with 61 percent in 2004.

Marshall's office said his vote had nothing to do with his reelection prospects and everything to do with his military background and desire to support troop morale.

"It's not something that Jim looked at in terms of elections or reelections," said Marshall spokesman Doug Moore.

In his floor speech, Marshall said a "yes" vote on the non-binding resolution is like "sitting on the sidelines and booing in the middle of our town team's play because we don't like the coach's call."

But former Rep. Buddy Darden, another Georgia Democrat all too aware of the political realties facing a Democrat in the Deep South, said Marshall's vote was "consistent" with the congressman's unwavering support of the military and his district's politics. It also has the added benefit of bolstering his conservative credentials in a district he won by just more than 2,000 votes.

Moore said they have no way to measure how people in Georgia's 8th district have reacted to the vote.

"I'm not sure if it hurts or helps," he said. "There are a lot of folks who are upset about it. Some folks are happy about it. Jim really didn't even consider that."

But Darden was less sanguine, noting that the district, redrawn in 2005 with a much heavier Republican make-up, will always be a tough district for Marshall.

During the midterm elections, President Bush traveled to the districts of both Marshall and Georgia Rep. John Barrow (D), and both men barely survived. Barrow defeated former Republican Rep. Max Burns by fewer than 1,000 votes.

Ron Moon, chairman of the Republican Party in Butts County, a conservative stronghold, said Collins is a "good conservative," but he doesn't know whether he will run again. Collins did not return calls left at his home.

Moon did say he thought Marshall's Iraq vote "helps him" in his quest for reelection, but he called it typical political maneuvering on Marshall's part. Moon added that Marshall often votes with conservatives when Democrats don't need his vote.

"That's a pattern of his," Moon said. "People don't keep up, and they think he's a conservative."

Marshall spokesman Moore said the office had not heard much angry feedback from the party leadership despite the congressman's decision to break ranks on the largest symbolic vote in the new Congress.

"I know [the leadership] wanted 100 percent support, so they're probably disappointed they didn't get that," Moore said, adding, "I think they know where he's coming from."

Darden compared the current climate to the years when Democrats were in the minority or to the early 1990s, when breaking ranks like Marshall did on this vote would have been "problematic."

As Darden put it, the party leadership now demonstrates a "cohesiveness and understanding that every vote counts" when it comes to reelection contests, and Democrats in conservative districts do have to break party ranks from time to time.

Taylor, the other Democrat to vote against the resolution, won reelection last year with almost 80 percent of the vote.

Gen. Pace: Military Capability Eroding (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

DOJ_NMG_0137111

Strained by the demands of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, there is a significant risk that the U.S. military won't be able to quickly and fully respond to yet another crisis, according to a new report to Congress.

The assessment, done by the nation's top military officer, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, represents a worsening from a year ago, when that risk was rated as moderate.

The report is classified, but on Monday senior defense officials, speaking on condition on anonymity, confirmed the decline in overall military readiness. And a report that accompanied Pace's review concluded that while the Pentagon is working to improve its warfighting abilities, it "may take several years to reduce risk to acceptable levels."

Pace's report comes as the U.S. is increasing its forces in Iraq to quell escalating violence in Baghdad. And top military officials have consistently acknowledged that the repeated and lengthy deployments are straining the Army, Marine Corps and reserve forces and taking a heavy toll on critical warfighting equipment.

The review grades the military's ability to meet the demands of the nation's military strategy — which would include fighting the wars as well as being able to respond to any potential outbreaks in places such as North Korea, Iran, Lebanon, Cuba or China.

The latest review by Pace covers the military's status during 2006, but the readiness level has seesawed back and forth during the Iraq war. Officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the risk levels are classified, said the risk for 2005 was moderate, but it was assessed as significant in 2004.

His assessment was submitted to Defense Secretary Robert Gates at the beginning of this year, and therefore does not reflect the latest move to pour 21,500 more troops into Iraq over the next few months.

Gates delivered Pace's assessment to Congress, along with a six-page report on steps the Pentagon is taking to address the problem — including new efforts to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps, and requests for more money to repair and replace equipment. On Monday, the Pentagon released most of Gates' report, except for a few sections that were classified as secret.

That report concluded that "world events and regional trends add up to increased challenges to our nation's security." And it said the decline in readiness is also affected by whether other federal agencies and other nations are fulfilling their commitments.

There have been long-standing complaints that the State Department has not met its responsibilities in Iraq, particularly in reconstruction and rebuilding efforts, as well as buttressing the political development of the Iraqi government.

In his report, Gates also discussed efforts to repair and replace equipment worn out in combat, beef up recruiting and retention, and make better use of the National Guard and reserve forces. It also details how the Pentagon will use billions of dollars in the proposed budget, including plans to modernize aircraft and weapons, develop better detection and countermeasures for weapons of mass destruction, increase the size of the special operations forces, and boost the nation's missile defense.

Bomb Inside Iraqi Ministry Kills 5 (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A bomb planted at an Iraqi ministry where one of the nation's most senior politicians was making an official appearance today killed five people and injured dozens, raising the possibility that attackers infiltrated the government to plan and carry out the assault and prompting serious questions about Iraq's ability to ensure its own security.

The bombing targeted Adil Abdul Mehdi, one of two Iraqi vice presidents and a senior leader in the largest Shiite voting bloc in parliament, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It was detonated as he attended a morning ceremony for employees of the Ministry of Labor and Municipalities who had been honored for their hard work.

The incident was the most serious of many on a day when attackers appeared to have directly focused their strikes on government and police targets, rather than soft civilian targets such as marketplaces and universities that have been besieged in recent weeks. On Sunday, a suicide bomber at an Iraqi school killed 40 people, most of them students coming and going to mid-term exams.

Earlier today, a roadside bomb killed three Iraqi police officers and injured four others as their convoy passed through East Baghdad. A suicide bomber detonated a car bomb at a military checkpoint near the northern city of Kirkuk, killing one civilian. In the south, British forces said 15 gunmen attacked a British military patrol in Basra; three attackers were wounded in the battle, but the British did not say if any of its soldiers were harmed.

The ministry bombing served as a chilling reminder of how far U.S. and Iraqi officials have to go to in order to establish security here -- in the halls of government, not to mention the lawless and bloody streets of the capital -- as attacks continue largely unabated two weeks into a new effort to halt sectarian conflict.

The bomb went off inside the hall where the ceremony was taking place, in an affluent area of west Baghdad dominated by Sunnis, just after minister Riyadh Gharib completed a speech and returned to his seat next to Mehdi on the stage.

Witnesses said the bomb appeared to have been planted two to three yards from the stage and was packed with ball bearings that pierced skin. Thick, dark smoke filled the room and the ceiling caved in.

Mehdi was not seriously injured, but two ministry department heads were among those killed. Mehdi and Gharib were taken for treatment to the Ibn Sina hospital in the Green Zone, which is staffed with American military medical personnel.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver of the U.S.-led military coalition said the incident was "unfortunate" but had no further comment, and said Mehdi was treated and released. A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy could not be reached.

Iraqi Vice President Injured In Blast At Government Office (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Shiite vice president narrowly escaped assassination Monday as a blast ripped through a government hall just hours after it was searched by U.S. teams with bomb-sniffing dogs.

Adel Abdul-Mahdi was slightly hurt in the explosion, which killed at least 10 people.

The building is a seven-story structure with crack surveillance systems from its days as offices for Saddam Hussein's feared intelligence service.

The bomb went off moments after the minister for public works finished a speech, witnesses told the Associated Press. Among those killed were several ministry employees, police said. More than 25 were wounded, including the public works minister, Riyad Gharib.

Abdul-Mahdi suffered minor leg injuries and was hospitalized for tests, his office said. He was later released. Adbul-Mahdi is one of two vice presidents. The other, Tariq al-Hashemi, is Sunni. Also Monday:

His physician, Yedkar Hikmat, would give no timetable on his discharge, saying only that Talabani did not have a heart attack.

•In Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, a suicide car bomber struck outside a police station, killing at least 13 people and wounding 10, police said.

•Iraq's Cabinet signed off on a proposed oil law that would divide revenue among all Iraqi factions. It now moves to the parliament for a final vote.

Bombing At Iraqi Ministry Wounds 2 Top Officials (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — An explosion inside the Ministry of Public Works on Monday wounded an Iraqi vice president and the public works minister and killed at least five people, in what officials described as a possible assassination attempt.

Though it was unclear where in the building the bomb was hidden or who the target was, the attack was the most serious breach of an Iraqi government building since November, when dozens of employees at the Ministry of Higher Education were kidnapped by gunmen dressed in police commando uniforms.

Adel Abdul-Mahdi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, was approaching a conference room lectern to address ministry employees at the time of the blast, which tore through walls and hurled him to the ground, witnesses said. His guards threw themselves on top of him, and he was immediately taken to an American-run hospital inside the Green Zone where witnesses said he was received in a wheelchair, covered in dust but smiling.

Statements from several offices of the Shiite-led Iraqi government later said he was released and had returned to work.

The public works minister, Reyad Ghareeb, was seriously wounded, news agencies reported. It was not clear if his wounds were life-threatening.

The Ministry of Public Works is in the Sunni neighborhood of Mansour. Like nearly all government buildings in Baghdad, it is surrounded by 10-foot concrete blast walls and dozens of guards. Visitors to the building pass through metal detectors and are then searched by hand.

Witnesses and Iraqi officials said it was unclear whether a bomb had been carried in by an employee or had been slipped past security by a visitor.

Assassination attempts on Iraqi officials are not uncommon, and members of all sects have been singled out. Mr. Abdul-Mahdi and Mr. Ghareeb are both Shiites, and the Public Works Ministry is run by one of Iraq's leading Shiite parties, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Last fall, a car bomb exploded in the Green Zone near the convoy of the speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashadani, a Sunni. Nasreen Barwari, a Kurd and the former public works minister, said three attempts were made on her life during her tenure from 2003 to 2006.

She said satellite offices of the ministry were regularly singled out as well.

"I believe all governmental offices are a target all the time," she said. "And the main objective is to undermine the government as a whole, and discredit its security measures or plans."

Witnesses said the vice president, the minister and several senior ministry officials had gathered in a conference room on the third floor to give employees awards when the blast shredded rows of chairs and collapsed part of the roof onto the victims.

"While Dr. Abdul-Mahdi was trying to deliver his speech, the explosion took place," said a ministry employee, also wounded in the attack, who had been sitting next to the vice president. If it was a suicide bomber, the employee said, "there would have been more people killed."

Interior Ministry officials said three of the five people killed were women. Four of the dead held the rank of director general in the Public Works Ministry — the middle managers who run the organization on a daily basis.

On Monday, a roadside bomb in southern Baghdad killed two policemen. A mortar shell exploded in central Baghdad, where security forces have set up blast walls around open-air markets, killing two people and wounding four. Gunmen attacked a fire station in Mansour, in western Baghdad, killing three firemen and wounding three others.

Authorities found 25 bodies throughout the city.

Also on Monday, the political bloc loyal to anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr clarified the cleric's stance on the new Baghdad security plan, saying that Mr. Sadr still supported the plan despite a statement attributed to him on Sunday saying that the effort to pacify the capital was doomed to failure because it relied on American troops.

Saleh al-Ugaili, a member of Parliament and a spokesman for Mr. Sadr's political movement, said the statement was meant to emphasize a need for more Iraqi control.

"Everybody knows that the American intervention in the duties of the army and Iraqi police confuses their work and creates opportunities for breaches," he said.

The American military said in a statement on Monday that elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army militia "seem to be practicing a policy of noninterference," with many senior leaders leaving the country and others adopting a "wait-and-see" attitude.

The military also announced the death of a marine killed Monday during combat in Anbar Province.

President Jalal Talabani's office said Monday that he was recovering from exhaustion at a hospital in Jordan and denied reports that he had heart surgery. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Insurgents Aim For Wider-scale Attacks (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Troops from Maj. Jeremy Siegrist's battalion were following up a tip recently when they came across something odd: two restaurant-sized freezers sitting in the middle of a palm grove.

The freezers' contents were even more surprising. Inside, the troops found 150 copper plates, C-4 plastic explosive and plastic tube sections — key ingredients in making the deadly, armor-piercing roadside bombs known as explosively formed projectiles, or EFPs.

The amount of Iran-made material suggested Iraqi militants have learned how to mass-produce EFPs, rather than only import them pre-made from Iran, Siegrist said Monday. "It's a huge step" for the militants, he said.

The increased use of EFPs, which can shoot molten metal through tanks and cause heavier casualties than normal bombs, may be part of a broader tactical shift by Iraqi insurgents, U.S. military officials and analysts say. Since an increase in U.S. troops patrolling Baghdad under President Bush's new security plan, extremists have launched fewer but deadlier attacks to kill Americans and terrify the Iraqi population.

The number of roadside bombs has dropped by 20% since the security plan began this month, the U.S. military said in a report Monday. Sectarian murders have dropped to their lowest levels in a year, the report said.

However, the scale of recent attacks threatens to overshadow any relative progress. Since the security plan started, insurgents have grabbed headlines with suicide bombs in crowded markets, the downing of U.S. helicopters and an assassination attempt Monday against Iraqi Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi.

Three recent explosions of trucks laden with chlorine tanks were especially illustrative of insurgents' tactics, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. Most of the chlorine burned off in the blasts, but the mere use of the gas — used as a weapon in World War I — had a psychological impact, Garver said.

"It's more of a terror weapon," he said. "It's used to get the attention of the people. And it gets our attention, too."

As a result, some Iraqis' patience may be waning. According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr on Sunday, the influential Shiite cleric called on Iraqis to take security into their own hands rather than trust Americans.

The number of U.S. troops in Baghdad is set to increase by 17,500 in coming months, so insurgents realize they must act now to destabilize the U.S.-backed government, said Andrew Krepinevich, a counterinsurgency expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "Just as the administration is pushing poker chips to the middle of the table, insurgents are doing the same," Krepinevich said.

The Pentagon's emphasis on Baghdad may also open opportunities for insurgents to stage dramatic attacks outside the capital. On Feb. 19, a suicide car bomber rammed into two fuel trucks outside a U.S. outpost north of Baghdad, causing a fiery explosion. Insurgents then lobbed mortars and launched rockets from nearby trucks, killing two U.S. troops and injuring 29.

"We hadn't seen that sort of complex attack on a coalition outpost before," said Siegrist, the executive officer of the Army's 1st Battalion, 12th Calvary Regiment, based in nearby Baqouba. "As we crank down on Baghdad, the insurgents will be pushing into the outskirts."

U.S. forces are trying to stay one step ahead of the insurgents. To thwart car bomb attacks, troops funnel traffic away from large targets such as markets and mosques, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters recently.

"Though there may be good days during that time, we are also going to have tough ones," he said. "The terrorists will adjust and react to our tactics."

US Task: Fight To End Four Wars In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

Iraq may be not one war, but four or five – an assemblage of different, crosscutting conflicts.

Think of it this way: In Iraq, the US simultaneously is playing several different games of chess against several different opponents. Meanwhile, some of those opponents are conspiring together. Some are trying to blow each other up.

This multiplicity of adversaries makes the US military's job all the harder – in intelligence terms, if nothing else. A main tenet of counterinsurgency theory is "thoroughly understand your enemy," and in Iraq there are lots of enemies to know, from factions of Sunni insurgents to competing Shiite militias to foreign Al Qaeda fighters, intelligence agents of surrounding states, and old-fashioned criminal thugs.

"Iraq is an extremely complex theater," said Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commanding general of coalition forces in Iraq, at a briefing on Thursday. "Its stability is threatened by a number of different factors every day."

US officials in the past have been reluctant to publicly acknowledge changes in the nature of the Iraq war.

Thus in the months after the toppling of Saddam Hussein in 2003, then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other administration officials resisted labeling Iraq's continued violence as an anti-US insurgency. The White House similarly has been slow to hang the phrase "civil war" on Iraq's Sunni-Shiite divide.

But since Robert Gates took over at the Pentagon in December, a new specificity has marked the US descriptions of Iraq fighting. At a Feb. 2 press conference with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Secretary Gates said he thought the words "civil war" oversimplified Iraq's situation.

Four wars in Iraq

Gates said there are "essentially four wars in Iraq." One is Shiite versus Shiite, principally for control of Basra and other areas in Iraq's oil-rich south. The second is Shiite-versus-Sunni sectarian warfare. Third, in Gates's listing, is the insurgency, the native Sunni anti-US violence. Fourth is Al Qaeda, which both aids and directs the Sunni insurgency and foments Sunni-Shiite violence.

The NIE, which represents the consensus judgment of US intelligence agencies, holds that Iraq does show some signs of being a civil war. It's causing a hardening of ethnosectarian identity among Iraqis, for instance, and is resulting in the displacement of populations.

Nevertheless, "the Intelligence Community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq," concludes the NIE – a finding that matches Gates's view.

The strategy of perseverance

Does President Bush's new strategy for Iraq address this complexity?

Just by persevering in its attempts to establish security in Iraq, the US is in many respects countering all its adversaries, says William Martel, an associate professor of international security studies at the Fletcher School at Tufts University in Medford, Mass.

"The unifying principal for these groups is that their strategic objective is to push us out of Iraq. Victory for them is anything other than success for the US," says Dr. Martel, author of "Victory in War: Foundations of Modern Military Policy."

US intelligence does have the difficult job of trying to understand the nature and motives of many different adversaries and alleged friends alike, notes Martel. As military operations this year in Baghdad have shown so far, one group – Shiite militias – may fade into the shadows, while another – Sunni insurgents – steps up its attacks.

US approach too simple?

Other analysts hold that the chaos of Iraq's conflict means that the current US effort to establish security in Baghdad will, at best, achieve only a temporary calm there. The divides that fuel the current conflict – both between sectarian groups, and within them – won't be resolved merely by an absence of fighting, they say. Likewise, they hold out little hope that the political components of US strategy will be able to stabilize Iraq.

"Why won't we see the same problems again if we try to withdraw?" asks James Fearon, a Stanford University political scientist and author of an analysis of the nature of Iraq's civil war in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs.

The term "civil war" is indeed apt for Iraq, argues Dr. Fearon. It is often applied to conflicts marked by factionalism and chaos, such as the multisided Lebanese civil war of the late 1970s and 1980s.

History shows that the majority of civil wars have ended when one side wins. Power-sharing agreements, similar to the national reconciliation the US is pushing for in Iraq, are far less common, according to Fearon.

Two factors can make power-sharing feasible: cohesion among the warring parties and a period of fighting that makes obvious the relative military capabilities of both sides – in Iraq's case, Sunni and Shiite forces. Neither of these currently exists in Iraq, says Fearon.

From the vantage point of the US, the immediate task is to stop bullets flying, from whomever they come. "The question is ... how do we get from where we are to where we are supposed to be?" said General Pace at the Feb. 2 briefing. "And that is what the new plan is about."

Oil Plan Includes More Production, Sharing (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen And Tina Susman

Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- After months of negotiations over the post-war spoils of Iraq's most valuable natural resource, the government announced Monday night that it had approved a draft plan to ramp up oil production and share the proceeds.

The agreement on the terms by Iraq's cabinet was touted as a major breakthrough. It must still be approved by Parliament, but because all of Iraq's vested ethnic and regional interests are represented in the Cabinet, the deal was viewed as having overcome a significant hurdle.

The United States has long wanted to capitalize on Iraq's oil resources, especially as a means of paying for the country's reconstruction since the 2003 invasion. Oil's importance was reiterated in the Iraq Study Group report released in December.

The agreement not only will open international investment in Iraq's oil industry -- a bonanza for foreign oil companies -- but will produce revenue for a nation badly in need of cash to finance its reconstruction.

Iraq's oil riches predominantly lie in the Kurdish-controlled north and the Shiite-controlled south. Reaching an agreement essentially required both parties to be willing to share their bounty with Sunnis in the middle -- a particularly painful prospect as Sunnis under Saddam Hussein controlled the entire government.

In addition, Kurds, who are pushing a referendum on withdrawal from Iraq, wanted more control over their ability to strike contracts with foreign firms and spend profits as they see fit.

According to the statement from the office of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, all revenues from oil sales will go into a single national account, but all regions and provinces will have a seat on an energy policy-making body, and provinces will receive shares of revenue and have control over how they spend it.

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow called a new oil law the "key linchpin" in Iraq's recovery because it gives "everybody a shared economic interest in working together."

During a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Iraqi leaders to pass the law, saying "it's really critical" to show signs of national reconciliation.

The oil sector in Iraq has not been in full-scale development since the 1980s. Fewer than a quarter of its fields have been developed; production volume fell by 8 percent in 2005.

And yet it is the overwhelming source of revenue in Iraq and is expected to bring in $31 billion this year, based on projected exports of 1.7 million barrels a day at a price of $50 a barrel.

It was unclear what concessions led to the compromise, and the precise terms of the deal were not immediately available. The U.S. has been exerting considerable pressure on Iraqi leadership for months to reach the accord, and one Sunni politician said Monday night that the deal had been brokered by Khalilzad himself.

Iraqi parliament members were cautious to embrace the plan. Still, most agreed that a cabinet compromise was a good sign.

"Definitely, if there is a cabinet accordance, this would be a good key for a future accordance in the Parliament," said Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a Shiite member of Parliament.

Others predicted a tougher battle for the proposal on its way to becoming law.

"I think there will be great opposition to it in the Parliament," said Rashid al-Azzawi, of the Sunni Parliamentary bloc known as the Iraqi Accordance Front.

Some analysts say the law also will be viewed dimly as another tool of the United States to get its hands on the country's oil.

Antonia Juhasz, an analyst at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, D.C., who has written extensively on the economic aspects of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, said throwing open the oil industry to foreign investment -- which no doubt would include U.S. oil interests -- would only heighten Iraqis' distrust of the United States.

"Most people in Iraq assume the U.S. invasion was about oil," she said. "When the people of Iraq learn that the majority of their oil fields are being turned over to foreign private production ... it worries me. I wouldn't want to be a soldier on the ground when the law passes."

Iraq's Cabinet Backs Contentious Oil Measure (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londono

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 -- Iraq's cabinet approved draft legislation Monday that would enable the government to manage the country's vast oil resources and distribute revenue throughout the country, a step toward meeting a U.S. demand that the country's parliament pass such a law.

But in a reminder of Iraq's continuing instability, Adel Abdul Mahdi, one of the country's two vice presidents, narrowly avoided assassination Monday morning when a bomb exploded inside a crowded third-floor conference room at a government ministry in Baghdad's Mansour district.

Abdul Mahdi, one of Iraq's most influential Shiite politicians, was walking toward the podium at an awards ceremony at the Public Works Ministry when explosives detonated beneath the seats, striking him with shrapnel but causing only minor wounds, according to Zuhair Hamadi, an adviser to the vice president.

The harrowing security breach, in which at least five people were killed and more than 15 wounded, police said, illustrated the perils of political life in Iraq even as U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital. Abdul Mahdi's brother was killed in 2005, and last year a bomb exploded outside his house in Baghdad.

"I'm sure people knew he was coming to the ceremony maybe three or four days ahead of time, and they planned it," Hamadi said.

The draft oil law, approved by Iraq's cabinet after months of intense negotiations, must still be approved by parliament. Ministers agreed to a goal of enacting the legislation by May, a senior Iraqi official said on condition of anonymity.

"If this law is enacted, it is truly an important breakthrough to establishing the political economy of what we want to see: an Iraq that is democratic, federal and united," Barham Salih, one of Iraq's two deputy prime ministers, said in an interview. "These vital resources, and these revenues, are understandably among the most difficult and most contentious issues faced by Iraqis."

The draft law calls for oil revenue throughout the country to be deposited in a federal government account and redistributed to Iraq's 18 provinces, most likely on a per capita basis, said Salih, the chairman of the negotiating committee working on the legislation. A secondary piece of legislation will address in more detail the mechanisms of revenue distribution, he added.

The law would establish a Federal Council on Oil and Gas to oversee energy policy and determine procedures for negotiating contracts with oil companies and managing oil exploration and production. The law also would revamp the Iraqi National Oil Co. and give regulatory oversight to the Oil Ministry.

"All Iraqis, irrespective of their geographic location, will benefit from these revenues. There will be no segregation or sectarian division," said Thamir Ghadban, a former oil minister serving as a consultant to the negotiating committee.

The negotiators wrangled in part over how much autonomy regional authorities, especially the Kurdish territories of northern Iraq, would have to sign contracts with energy companies and manage oil fields in their areas. While the draft law would consolidate much decision-making authority in Baghdad, regional officials hailed the agreement and said they would still have certain independent powers over their resources.

"The Kurdistan region will voluntarily share some of its constitutional powers to manage petroleum exploration and development in Kurdistan with the federal government," said Ashti Hawrami, the Kurdish region's minister of natural resources, in a statement on the regional government's Web site.

In particular, the Kurdish regional government will allow a panel of experts to review the region's oil contracts and pool its revenue with the central government. "In return, Kurdistan will be guaranteed a share of pooled revenues proportionate to its population," the statement said. "The Kurdistan Regional Government will, of course, retain the power to sign contracts for petroleum exploration and development in the Kurdistan Region."

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, issued a statement praising the cabinet for reaching an agreement. U.S. officials have pressured the Iraqi government to approve the law in the hope that an equitable mechanism for managing oil resources would remove a source of conflict. Most of Iraq's oil fields are in the predominantly Shiite south and the mainly Kurdish north, prompting fears among Sunni Arabs that they will be left out of revenue-sharing arrangements devised by a Shiite-led government.

Given that the cabinet represents all major parliamentary blocs, "prospects for the draft legislation becoming the law of the land are excellent," Khalilzad said. "There is still much work that needs to be done in the hydrocarbon sector. But a vital step was taken today."

Also on Monday, U.S. officials announced the seizure of what they described as a large cache of Iranian-made parts for powerful armor-piercing roadside bombs, known as explosively formed projectiles, that officials say have killed more than 170 members of U.S.-led coalition forces over the past two years. U.S. soldiers, following a tip from an Iraqi, found the weapons parts, along with rockets and mortars, on Saturday, hidden in two large freezers concealed by palm fronds.

"This was a great find for us," said Capt. Clayton Combs, the commander of the company that made the discovery in a village near Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. "This is a significant amount. It probably saved a lot of lives."

The roadside bombs are fashioned with plastic cylinders packed with explosives, and an attached copper plate turns into a smoldering projectile that penetrates armored vehicles. The cache included 150 of the plates in various sizes.

Earlier this month, U.S. military officials briefing reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity said without offering evidence that high-ranking Iranian government officials were involved in supplying the deadly explosives to Iraqi militants. But at a briefing Monday, officials said they had no evidence of who supplied the weapons. A military explosives expert, Maj. Marty Weber, said Iran is the only known country where these types of components are manufactured.

Military officials involved in the recent discovery said they were not sure to whom the weapon parts belonged or how they got to the village of al-Jedidah, where the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia, has a strong presence. They said the fact that they found parts, rather than complete devices, suggests that some are being assembled in Iraq.

The U.S. military said a Marine was killed Monday in Anbar province in western Iraq.

Meanwhile, aides to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, who was hospitalized Sunday in Jordan, said he is in stable condition. His office said Monday that the president was "fully conscious and in high spirits." He will remain in Amman to undergo more tests. Talabani reportedly lost consciousness Sunday after what his staff described as a series of stressful days.

Iraq Cabinet Backs Oil Proposal (WSJ)

By Hassan Hafidh And Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Iraq's cabinet approved a draft law laying the groundwork for oil-field development contracts, a move that eventually could lift its battered economy and help allay the country's sectarian divisions.

The legislation now goes to parliament. If the law is approved, it would green-light negotiations between central-government and regional officials and foreign oil-company executives, though oil companies aren't likely to rush into the country anytime soon.

The legislation would provide foreign executives with a legal foundation for any oil-field development contracts they may one day sign with government officials. The lack of such a framework after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003 has prevented most oil companies from entering into detailed negotiations.

Typically, in countries with nationalized oil industries, foreign oil companies negotiate a contract with the government itself. That was the case in Iraq before Mr. Hussein's fall. The new law would clear the way for oil companies to negotiate with Iraq's current central government, along with the regional authorities.

Iraq is home to some of the world's largest crude-oil deposits, and much of the country remains relatively unexplored. Decades of war and underinvestment have left the oil industry in shambles. U.S. officials have long encouraged Iraqi counterparts to hammer out a petroleum law in the hopes of encouraging foreign investment and jump starting Iraq's economy.

A petroleum law could also provide some relief from the political fighting by holding out the promise of new revenue streams.

Iraqis Reach An Accord On Oil Revenues (NYT)

By Edward Wong

New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — The Iraqi cabinet approved a draft of a law on Monday that would set guidelines for nationwide distribution of oil revenues and foreign investment in the immense oil industry. The endorsement reflected a major agreement among the country's ethnic and sectarian political blocs on one of Iraq's most divisive issues.

The draft law approved by the cabinet allows the central government to distribute oil revenues to the provinces or regions based on population, which could lessen the economic concerns of the rebellious Sunni Arabs, who fear being cut out of Iraq's vast potential oil wealth by the dominant Shiites and Kurds. Most of Iraq's crude oil reserves lie in the Shiite south and Kurdish north.

The law also grants regional oil companies or governments the power to sign contracts with foreign companies for exploration and development of fields, opening the door for investment by foreign companies in a country whose oil reserves rank among the world's three largest.

Iraqi officials say dozens of major foreign companies, including ones based in the United States, Russia and China, have expressed strong interest in developing fields or have done some work with the Iraqi industry. The national oil law would allow regions to enter into production-sharing agreements with foreign companies, which some Iraqis say could lead to foreigners reaping too much of the country's oil wealth.

Iraqi officials say all such contracts will be subjected to a fair bidding process, but American inspectors have reported that the upper echelons of the government, including the senior ranks of the Oil Ministry, are rife with corruption. There are also fears among non-Americans that American companies could be favored.

But oil industry analysts in the United States say it is unclear whether companies will rush to sign contracts because the law is vague about what legal protections investors would be given.

The oil law and several related measures must still be approved by Parliament before they are enacted. Since the American-led invasion in 2003, Iraqi politics have often been split bitterly along ethnic and sectarian lines, and that kind of conflict could stall the law's passage. Drafts were debated for months by a committee before the cabinet finally approved one.

"At the end of the day, we all supported this thing because it's workable for all the parties," said Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister and the head of the committee.

Distributing revenue by population is not guaranteed to placate the feuding parties because no accurate census exists. There is intense disagreement over demographics in Iraq — many Sunni Arabs insist they are the majority of Iraqis, even though Sunni Arabs are generally estimated to be 20 percent of the population, Kurds 20 percent and Shiite Arabs 60 percent.

If the law is passed, its effect on the oil industry could be enormous, assuming that foreign companies would be willing to work here despite the violence. Iraq has 80 known oil fields, 65 of which will be offered for bids for development contracts, said Hussain al-Shahristani, the oil minister.

Iraqi leaders say they want the 275-member Parliament to approve the law before May. The legislature is in recess but is expected to reconvene next month. American and Iraqi leaders had tried to get the law approved last year, but the effort bogged down at the drafting level. Before the cabinet vote on Monday, the main Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs agreed to work together to ensure that the law passes Parliament in an expeditious manner, Mr. Shahristani said.

Since last year, senior Bush administration officials and top American commanders here have said a new oil law is crucial to the country's political and economic development, and they have pressured Iraqi leaders relentlessly to make passage of the law a priority.

In recent weeks, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the senior American envoy here, has been in intense talks with Kurdish leaders in the north to overcome their objections to the draft, which centered on the contracting powers given to the central government versus the regions. Iraqi officials say Mr. Khalilzad's negotiations were crucial to winning unanimous cabinet approval on Monday.

"This is a significant political achievement because leaders representing all of Iraq's communities have demonstrated that they can pull together to resolve difficult issues of vital national importance," Mr. Khalilzad said in a written statement on Monday evening. "The drafting of this framework law was not easy. It presented special challenges for the Iraqi and Kurdistan regional governments, and the leaders of key political blocs."

Several members of the committee overseeing the drafting said in interviews that they were confident that Parliament would ultimately endorse the law, but perhaps only after heated debate.

"It will be tough," Mr. Salih said. "I want to admit it and I want to recognize that. It will be an interesting roller coaster, my friends."

The writers of the draft law tried to balance the powers of regional and central governments, an issue that goes directly to the heart of the Iraq war.

The minority Sunni Arabs, who ruled Iraq for decades before the toppling of Saddam Hussein and are now leading the insurgency, have chafed at rule by the Shiites and Kurds partly because they fear that those two groups might hoard oil wealth for themselves. Sunni Arab leaders have resisted attempts by the Kurds and some Shiite politicians to create laws allowing for greater regional autonomy.

The draft law says that all revenues from current and future oil fields will be collected by the central government and redistributed to regional or provincial governments by population, in theory ensuring an equitable distribution of profits. That method could help assuage Sunni Arabs hostile to Kurdish and Shiite autonomy.

The attitudes of Sunni Arabs could also soften if more oil exploration is done on their land. Iraqi officials recently increased their estimates of the amount of oil and natural gas deposits in Sunni Arab territory after paying tens of millions of dollars to foreign oil companies to re-examine old seismic data across the country and retrain Iraqi petroleum engineers.

Industry and government analysts in and outside Iraq estimate the proven oil reserves at 115 billion barrels. Oil production peaked at 3.7 million barrels a day in 1979, according to the United States Department of Energy. Production stood at 2.6 million barrels a day before the 2003 invasion, but has dropped since.

The oil law's drafters reached agreement on the principle of revenue sharing fairly early in the process. Much more contentious was the issue of signing oil contracts. The Kurds, who have enjoyed de facto independence in the mountainous north since the end of the Persian Gulf war in 1991, argued strongly for regional governments or companies to have full power in signing contracts with foreign companies to develop oil fields. Sunni Arab leaders insisted on keeping this power in the hands of the Oil Ministry. The Shiites fell somewhere in the middle.

The draft law has a compromise: regions can enter into contracts, but a powerful new central body, the Federal Oil and Gas Council, would have the power to prevent the contracts from going forward if they do not meet certain prescribed standards, Mr. Salih said. A panel of oil experts from inside and outside Iraq would advise the federal council on the contracts.

The draft law also re-establishes the state-run Iraq National Oil Company, which was founded in 1964 to oversee oil production but was shut down by Mr. Hussein in 1987. The company would operate separately from the Oil Ministry and use a business model. In addition, any region that can produce at least 150,000 barrels of oil a day can create its own operating company.

Energy analysts said the new law is unlikely to lead to a stampede by foreign companies anytime soon because it leaves too many unresolved issues, including the lack of a mechanism to settle potential disputes between the federal authority and local governments.

"I think the devil is going to be in the details," said Fadel Gheit, an analyst with Oppenheimer & Company in New York. "Oil companies need governments that will honor the contracts they sign and they need a safe environment to operate," he added.

While Mr. Gheit said he expected American and British oil companies to receive preferential treatment in the awarding of contracts, other analysts said Iraqis would be suspicious of awarding preferential deals to American companies.

"Iraqis are extremely protective of their resources," said Rochdi A. Younsi, an analyst at Eurasia Group, a political risk consulting firm. "Given the level of anti-American sentiment, any major American oil company perceived to take advantage of their relations in government would be seen as being part of the so-called conspiracy to take over Iraq's natural resources."

Iraq Approves Draft Oil Legislation (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Iraq's cabinet on Monday approved the draft of a law governing the country's oil industry that would open the door to much-needed investment, officials said.

The law has to be approved by parliament, and several documents need to be written to complete the legislative package governing the oil industry.

But approval by the cabinet, which includes members of the country's three main sectarian-political blocs, the Shia, Sunni Arabs and Kurds, is a step towards ending a months-long stalemate over the powers of Iraq's federal and regional governments.

The US has pressed both Baghdad and the autonomous Kurdistan Regional Government in northern Iraq to produce a law, the absence of which is holding back the foreign investment deemed critical to boosting oil production. Output has fallen to less than 2m barrels per day – down from 2.5m bpd before the war – in a country with the world's third largest reserves.

"This draft law, the endorsement of the cabinet of this legislation, represents a breakthrough for Iraq's political and economic transition," said Barham Salih, Iraq's deputy prime minister. He said that the parties in government were committed to enacting the entire oil legislation package by the end of May.

Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador, welcomed the approval of the draft, declaring that it was the "first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation".

It was unclear whether there had been any changes to a draft which the leaders of Iraq's Kurdish parties, who had championed regional control of oil, had approved at the weekend.

But it is unlikely, given months of wrangling, that ministers of the Kurdistan Alliance bloc would have agreed to legislation that seriously diverged from what their leadership had approved.

With Iraqi Boy's Surgery, A Time For Healing (WP)

By Robin Shulman

NEW HYDE PARK, N.Y., Feb. 26 -- In a light-filled lobby of a hospital for sick children, an American mother talked on Monday with an Iraqi father about how their lives had been altered and entwined by a war thousands of miles away.

Charlotte Freeman's husband, Capt. Brian Freeman, had been stationed in Iraq, where he worked to bring an 11-year-old Iraqi boy born with a rare heart defect to the United States for lifesaving surgery. That boy is Abu Ali's son.

Last week, the boy, Ali, had the surgery. It was successful, but the occasion turned out to be as painful as it was sweet.

On Jan. 20, the day Abu Ali learned that his long-awaited visas to the United States were likely to come, Freeman, 31, was kidnapped from his office by insurgents and later killed.

Ali has recuperated enough after his Feb. 20 surgery at Schneider Children's Hospital on Long Island to walk around in sandals. A gentle, shy, skinny boy with a megawatt smile, he says he wants to be a soccer star.

"This has been a gift for me," said Charlotte Freeman, 31, who flew in from California with her family this weekend to meet Abu Ali and his son and stay with them at the Ronald McDonald House. She smiled through tears at the boy. "Through Ali, Brian lives," she said.

Ali, the second of five children, was born with a hole between the two upper chambers of his heart, said Fred Bierman, the cardiology chief overseeing Ali's care. Ali's condition was diagnosed in 2005 in Iraq, his father said. Doctors said he would need surgery to survive into adulthood.

But the Iraqi medical system had collapsed, and this surgery was not available.

There was danger in asking for help from Americans and being branded "traitor" or "spy," said Abu Ali, 37, a stocky, gentle man with jet-black hair. He would not reveal his full name for fear of reprisals; his friends believe he is now in Amman, Jordan.

An athlete who trained with the U.S. Olympic bobsled team, Brian Freeman graduated from West Point in 1999. Then in fall 2005, a shortage of officers prompted a call-up of Brian's reserve section, even though many members had only a few months of service remaining.

Brian did not support the war in Iraq and had little desire to participate, Charlotte said. But he felt an obligation to carry the same burden as his West Point classmates.

When he left their home in Temecula, Calif., son Gunnar was nearly 3 and daughter Ingrid was a newborn. From Iraq, he would contact Charlotte every other day with a webcam. He loved it when she put Ingrid in front of the camera so he could watch her face change as she grew.

He didn't talk much about the dangers, Charlotte said; she learned about his close calls only later when she read his e-mails to friends.

As The Washington Post previously reported, he told Charlotte that the Iraqis "didn't want us there." And she knew in December when he cornered Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) at a Baghdad helicopter landing zone and told them that the war was going badly.

But, as a civilian affairs officer, Freeman mainly concerned himself with purifying water and paving roads -- and his private, off-duty cause, a young boy named Ali.

Freeman arranged for sponsorship from Gift of Life International, a New York-based nonprofit that brings poor children with heart ailments to top hospitals.

Freeman also talked to Charlotte about long-term plans of starting a nonprofit to help Iraqi children seeking medical care abroad, a project she hopes to pursue.

On Monday, Ali's doctor said that the boy still has heart-rhythm problems but that his major trouble has been solved and he should be able to travel home in a few weeks.

Ingrid Freeman toddled to Abu Ali and offered a handful of Cheerios. He scooped her up and kissed her wispy hair.

Abu Ali hopes that his son will someday do humanitarian work of his own. But Ali's dreams for now are simple: "I want to stay in America."

Billions Over Baghdad (NYT)

By John B. Taylor

Stanford, Calif.

EARLIER this month, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform held a hearing that criticized the decision to ship American currency into Iraq just after Saddam Hussein's government fell. As the committee's chairman, Henry Waxman of California, put it in his opening statement, "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" His criticism attracted wide attention, feeding antiwar sentiment and even providing material for comedians. But a careful investigation of the facts behind the currency shipment paints a far different picture.

The currency that was shipped into Iraq in the days after the fall of Saddam Hussein's government was part of a successful financial operation that had been carefully planned months before the invasion. Its aims were to prevent a financial collapse in Iraq, put the financial system on a firm footing and pave the way for a new Iraqi currency. Contrary to the criticism that such currency shipments were ill advised or poorly monitored, this financial plan was carried out with precision and was a complete success.

The plan, which had two stages, was designed to work for Iraq's cash economy, in which checks or electronic funds transfers were virtually unknown and shipments of tons of cash were commonplace.

In the first stage, the United States would pay Iraqi government employees and pensioners in American dollars. These were obtained from Saddam Hussein's accounts in American banks, which were frozen after he attacked Kuwait in 1990 and amounted to about $1.7 billion. Since the dollar is a strong and reliable currency, paying in dollars would create financial stability until a new Iraqi governing body was established and could design a new currency. The second stage of the plan was to print a new Iraqi currency for which Iraqis could exchange their old dinars.

The final details of the plan were reviewed in the White House Situation Room by President Bush and the National Security Council on March 12, 2003. I attended that meeting. Treasury Secretary John Snow opened the presentation with a series of slides. "As soon as control over the Iraqi government is established," the first slide read, we plan to "use United States dollars to pay civil servants and pensioners. Later, depending on the situation on the ground, we would decide about the new currency." Another slide indicated that we could ship $100 million in small denominations to Baghdad on one week's notice. President Bush approved the plan with the understanding that we would review the options for a new Iraqi currency later, when we knew the situation on the ground.

To carry out the first stage of the plan, President Bush issued an executive order on March 20, 2003, instructing United States banks to relinquish Mr. Hussein's frozen dollars. From that money, 237.3 tons in $1, $5, $10 and $20 bills were sent to Iraq. During April, United States Treasury officials in Baghdad worked with the military and the Iraqi Finance Ministry officials — who had painstakingly kept the payroll records despite the looting of the ministry — to make sure the right people were paid. The Iraqis supplied extensive documentation of each recipient of a pension or paycheck. Treasury officials who watched over the payment process in Baghdad in those first few weeks reported a culture of good record keeping.

On April 29, Jay Garner, the retired lieutenant general who headed the reconstruction effort in Iraq at the time, reported to Washington that the payments had lifted the mood of people in Baghdad during those first few confusing days. Even more important, a collapse of the financial system was avoided.

This success paved the way for the second stage of the plan. In only a few months, 27 planeloads (in 747 jumbo jets) of new Iraqi currency were flown into Iraq from seven printing plants around the world. Armed convoys delivered the currency to 240 sites around the country. From there, it was distributed to 25 million Iraqis in exchange for their old dinars, which were then dyed, collected into trucks, shipped to incinerators and burned or simply buried.

The new currency proved to be very popular. It provided a sound underpinning for the financial system and remains strong, appreciating against the dollar even in the past few months. Hence, the second part of the currency plan was also a success.

The story of the currency plan is one of several that involved large sums of cash. For example, just before the war, Saddam Hussein stole $1 billion from the Iraqi central bank. American soldiers found that money in his palaces and shipped it to a base in Kuwait, where the United States Army's 336th Finance Command kept it safe. To avoid any appearance of wrongdoing, American soldiers in Kuwait wore pocket-less shorts and T-shirts whenever they counted the money.

Later, American forces used the found cash to build schools and hospitals, and to repair roads and bridges. Gen. David Petraeus has described these projects as more successful than the broader reconstruction effort.

But that wasn't the only source of dollars. Because the new Iraqi dinar was so popular, the central bank bought billions of United States dollars to keep it from appreciating too much. As a result, billions in cash accumulated in the vaults of the central bank. Later, with American help, the Iraqi central bank deposited these billions at the New York Federal Reserve Bank, where they could earn interest.

Finally, when Iraq started to earn dollars selling oil, the United States transferred the cash revenue to the Finance Ministry, where it was used to finance government operations, including salaries and reconstruction. Many of these transfers occurred in 2004, long after the financial stabilization operation had concluded. Iraqi Finance Ministry officials had already demonstrated that they were serious about keeping the controls they had in place. The 360 tons mentioned by Henry Waxman includes these transfers as well as the 237.3 tons shipped in 2003 in the stabilization.

One of the most successful and carefully planned operations of the war has been held up in this hearing for criticism and even ridicule. As these facts show, praise rather than ridicule is appropriate: praise for the brave experts in the United States

Treasury who went to Iraq in April 2003 and established a working Finance Ministry and central bank, praise for the Iraqis in the Finance Ministry who carefully preserved payment records in the face of looting, praise for the American soldiers in the 336th Finance Command who safely kept found money, and yes, even praise for planning and follow-through back in the United States.

"Allies" (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

On Oct. 2, 2001, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization took the unprecedented step of formally invoking Article 5 of its 1949 Charter, which says that "an armed attack against one or more of them. . . . shall be considered an attack against all of them." Lord Geoffrey Robertson, then NATO's secretary-general, gave a press conference saying he wanted to "reiterate that the United States of America can rely on the full support of its 18 NATO Allies in the campaign against terrorism."

In recent weeks, we've been reminded once again just how cheap those promises were. On Thursday, Stéphane Dion, who leads Canada's Liberal Party, announced that as prime minister he would bring an end to the country's 2,500-strong military commitment to southern Afghanistan. "Neither Canada, NATO nor the Americans anticipated how violent and dangerous Kandahar would become in 2006," he said, adding that the proper role for Canadian forces is "to win the hearts and minds of the Afghan people."

Also in recent weeks, the Italian government of Romano Prodi briefly collapsed after it was unable to muster the votes to approve the enlargement of a U.S. Army base in Vicenza along with the continuance of Italy's 2,000-man deployment in Afghanistan. George W. Bush has had to plead publicly with NATO nations to increase their troop commitments and -- would it be too much to ask? -- deploy them in areas where they are likely to see combat. To make up for the NATO shortfall, Britain is sending in another 1,400 soldiers, while the U.S. is extending the tour of the Tenth Mountain Infantry Brigade and sending in troops from the 82nd Airborne.

It is a statistical certainty that American and British soldiers will pay a price in blood this spring because their French, Spanish, Italian, German and -- if Mr. Dion has his way -- Canadian counterparts mean to keep their moral slates clean. A century ago that would have been a mark of martial and national dishonor, of "letting the side down." Today, it is a concession to the political reality that most NATO governments cannot muster political support for anything except a "peace mission" in Afghanistan. "If you are non-U.S., implicitly there is a political calculus," says a senior U.S. Army officer about his NATO colleagues. "You are looking over your shoulder to Ottawa. You're asking: 'Will getting five killed-in-action mean a phone call about the wisdom of this particular operation?'"

Afghanistan, of course, was supposed to have been the "good war" -- the war that, unlike Iraq, everyone was willing to fight. Now the best that can be said for France, Germany, Italy and company is that they will not actively stand in the way of its being fought, so long as they're not fighting.

But even that is an improvement over the way some European governments are conducting themselves in the war on terror closer to home. Earlier this month, an Italian court named and indicted 25 CIA officers and five Italian officials for the rendition to Egypt of a cleric named Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, aka Abu Omar. Germany, too, has issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA officers involved in the abduction (in Macedonia) of a German man of Lebanese descent named Khaled al-Masri. Mr. Masri has since become a cause célèbre back home -- a living indictment of the Bush administration's perfidious approach to fighting terrorism.

In Sheikh Omar's case, even the Italians don't dispute the Egyptian was a dangerous actor: He is believed to have recruited terrorists and plotted an attack on the U.S. embassy in Rome. Mr. Masri, by contrast, is usually depicted as an innocent caught up in a web of CIA intrigue. But as John Rosenthal of the invaluable Transatlantic Intelligencer blog notes, it was German, not American, intelligence that first became intensely concerned about Mr. Masri's activities.

Not two weeks after 9/11, Mr. Masri was already being investigated by authorities in Baden-Württemberg as a "follower of Bin Laden." A classified report from Germany's Federal Bureau of Criminal Investigations notes that Mr. Masri maintained "numerous contacts to dangerous persons and accused suspects in the domain of Islamist terrorism." He had a friendship with a militant Islamist named Reda Seyam, suspected of involvement in the 2002 Bali bombings. He frequented an Islamic Cultural Center known for distributing audiocassettes with such charming messages as "Whoever fights against the Christians, the Jews and their allies is a martyr." It was shut down by Bavarian officials in December 2005 and the organization that ran it was banned.

For all this, Mr. Masri may be guilty of nothing more than fellow-traveling. The same might be said of the German government, which at a minimum involved itself in the abduction it now means to prosecute by agreeing to keep the whole matter secret. "The German government, witness to the entire incident, pretended not to know anything," the German newsweekly Der Spiegel reported in 2005. "In a court of law, such behavior amounts to the suppression of evidence."

The German government also involved itself in another apparent CIA kidnapping in December 2001 of a German citizen and terrorist suspect named Mohammed Haydar Zammar, who was later rendered to his native Syria. Rather than demand his instant repatriation, however, the government of Gerhard Schröder arranged for investigators to interview Mr. Zammer in Syria, in exchange for which it dropped charges against two Syrian agents in Germany. Mr. Zammar remains in a Syrian prison.

None of this need shame the German government: Mr. Zammar is reported to have recruited some of the 9/11 hijackers and his fate is richly deserved. What is shameful is that the same governments that actively colluded with the U.S. to bring the worst terrorist cases to some kind of justice are now bending to the demands of activist prosecutors and the prevailing anti-American mood, and again allowing the U.S. to take the flak for what were often joint operations. For the indicted CIA officers, that flak is less deadly than what the GIs in Afghanistan can look forward to this spring. But the principle is the same.

Asked what he worried about most in wartime, Napoleon is said to have replied, "Allies." Plus ça change.

Sen. Feinstein Seizes On DoJ Documents (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Justice Department performance evaluations released to senators over the weekend further validate concerns that six dismissed U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for political purposes, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said yesterday.

Feinstein forwarded the six evaluations to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) along with a letter urging floor time for her bill, which would reverse a statutory change last year that allows the Bush administration to indefinitely install federal prosecutors without seeking Senate confirmation.

Several of the fired attorneys were involved in political corruption probes in the months before their departures were sought by Justice, including San Diego's Carol Lam, who secured three indictments in the investigation of former GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.). Judiciary Committee Democrats had vowed to subpoena the performance evaluations if the administration did not furnish copies, but the reports only heightened Feinstein's skepticism about Justice's explanation that the dismissed attorneys had performance problems.

"Indeed, contrary to the department's rationalizations to explain their dismissals, in every case the fired U.S. attorney was judged to have a strategic plan and appropriate priorities to meet the needs of the Department and their districts," Feinstein wrote in yesterday's letter, reminding leaders of her bill, which is cosponsored by Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

U.S. Attorneys Should Be Confirmed (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard News Service, February 27, 2007

Congress clearly didn't take much notice of an obscure provision the Bush administration slipped into the USA Patriot Act last year. But now it seems clear that the measure is being used to conduct a political purge of U.S. attorneys' offices.

So far, at least eight are known to have been forced out by the Justice Department, and there may be others. The departures were facilitated by a provision that allows the president to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period without the usual Senate confirmation.

The ouster that raised the biggest stink was that of Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego, who nailed Randy "Duke" Cunningham, then a senior House Republican, for accepting over $2 million in bribes. The suspicion was that the White House acted because her investigation was still ongoing and widening.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate committee that the firings were all for "performance-related" reasons, although he conceded that the highly respected U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark., was forced out so the job could be given to a protege and former aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove.

The "performance-related" defense began to crumble when the department's internal evaluations started to leak out and it turned out that most of the ousted attorneys had been capable, competent and well regarded.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee are threatening to summon the dismissed prosecutors to testify and to subpoena their performance evaluations. It would be an opportunity for the eight to rebut a gratuitous slap at their reputations.

Better yet would be to repeal the offending provision. A bill to do that has bipartisan support in the Senate, but is being held up in a procedural wrangle. Let's hope the lawmakers unsnarl the obstacle quickly, because this provision has the potential to give us a badly flawed criminal-justice system.

Congress Wary Of Justice Department Firings (PBS)

PBS News Hour, February 27, 2007

Evaluations of the U.S. attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department under a little-known USA Patriot Act provision described them as "well regarded" and "very competent." Analysts discuss the firings and congressional charges of political tampering.

RAY SUAREZ: Margaret Chiara, the U.S. attorney for Western Michigan, suddenly announced her resignation on Friday after five years in the post. Although Chiara herself wouldn't comment, several news accounts report she was forced out by Justice Department officials over differences of views on capital punishment, among other things.

Chiara is the eighth U.S. attorney to resign since December at the government's request. The others: Bud Cummins, from Arkansas; Paul Charlton, of Arizona; Daniel Bogden, Nevada; David Iglesias, New Mexico; John McKay, Seattle; Kevin Ryan, San Francisco; and Carol Lam in San Diego.

Lam recently had won praise for indicting the number-three official at the CIA on corruption charges and for successfully prosecuting former Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who took $2 million in bribes from defense contractors.

In fact, in recent years, all had received positive job evaluations. However, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has insisted that the prosecutors were replaced because they performed inadequately.

At a Senate hearing last month, California Democrat Dianne Feinstein took issue with that assertion. She's pushing to repeal the law allowing the attorney general to replace sitting U.S. attorneys with temporary replacements indefinitely and without Senate approval.

SEN. DIANNE FEINSTEIN (D), California: I'm very concerned. I've had two of them asked to resign in my state, from major jurisdictions, with major cases ongoing, with substantially good records as prosecutors.

ALBERTO GONZALES, U.S. Attorney General: I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it.

RAY SUAREZ: But in the case of Bud Cummins in Arkansas, the Justice Department did admit he was removed to make way for a former aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove.

Stuart Gerson

Former Acting Attorney General

Is there any impedance of ongoing investigations or other initiatives so that the public isn't getting effective law enforcement? And I don't see any evidence of that being the case.

Questions raised by the firings

RAY SUAREZ: For more, we're joined by Stuart Gerson. He served as assistant attorney general during the first Bush administration and as acting attorney general under President Clinton. He's now in private practice in Washington.

And Laurie Levenson, she spent eight years as an assistant U.S. attorney in Los Angeles. She's now a professor of criminal law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. Both guests testified on this issue before the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this month.

And, Prof. Levenson, there are more than 90 federal districts around the country served by U.S. attorneys. Why should the firing of eight attract so much attention?

LAURIE LEVENSON, Loyola Law School: Because it's quite unusual. Although it's not unusual to have the president put in his own appointees, at this stage of the game, midterm, with interims going in, in their place, that is not business as usual, especially when, all of a sudden, we're hearing it's performance-related, and yet the documentation indicates that it may not be.

Big red flags are going on as to whether they're politicizing these U.S. attorneys' offices or trying to centralize power back in Washington. It's just a question mark, because it's so different from what's been done before.

RAY SUAREZ: Mr. Gerson, not business as usual?

STUART GERSON, Former Acting Attorney General: Well, it's unusual, but I think the starting point needs to be, when you're looking at a process that's inherently political, and you're looking at individuals who all of whom have served more than four years, the real question that you need to be asking is: Is there any impedance of ongoing investigations or other initiatives so that the public isn't getting effective law enforcement? And I don't see any evidence of that being the case.

Laurie Levenson

Loyola Law School

[I]f this isn't political, why is it happening now? Why is it happening after the new Patriot Act that allowed the Justice Department to put in interim appointments without having to go through the regular confirmation process?

The impact of the firings

RAY SUAREZ: In several cases, Mr. Gerson, these people were told they were doing a good job in the way that political appointees are told, by performance reviews. And the first time they heard anything negative was when they read it in the newspapers as an explanation for their being forced out.

STUART GERSON: Well, I don't doubt that that's the way that this news was transmitted. And if that's so, perhaps the process was clumsier than it needed to be.

But in the case of at least one of those individuals, who clearly got a favorable report, at least 19 members of Congress felt otherwise, with respect to the level of enforcement of the immigration laws. Now, one can discuss that, but clearly some of the critics of the administration, including Sen. Feinstein, wrote letters to the department, which apparently had influence.

I just don't see any evidence that any case, any investigative initiative has been impaired in any way. Moreover, as I visit U.S. attorneys' offices around the country -- and I do it in connection with my work, sometimes they're my adversaries -- I really don't see any great falloff.

Of course, there are probably some people in some places who are concerned. That's understandable. It's almost always the case. But generally it's business as usual.

The career people who run 95-plus percent of what's going on are working assiduously at what they do. They're not avoiding corruption cases; they're not avoiding the hard cases. They're doing their job. The public is being well-served.

RAY SUAREZ: Prof. Levenson, what's your concern then?

LAURIE LEVENSON: Well, my concern is, frankly, that the offices aren't taking it this way; that is, there is a significant morale issue that's going on here.

Because for the troops -- and they are apolitical, for the most part, who are trying to do the right job -- they have big question marks. Why are their leaders being dismissed?

Likewise, for the judges in those districts, especially, for example, up in Seattle where John McKay was dismissed, they don't understand at all why somebody who has an office that's working well with the courts, is being very successful, is all of a sudden being dismissed.

So I think there is the question about, if there are these new priorities that all of a sudden the Justice Department has to put in, what are they? Are they going to be compatible with what the district needs are?

And, frankly, if this isn't political, why is it happening now? Why is it happening after the new Patriot Act that allowed the Justice Department to put in interim appointments without having to go through the regular confirmation process?

Stuart Gerson

Former Acting Attorney General

The administration has pledged itself to seek the advice and consent of the Senate on every single permanent appointment and to consult with the senators of that state. We'll see if that happens, but that's the pledge.

The new Patriot Act provisions

RAY SUAREZ: Why is it happening now? And has the change in the way replacements are appointed sort of brought attention to these firings?

STUART GERSON: Well, clearly it's brought attention to it, and it's had an affect. The administration has pledged that there will be no permanent appointment that takes place without consultation with the home state senators. That is the usual process.

This Patriot Act change that Prof. Levenson cites is clearly something that members on both sides of the aisle didn't pay sufficient attention to, but the initial reaction of the Feinstein proposal to take this away from the Justice Department and have it reside completely in the judiciary -- a bad idea, it's constitutionally inconsistent with the judicial function -- is now a bill that's been withdrawn, and we're going to return to the old system that worked well enough.

RAY SUAREZ: But let's be clear on what the Patriot Act amendment said. This little change in the reauthorization allows the attorney general to appoint replacements without Senate review, correct?

STUART GERSON: Well, indeed, that has always been the case, originally for 120 days. Now, it was argued that the administration was somehow trying to get around Congress and appoint interim people who would stay there forever.

Well, I think you need to put that in perspective. First, we're dealing with relatively few United States attorneys. It's no more than eight out of 93, so we begin with that. There's no massive effort.

Nor is any of these in a place where there's some critical matter going on that somehow is going to be interrupted. Almost all of the people who have been appointed interims are the same kind of people who have always been appointed interims.

The administration has pledged itself to seek the advice and consent of the Senate on every single permanent appointment and to consult with the senators of that state. We'll see if that happens, but that's the pledge. It's certainly being done in a way that should be transparent.

Laurie Levenson

Loyola Law School

[Y]ou get worried when things like what happened in Arkansas occur, when you have Bud Cummins, who even the Justice Department admits was doing a very good job, he's replaced all of a sudden with somebody who has comparatively little experience...

Selecting replacements

RAY SUAREZ: Professor, you noted that the administration can now make those replacement appointments in perpetuity. But as Mr. Gerson mentioned, the attorney general says he is going to go to the Senate. Does that satisfy you?

LAURIE LEVENSON: It doesn't really satisfy me, because the proof is in the pudding. And you get worried when things like what happened in Arkansas occur, when you have Bud Cummins, who even the Justice Department admits was doing a very good job, he's replaced all of a sudden with somebody who has comparatively little experience at this stage in his career, somebody who worked for Karl Rove, and then, realizing that if they have to put him up permanently he's not going to fly, they withdraw him, makes you wonder, why was he the interim?

Ordinarily I agree with Stuart Gerson that the interim, it would be somebody out of the same office, who's familiar with the operations of the office. But, for example, in San Francisco, Washington is sending out somebody from main Justice, from the Washington, D.C., office, the executive office, not somebody from within the office who knows the office's operations.

RAY SUAREZ: Wasn't the tradition, Mr. Gerson, to take a great deal of advice from the home state, that understands local conditions?

STUART GERSON: Absolutely, Ray. But what Prof. Levenson just cited is an interesting case, because the current director of the FBI, Bob Mueller, was, at one point in his career, sent from Washington to be the United States attorney in San Francisco to put an office that lacked sufficient direction, in the view of the main Justice Department, get it going in a stronger, more vigorous way.

And my understanding is that's the intention this time, as well, with respect to San Francisco. And there have not been great criticisms that have been leveled, at least with respect to that particular office.

San Diego has been a little bit noisier situation. But, again, it doesn't appear that it's reflective of anything other than, in that case, succumbing to criticism from the outside.

Prof. Levenson does cite one case, where Paul McNulty agreed that it was a political motivation. The fellow who was made the interim United States attorney was somebody who I think was considered to be a political future who they wanted to give a little exposure to. He had certainly more experience starting out than the incumbent had when he started out. And the process and the dispute of this probably has cost that gentleman any real shot at a permanent position.

So it's politics. I don't know that it's healthy or unhealthy politics. This is something that's committed to the executive branch. It is a political decision; it can be debated.

And I think, when you really get down to it, that's the season that we're in with the new congressional majority. They're certainly entitled to take a look at this. There ought to be oversight; there will be. But I can guarantee you, this is not going to be an issue come election time.

RAY SUAREZ: Professor, what would you be looking out for in these various federal districts, as these attorneys' offices change hands, to know whether this is malign or benign, if your worst fears are being realized?

LAURIE LEVENSON: That's a great question. I think a couple of things. One is that there are some of these offices who have some high visibility political corruption cases, and whether those continue or whether those are downplayed under a new administration is a big question.

The second thing is whether the Justice Department holds true to its word, whether they put up people who they're ready to put through the confirmation process, and also whether they paused to ask, "Well, maybe we should start that process rather than just going the interim route. Maybe we should see if we can get our priorities in place, without taking people who have a well-operating office, removing them, and creating these questions among the AUSAs who work for them."

RAY SUAREZ: Prof. Levenson, Stuart Gerson, thank you both.

LAURIE LEVENSON: Thank you.

Ashcroft Pizza Party Raises Ethics Eyebrows (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 27, 2007

A pizza luncheon to be hosted this Wednesday by former Attorney General turned consultant John Ashcroft for some of his old political appointees has raised eyebrows in the Justice Department's ethics office, U.S. News has learned. The ethics office, which provides Justice employees with guidance on a wide range of ethics questions, has not instructed invitees not to attend the lunch.

However, it has "advised invitees to consider the appearance of attending such an event," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse told U.S. News. But Juleanna Glover Weiss, an adviser and spokesperson for his consulting firm, told U.S. News that "General Ashcroft has abided by the letter and spirit of all post government service ethics restrictions." Wednesday's lunch, Weiss said, "is just a small social gathering."

Executive branch employees must comply with stringent standards of ethical conduct pertaining to accepting gifts or items of monetary value from anyone wanting to do official business with their agency, including their old colleagues and bosses. The ethics office has told political appointees at Justice that if they attend the Ashcroft pizza luncheon, it would "count toward the $20/occasion and $50/year limits."

Typically, former government officials must abide by a one-year "cooling off" period before lobbying or soliciting business from their former agency. But there are longer restrictions when it comes to contacting old colleagues on specific matters. The department did not elaborate on what aspect of Ashcroft's lunch invitation gave the ethics office pause.

Ashcroft was the first top official to step down after President George Bush won a second term. He submitted his letter of resignation in November 2004 and left in February 2005. At his last Justice Department annual Christmas party, Ashcroft told reporters that he was not seeking any outside employment until he had completely left the department, in order to protect the department's institutional interests and avoid even the faintest appearance of any conflicts resulting from a job search.

Ashcroft subsequently created his own consulting firm, the Ashcroft Group, which quickly became a profitable venture. The firm specializes in strategic consulting, including with respect to homeland security, best business practices, litigation strategy, and data security. On the group's website, Aschroft parlays his leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, to pitch for homeland security business.

"This deep experience in fighting the war on terror," the website says, "has given the Ashcroft Group LLC a strategic advantage in evaluating and navigating the homeland security and law enforcement marketplace." Ashcroft's consulting firm also advises businesses on investment strategies in the homeland security arena, as well as crisis management and dealing with government investigations, high-stakes litigation, and financial distress or bankruptcy.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Dismisses Suit Over Transfer Agent (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

A federal judge dismissed a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit that accused two former Citigroup Inc. executives of cheating mutual-fund customers out of millions of dollars in savings through the use of an affiliated transfer agent.

U.S. District Judge Richard C. Casey in Manhattan granted a summary judgment motion by Thomas W. Jones, the former chief executive of Citigroup Asset Management, and Lewis E. Daidone, the former treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney family of funds.

The SEC had requested civil penalties, a permanent injunction against the men and disgorgement. "The commission's action for civil penalties and an injunction are time-barred, and its action for disgorgement is not supported by sufficient facts," the judge said.

The SEC had alleged that Citigroup's asset-management business took most of the benefit of a discount from using an affiliated transfer agent for itself, rather than passing on that savings to the mutual funds and their customers. The regulator had claimed Jones and Daidone were "principally responsible" for the alleged scheme.

Citigroup settled the SEC's charges in May 2005 and agreed to pay $208 million to mutual-fund customers allegedly victimized by the transfer-agent arrangements. In settling, the financial-services giant didn't admit or deny wrongdoing.

An SEC spokesman didn't comment.

American Century/Kopp Funds

American Century Investments acquired the mutual-fund assets of Minnesota-based Kopp Investment Advisors for an undisclosed sum. Kopp Emerging Growth Fund and Kopp Total Quality Management Fund, with total assets of $225 million, have been merged into American Century New Opportunities II Fund and American Century Equity Growth Fund, respectively. The Kansas City, Mo.-based American Century manages $104 billion in assets.

S.E.C. Says Firm Traded On Information Stolen From Computers (NYT)

An accounting firm in Hong Kong made $2.7 million from illegal insider trades by hacking into computers to view press releases before they were published, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday in a lawsuit.

The S.E.C. sued the company, Blue Bottle, a Hong Kong-chartered firm that says it is based in London, and its chief executive, Matthew Charles Stokes. Blue Bottle made $2.7 million by hacking into computer systems shortly before the release of market-moving information, the S.E.C. said in a complaint filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan.

A Blue Bottle spokesman could not immediately be reached for comment. An S.E.C. lawyer did not immediately return a call. The suit seeks an injunction barring further wrongdoing as well as the recovery of any illicit trading profits.

The S.E.C. says Blue Bottle made 12 illegal trades this year. In one instance, Blue Bottle bought options to sell shares of BJ's Wholesale Club, at 3:36 p.m. on Jan. 3, the S.E.C. said. The next day, shares in BJ's fell 4 percent after the company said its predicted earnings would fall below expectations.

Blue Bottle made about $12,000 from trading on BJ's, the S.E.C. said.

In another instance cited by the S.E.C., Blue Bottle began buying options to sell Symantec, the maker of computer antivirus software, at 1:03 p.m. on Jan. 12. The next trading day, Symantec said third-quarter earnings in 2007 would be less than forecast, driving shares down by 13 percent.

Based on "the disparate companies" in which Blue Bottle traded, the timing of the trades and the profit they generated, the S.E.C. said it believed that the firm tapped into computer systems to obtain nonpublic data. The commission said it was continuing to investigate how Blue Bottle obtained the information.

Review Clears Bristol-Myers (NYT)

Bristol-Myers Squibb, the drug maker, has been cleared of securities law violations in connection with its botched Plavix patent settlement last year, the company said yesterday in a regulatory filing.

The company said that it has been informed by the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, that a review found no violation of securities laws or breach of an earlier consent order the company had signed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The review was done by Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge who had been appointed to oversee operations as part of a deferred prosecution agreement the company signed in 2005. That was meant to settle accusations that it had misled investors through inventory manipulation.

The filing, submitted to the S.E.C. late yesterday, said that Mr. Christie's office had advised the company that the matters had been "fully remediated" and that he did not intend to take action.

In a statement last night, Bristol-Myers said the decision suggested that the company was on track to bring an end to the deferred prosecution agreement in Newark as scheduled on June 15.

"If the company fulfills its obligations under the deferred prosecution agreement, we expect the U.S. Attorney for the district of New Jersey would dismiss the complaint against the company on June 15," the company said in a statement.

The decision resolves one potential federal case for Bristol-Myers, which remains under criminal investigation by the Justice Department's antitrust division.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Deliberations In Libby Trial Proceed With Only 11 Jurors (USAT)

By Richard Willing

WASHINGTON — Jurors in Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury and obstruction trial begin their fourth full day of deliberations today minus one of their original colleagues.

Judge Reggie Walton dismissed a juror Monday after determining she had improper contact with information about the trial "outside the courtroom" during the weekend.

Walton then granted the defense's request that the remaining 11 jurors continue deliberating without a replacement.

Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, argued that the jurors — seven women and four men — were "obviously making progress" in the deliberations, which started Wednesday around midday.

Chief prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had asked the judge to seat an alternate juror and to restart deliberations.

The dismissed juror was a middle-age woman who had described herself during jury selection as a former curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. On Valentine's Day, she was the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt to court as part of the jury's "valentine" to Walton.

Shortly after jurors began deliberations Monday morning, the foreperson sent Walton a note indicating that one or more jurors appeared to have been exposed to inappropriate information.

Walton interviewed jurors for about 45 minutes before dismissing the woman. He said that her contact with outside information was accidental and that she didn't share it with fellow jurors.

"What she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her," Walton said. He did not elaborate.

Jurors are not sequestered but are warned each day by the judge to avoid reading, viewing, listening to or discussing reports about the trial.

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with obstruction of justice and lying to grand jurors and FBI investigators looking into how a CIA officer's identity was leaked to reporters during June and July 2003.

The charges against Libby are based on differing stories he and two reporters, Tim Russert of NBC and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time, told investigators about their talks.

University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias said he interpreted Wells' motion as a sign the defense believes deliberations are favoring Libby and that Wells does not wish to break that momentum.

"The dynamic might change anytime you have a deliberative body whose composition suddenly changes after a long period together," Tobias said.

Philip Anthony, a jury consultant based in Los Angeles, said the juror's absence will create "a noticeable hole in the fabric of the jury. … No doubt this particular juror had an affinity or even (an) alliance with certain other members of the panel."

No Verdict Yet From Remaining Libby Jury (AP)

By Michael Sniffen

AP, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- After the judge dismissed one of its members, the jury finished a fourth day of deliberations Monday without a verdict in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Most of the morning was consumed by deciding what to do about an art historian on the jury who saw or read something over the weekend about the trial. After interviewing her in private along with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton ruled that "what she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her."

The judge let the jurors continue deliberating with just 11 members after the defense endorsed that option. He overruled prosecutors who asked him to seat one of two alternate jurors who heard the trial and remain on standby.

Walton said he didn't want to "throw away two and a half days" of discussions the jury has had since getting the case at midday last Wednesday. If an alternate had been seated, the jury would have been required to begin its deliberations over from the beginning.

The jury returns Tuesday.

Libby, who was chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, whose husband was a prominent Iraq war critic.

Walton never disclosed what the juror had seen, but he concluded the exposure was not intentional and resulted from a misunderstanding of his orders. He has ordered jurors to avoid media coverage of the case and to stay off the Internet.

The dismissed juror formerly served as a curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. She was also the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt as part of the jury's Valentine's Day greeting to the court.

Usually defense attorneys want the largest number of jurors available because they only need one to hold out against conviction in order to force a mistrial, said Lawrence Barcella, a prominent Washington defense attorney who spent 16 years here as a federal prosecutor. "This is surely a well thought out calculation for the defense based on the jurors they have, the way they guess the deliberations might be going, and who the alternate would be."

Ultimately, however, decisions like this are "guesswork, tempered by the experience and instincts of very experienced attorneys who have demonstrated good instincts," Barcella said.

Libby Juror Dismissed; Panel Of 11 Continues Deliberations (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The woman was exposed to information about the trial of Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

A juror was dismissed Monday from hearing the perjury and obstruction case against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, but the judge allowed the panel to continue deliberations with 11 members.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton discharged the juror, a former art museum curator, after the woman acknowledged being exposed to information about the case during the weekend, when court was not in session.

Walton did not detail the nature or extent of the contacts, which he said were brought to his attention by the jury foreperson. He expressed concern to the lawyers that other jurors might have been tainted, but after interviewing each, the judge concluded the remaining seven women and four men could continue to serve.

"She did have contact with information related to this case," Walton said in court. "It wasn't intentional on her part. It was a misunderstanding of what I had been telling her throughout the trial."

The incident was one of the few signs of life from the jury since it began deliberations Wednesday. Walton called the other jurors into court Monday, and underscored that they should avoid reading or hearing anything about the case during the trial.

Federal court rules permit the judge to move forward with the smaller panel, although the government prosecutor urged him Monday to tap one of two alternate jurors still available for a full 12-member jury.

Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald said the smaller panel put the trial on "dangerous territory" if another juror were to become ill or be dismissed because of media exposure.

But Walton expressed concern that adding a juror would require the panel to restart deliberations. "I just don't think it would be appropriate to throw away those 2 1/2 days of deliberations," he said. "I don't have anything to suggest that this jury is anything but conscientious and can continue."

"It's not like by going to 11 we're on the cliff of some mistrial," Wells told the judge.

One observer said the lawyers' opposing views on the size of the jury suggested each was seeking a tactical advantage. "At the very least, it probably means that Fitzgerald liked the alternates and Wells did not," said Guy Singer, a Washington lawyer and former Justice Department prosecutor.

The dismissed juror had demonstrated an independent streak, which could have assisted the defense.

When the trial was about to resume on Valentine's Day, jurors paraded into Walton's courtroom with red shirts marked with white hearts. The only one to abstain from the sartorial statement was the former curator, who worked at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

A conviction would require that all jurors find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the woman's lack of participation suggested she might not be inclined to go along with the pack.

"Typically the defense would not be happy about losing a potential holdout juror," Singer said.

The jury deliberated Monday and is to resume this morning.

Libby, 56, once Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff and national security advisor, is charged with covering up his participation in the events leading to the summer 2003 disclosure of then-CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. Plame's husband, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, accused the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence in an opinion article for the New York Times a few days before his wife's identity was publicly revealed.

Juror Dismissed At CIA Leak Trial (CBS)

CBS News, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137134

Judge Orders Juror Removed After Exposure To Information About Case

(CBS/AP) A federal judge avoided a potential mistrial in the CIA leak case Monday by dismissing a juror and sending the other 11 back to continue deliberating the fate of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said the juror had seen or read something over the weekend about Libby's trial.

"What she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her," the judge said.

He did not say what the juror had seen but characterized it as a misunderstanding.

Walton originally feared several jurors were tainted, raising the specter of a mistrial in the politically charged case. Libby is accused of lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

After questioning jurors behind closed doors, however, Walton said the remaining seven women and four men were not affected. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald Walton asked the judge to call on one of two alternates, both women, who sat through the trial and are on standby.

But Walton said that would require deliberations to begin fresh and said he didn't want to "throw away 2 1/2 days" of discussions. Instead, he sided with Libby's lawyers and allowed deliberations to continue with 11 jurors — something allowed under federal law in such situations.

CBS News Justice Department reporter Deridre Hester reports the jurors were reminded to be vigilant about staying away from information about this case.

"They should continue with their deliberations and I will emphasize again the importance of not having contact with any outside information," Walton said.

The woman who was dismissed from the jury is an art history expert and scholar who formerly served as a curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. She was also the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt as part of the jury's Valentine's Day greeting to the court.

"There is no way to tell which side this helps until, of course, we get a verdict," says CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen.

"The worst scenario would have been a mistrial because the whole jury was tainted," Cohen says. "The second-worst case would have been had the jury been forced to start deliberations from scratch with an alternate juror taking the place of the dismissed one. So while this is a wrinkle, it's actually about the best possible outcome given what happened."

Cohen warns, however, that "if Libby is convicted, we may see this little problem emerge again on appeal."

Judge Dismisses Juror In Libby Trial (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — The judge presiding over the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. dismissed one of the jurors in the midst of deliberations Monday and ruled that the case should go forward with the remaining 11-member jury.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton, said the dismissed juror had improperly learned some information about the case outside of the courtroom, but he did not explain further. Judge Walton said it appeared the juror had not done so intentionally but through some unspecified misunderstanding.

After questioning the jurors, Judge Walton said no one else had been tainted by the information. Jurors are supposed to decide cases solely on the evidence and testimony presented in the trial. Deliberations resumed after the juror was dismissed and are to continue on Tuesday.

The dismissed juror was a woman who had worked for years as a curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, before moving to Washington. Judge Walton ruled, over the objections of the prosecution, that he would not replace her with one of two alternates on standby and would instead have the remaining 11 jurors continue to try to decide the case.

“I don’t think it would be appropriate to throw away those two and a half days,” he said, referring to the more than 18 hours of deliberations the jurors had completed by Monday morning.

If Judge Walton had replaced the juror, he would have been required to instruct the newly reconstituted jury to begin its deliberations from the beginning, as if there had been no previous discussions.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's lead defense lawyer, said that to add a new juror and restart deliberations would be prejudicial to his client. "It would be inappropriate and unfair" to discard the deliberations thus far, Mr. Wells argued.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said that the government believed a replacement juror should be seated and that there was no doubt the 11 remaining jurors would follow the judge's instructions to begin their deliberations anew.

But Judge Walton said he did not want to "throw away" the time the jury had already spent considering the case.

The alternates are two women who sat through the entire case as part of a panel of 14 jurors and were informed by Judge Walton that they were alternates only just before deliberations began. He told them at the time that they could be recalled to participate in the deliberations if needed and warned them to continue to abide by his instructions to avoid any news coverage of the case.

The decision by Mr. Libby's defense team to urge that the trial proceed without a new 12th juror seemed to be counter to conventional wisdom in such situations, lawyers said.

Because a unanimous jury is needed for a guilty verdict, a defendant need convince only one juror of his innocence to avoid a conviction. As a result, lawyers said, defense lawyers prefer to have as many sitting jurors as possible to increase the chances of having someone who refuses to vote for a guilty verdict.

But Neal R. Sonnett, a Miami lawyer who is the former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said there were often other factors at play. Mr. Libby's defense team would have made a judgment about the alternate's inclination toward the case, Mr. Sonnett said.

"The lawyers are always looking at who that person would be," he said. "And then they are engaging in a little mind-reading, trying to guess from that person's body language" whether it would be helpful or harmful to insert him into the deliberations.

In this case, the replacement juror would have been a middle-aged woman who identified herself as an insurance industry consultant. Some reporters at the trial observed her taking notes assiduously during the monthlong proceedings.

The dismissed juror was also notable in that she was the only one of the pool of 14 who declined to don a T-shirt with a heart on Valentine's Day as a gesture of good will to the judge and the court staff.

Mr. Libby, who is known by his nickname, Scooter, is the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. He is charged with five felony counts, accused of lying to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents investigating the leak in the summer of 2003 of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson.

Her identity was first disclosed publicly in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. Only days earlier, The New York Times had published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, asserting that the Bush White House had willfully distorted intelligence as to whether Iraq had tried to obtain uranium from Africa to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Fitzgerald, who was named special counsel for the investigation, never charged anybody with illegally leaking Ms. Wilson's name. But he said Mr. Libby had discussed Ms. Wilson in conversations with two reporters and had denied under oath having done so. Mr. Libby's lawyers said that the reporters were mistaken about those conversations and that, in any event, any misstatements he made were a result of innocent failures of memory.

Judge Dismisses Libby Juror After Reports Of Media Exposure (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- After the judge dismissed one of its members, the jury finished a fourth day of deliberations Monday without a verdict in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Court officials dismissed a female juror after learning she had been exposed to information about the case over the weekend. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he was sending the juror home "based on acknowledgement that she did have contact with information" related to the case. He said the contact "wasn't intentional."

Judge Walton said the remaining jury of seven women and four men had not been tainted and said he would allow deliberations to continue with 11 jurors rather than calling on one of two alternate jurors. "They should continue with their deliberations and I will emphasize again the importance of not having contact with any outside information," Judge Walton said.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked that Judge Walton call on one of two alternates, both women, who sat through the trial and are on standby. Judge Walton said that would require deliberations to begin fresh and said he didn't want to "throw away two and a half days."

The jury returns Tuesday.

Since Wednesday, jurors have issued only brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses. Mr. Libby and his lawyers have remained in or around the downtown courthouse throughout the deliberations.

The trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress.

The Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. The jurors were weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Mr. Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

Mr. Libby is charged with two counts of perjury, two counts of making false statements and one count of obstruction of justice. He faces up to 30 years in prison and $1.25 million in fines if found guilty.

Juror Is Dismissed From Libby Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The jury considering whether I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is guilty of perjury lost one of its members after nearly three days of deliberation yesterday, but the presiding judge ordered the panel to continue working to reach a decision.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton dismissed the juror, an art curator in her 70s, after she disclosed to her peers that she had come in contact over the weekend with information about the case of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

The jury foreperson reported that to Walton, who interviewed the jurors and determined that the female juror had not intentionally sought to ignore his orders to avoid contact with media coverage and all other information about the Libby case.

Walton agreed with a defense request that the jury continue deliberating with 11 members, rebuffing Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who asked that the judge call back one of two alternates and begin deliberations again. The jury had been deliberating since Wednesday afternoon.

"I just don't think it would be appropriate to throw away those 2 1/2 days of deliberations," Walton said. "I don't have anything to suggest that this jury is anything but conscientious and can continue."

If the jury were to lose another member, the judge said, he would call upon one of the two remaining alternates and instruct jurors to restart deliberations.

According to courthouse sources, the woman sought information that led her to material about the case over the weekend and realized yesterday morning that it was inappropriate to do so. Courthouse officials said Walton instructed the dismissed juror not to talk to the media until the case concludes.

After the juror was dismissed, the panel completed a fourth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict.

Libby, 56, is charged with making false statements, perjury and obstructing a probe into who may have criminally leaked information about undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media in 2003. He is not charged with the leak, but Fitzgerald has accused him of lying to conceal his role in discussing her identity with reporters.

Plame's name and classified CIA role were disclosed in a syndicated column on July 14, 2003, days after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

On Feb. 8, another juror revealed that she had inadvertently seen a photo and headline about witness Tim Russert, NBC News's Washington bureau chief, in The Washington Post's Style section. Federal marshals have been cutting all references to the trial from jurors' morning newspapers but had missed that story.

During questioning of potential jurors before the trial began, the juror dismissed yesterday said she grew up in New York, attended Syracuse University and Mills College, and obtained a doctorate in art history from the University of London. She said she worked for a decade at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York as a curator of prints and drawings.

In questioning to select a jury, she said she was sympathetic to what would become one of the defense's central contentions: that people can have innocent distortions of their memory.

Ex-Ney Aide Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

The top aide to convicted former Rep. Bob Ney pleaded guilty Monday to federal conspiracy charges stemming from a congressional bribery scandal that downed his boss.

Smiling nervously at times, William Heaton, 28, acknowledged accepting a golf trip to Scotland, expensive meals, and tickets to sporting events between 2002 and 2004 as payoffs for helping clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Heaton worked for Ney, R-Ohio, from September 2001 to July 2006, ultimately serving as his chief of staff.

"You received things of value in exchange for performing functions for Mr. Abramoff and other lobbyists who worked for him, as well as a foreign businessman. Is that correct?" U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle asked Heaton during the 20-minute hearing.

"Yes, your honor," Heaton replied in a firm voice. He pleaded guilty to one count of federal conspiracy.

He faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison and $250,000 in fines, but probably would serve between 18 and 24 months as outlined under federal sentencing guidelines. No date was set for sentencing.

Heaton has agreed to give the Justice Department information that might be useful in an ongoing investigation that has targeted lobbyists, lawmakers, their aides and members of the Bush administration.

Among other things, Heaton acknowledged accepting trips to New Orleans and Lake George, N.Y., an Adirondack resort village. He also took what Assistant U.S. Attorney James A. Crowell IV and other prosecutors described as thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from a foreign businessman at a casino during a travel stop in London. The unnamed businessman was hoping to sell U.S.-made airplanes and airplane parts in a foreign country.

In exchange, Heaton said he helped Ney insert an amendment into election reform legislation to benefit at least one Indian tribe in Texas that was an Abramoff client. And he lobbied the State Department for a travel visa for the daughter of another Abramoff client in Russia.

Heaton underreported how much the Scotland trip was worth and its purpose on Ney's congressionally required travel disclosure forms. He admitted he helped conceal some of the money Ney received, storing it in a safe in the congressman's office.

He also lied on his own House financial disclosure forms, describing the golf trip as official travel and failing to report gifts Abramoff gave him.

Heaton, a 2000 graduate of the College of William & Mary, declined to comment to reporters as he left Huvelle's courtroom. Before becoming Ney's chief of staff, he was a floor assistant to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and worked for the Committee on House Administration, which Ney once chaired.

Ney was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison in January for trading political favors for golf trips, campaign donations and other gifts in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. Ney was the first congressman charged in the affair.

Ney's Former Chief Of Staff Agrees To Plead Guilty (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich And Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 27, 2007

William Heaton, former chief of staff to then-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit fraud, according to court documents filed yesterday.

Heaton's plea agreement comes just days before the former lawmaker will report to federal prison in West Virginia for corruption charges. Ney is scheduled to enter prison March 1.

According to the plea agreement, Heaton could receive up to five years in jail and a fine of $250,000.

Heaton has become the second member of Ney's staff to be ensnared in the scandal involving imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who bribed Ney and his staff with lavish trips and gifts in return for official favors. Heaton's predecessor, Neil Volz, was sentenced last year for conspiracy charges.

According to court documents, Heaton, who began working for Ney in September 2001 as an executive assistant, rose quickly to the position of chief of staff when his co-conspirator Volz left the position to work for Abramoff in February 2002.

Heaton's involvement in the Abramoff scandal spanned from August 2002 until August 2004, according to the documents.

Over those two years, Heaton accepted numerous favors from Abramoff and other members of his lobbying firm, including a now-infamous all-expense-paid golf trip to Scotland. Heaton was also was one of several recipients of a number of other trips abroad, concert and sporting-event tickets, meals and gambling chips, all taken with full knowledge the gifts were in exchange for official favors from Ney.

During one of those trips, Heaton and another staffer helped Ney conceal $5,000 brought into the country through customs and stored the money in a safe inside Ney's congressional office. Court documents said Heaton "open[ed] the safe as requested so that Ney could make repeated withdrawals."

Heaton knowingly falsified his 2002 and 2003 financial disclosure forms and assisted Ney in misrepresenting his travel disclosure form about the receipt of gifts from Abramoff and others.

"The FBI has made combating public corruption at all levels of government one of its top investigative priorities, because American taxpayers deserve honesty from public officials and employees," said Assistant Director Chip Burrus of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division. "No corrupt public servant is exempt from FBI scrutiny. We will continue to pursue those like Will Heaton who sell their integrity at the public's expense."

Heaton's guilty plea comes well after three other former staffers, Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy and Neil Volz, pled guilty for their roles in the Abramoff scandal.

The case against Ney was first mentioned in Scanlon's indictment. In that filing, prosecutors singled out Ney, mentioned then only as "Representative No. 1," as the target of Scanlon's illegal lobbying, asserting that the lawmaker accepted gifts, including the 2002 golf trip to Scotland and regular meals at Abramoff's restaurant, "in exchange for a series of official acts and influence."

The staffers, however, all appear to be cooperating with prosecutors. The sentencing dates or status conferences for each continue to be postponed, a bad sign for other lawmakers or staffers close to the scandal who could become targets of the probe.

Under a plea bargain entered more than a year ago, Scanlon, Abramoff's business partner and former aide to ex-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), pled guilty to conspiracy to defraud the U.S. After being postponed several times, last week his status conference was reset again for June 5.

Scanlon has agreed to pay back $19.6 million in kickbacks he received from the fees Abramoff charged Indian tribes and faces anywhere between four years and three months to five years and three months in prison.

Volz, a former senior aide to Ney and a lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig, pled guilty to one count of conspiracy in early May last year. In late January, prosecutors agreed to defer his status conference to April 26.

Volz faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. But his sentence could be lessened, depending on how much he cooperates with prosecutors.

Rudy, a former DeLay aide, a colleague of Abramoff's and a lobbyist at Alexander Strategy Group, pled guilty March 31, 2006 to one count of conspiracy. His status conference was originally scheduled for July 11, 2006, but has been postponed several times, most recently in early January. It is now set for April 19.

Rudy could serve a maximum of five years in jail, but his cooperation already has helped to whittle that down to a range of two years to two years and six months.

Former Aide To Ex-Congressman Ney Pleads Guilty In Abramoff Case (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Carol D. Leonnig

A former chief of staff to then-Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty yesterday to corruption charges stemming from accepting gifts, gambling chips and trips -- including an expense-paid junket to Scotland with his boss -- from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a foreign businessman.

The plea agreement by William Heaton revealed for the first time that Ney kept some of his ill-gotten gains -- $5,000 in British pounds -- in a safe in his congressional office. Heaton, who worked for Ney from 2001 until last year, admitted that he helped the congressman stash the money and periodically opened the safe at Ney's request so he could get to the cash, prosecutors said.

Ney, who resigned last year, pleaded guilty and was sentenced last month to 30 months in prison.

Heaton, 28, admitted to conspiring with Ney, Abramoff and others to accept pricey vacations, meals, drinks, golf outings, tickets to entertainment events and contributions to Ney's campaign in exchange for actions by the congressman that benefited Abramoff's clients. None of those clients, including Indian tribes and foreign businessmen, lived in Ohio, the congressman's state.

Along with Ney and others, Heaton went on a now-infamous trip to golf on world-renowned courses in St. Andrews, Scotland, that cost Abramoff $160,000. He also went on junkets to New Orleans and to the Sagamore resort near Lake George, N.Y., with former Ney chief of staff and Abramoff lobbyist Neil G. Volz, who has also pleaded guilty in the bribery scandal.

Heaton, the ninth person to be convicted in the Abramoff investigation, also admitted that he received hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of gambling chips from a foreign businessman who has been identified by Ney's attorney as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling London gambler who sought Ney's help in circumventing a law barring the sale of U.S.-made airplanes and airplane parts to other countries.

A former congressional page who attended the College of William and Mary, Heaton became Ney's chief of staff at age 23, making him the youngest chief of staff on Capitol Hill at the time. Heaton resigned from that position last June as the federal investigation zeroed in on Ney.

Appearing in court before U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle, Heaton said little other than "Yes, your honor" and "No, your honor" in response to questions. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy -- a fraction of the charges he could have faced.

Huvelle told Heaton that he faces a prison term of 18 months to two years under sentencing guidelines outlined in his plea agreement. Justice Department prosecutor John Crowell said the government plans to seek a lesser sentence in exchange for Heaton's cooperation in the investigation.

But the judge warned Heaton that she could give him a tougher sentence, something that she and a magistrate judge have done previously in the Abramoff case. After Ney's guilty plea last month to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements, Huvelle handed down a 30-month sentence, three months longer than prosecutors recommended.

Heaton also admitted falsifying his and Ney's financial disclosure forms in 2002 and 2003 to keep gifts secret. For example, Ney's forms said the Scotland trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research so he could meet with Scottish parliamentarians, though the Scottish Parliament was not in session, and attend a military parade.

Heaton, who had a small group of family members in the audience, surrendered his passport. At his lawyer's request, the judge agreed to let him travel with prior notice to see family in New York and North Carolina pending sentencing.

"No corrupt public servant is exempt from FBI scrutiny," FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus said. "We will continue to pursue those like Will Heaton who sell their integrity at the public's expense."

Also convicted in the scandal were Abramoff, who along with business partner Adam Kidan is in prison for a related fraud case in Florida; Volz, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy; Tony Rudy, a lobbyist and onetime aide to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.); David H. Safavian, a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, who is appealing his conviction for lying about going on the Scotland trip; Michael Scanlon, a former Abramoff business partner and DeLay aide; and Roger G. Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, who was sentenced to two years' probation.

How High-Living Founder Of BetonSports Fell, Fled (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Peter Sanders

Gary Kaplan used to throw lavish parties in Costa Rica and plaster the name of his thriving online gambling company on New York City buses. Now, the 48-year-old founder of BetonSports PLC and the multibillion-dollar industry he helped spawn are in reduced circumstances -- the man on the run, the industry in disarray.

Mr. Kaplan is a fugitive from a racketeering conspiracy and fraud indictment filed last year in a St. Louis federal court charging him with heading a criminal enterprise that illegally took in over $3.5 billion in wagers since 2001.

Several Kaplan colleagues have also been charged, including former BetonSports chief executive David Carruthers, who was arrested at the Dallas-Fort Worth airport in July during a brief stopover on a flight from London to the company's headquarters in San José, Costa Rica. Mr. Carruthers and several others charged in the case have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial. Mr. Kaplan's whereabouts are unknown.

The Kaplan indictment is part of a broader federal crackdown in which several executives from other foreign online gambling operations and credit-card processing companies have been indicted. Last October, Congress passed a law banning almost all forms of online gambling. Recently, the Justice Department served subpoenas for records on investment banks that had helped BetonSports and other online gambling companies raise money through public stock offerings.

Industry observers estimate that online wagering, which had hit about $12 billion annually, is down by as much as 50%. BetonSports has largely closed down operations. Federal authorities estimate that 98% of the company's business came from the U.S.

The saga of BetonSports and Mr. Kaplan demonstrates how some online gambling sites rose fast -- and crashed hard -- by operating at, or beyond, the edge of the law. While Mr. Kaplan has a checkered background that includes run-ins with law enforcement, he may have gotten as far as he did in part by surrounding himself with executives like Mr. Carruthers, who came to BetonSports with a mainstream business background.

Before he was an international online gambling impresario, Mr. Kaplan, a New York native, was a bookie and was busted in 1993 by that state's authorities for running an illegal sports-betting operation, according to his federal indictment. He moved to Florida, where he allegedly continued his bookmaking operation, and then on to Aruba and Antigua before later finally settling in San José. The Costa Rican capital, with light-handed gambling regulation and a ready work force, began attracting other online betting operations.

Mr. Kaplan made a splash. He took over a nine-story office building in a shopping-mall complex and outfitted it with a day-care center for workers' kids as well as luxurious suites and a rooftop pool for visiting high rollers that BetonSports sometimes flew in for huge galas.

BetonSports headquarters also housed a shooting range -- a reflection of Mr. Kaplan's fascination with guns and an obsession with personal security, say people who know him. He, his wife and two children routinely traveled with armed bodyguards.

The bodyguards were, at least in part, "an ego thing," says Kenneth Weitzner, founder of Eye on Gambling, a Web site that tracks Internet gambling. Mr. Kaplan created the illusion that he thought went with a successful gambling operation, says Mr. Weitzner, who visited Mr. Kaplan at his Costa Rican operation. Another acquaintance called Mr. Kaplan "tough and intimidating." In one tale, he supposedly shot a computer monitor after BetonSports lost big on a football game.

As BetonSports grew into one of the biggest online gambling companies, it tried to move mainstream. Mr. Kaplan hired veteran gambling-industry executives, such as Mr. Carruthers, who had worked for Ladbrokes, a major British wagering company. In 2004, BetonSports had an initial public offering in London that raised about $100 million and its stock was listed on a branch of the London Exchange.

While Internet gambling is legal in many countries, the U.S. has long contended that it violated various federal statutes -- even before the specific ban was enacted last fall. Federal officials made periodic efforts to attack online gambling, but the companies often managed to operate relatively freely in the U.S. BetonSports was able to run U.S. marketing campaigns, including ads on 250 New York City buses in 2003.

But even as the industry soared, federal agents were building criminal cases. Some of BetonSports' "customers" in 2002 and 2003 turned out to be undercover investigators gathering evidence that went into last year's indictment.

BetonSports's name has appeared in press reports in connection with a 2005 criminal case filed by New York City prosecutors against an allegedly mob-connected gambling operation that was sending bets to an entity in BetonSports's headquarters building in San José. In those articles, BetonSports officials said that the entity simply leased office space and was evicted after the indictment. BetonSports wasn't charged in the New York case.

Some observers find the government's crackdown on Internet gambling curious, given the national explosion in gambling casinos and lotteries in recent years. These people wonder whether the initiative will backfire by pushing gamblers to less reputable operations.

The recent criminal cases and legislation are " an anti-consumer-protection movement because they're eliminating the most reputable publicly traded companies," says Nelson Rose, a California law professor and gambling-law expert. In recent years, BetonSports and others, including some U.S. casino operators, had lobbied Congress to legalize online gambling, arguing that it could then be regulated and taxed.

As for Mr. Kaplan, he is being sought by U.S. and international law-enforcement officials, including Interpol, whose Web site carries a wanted poster for him. Though his home was in Costa Rica, some believe he has left that country. One rumor has him and his family in Israel, there on an Israeli passport. If he is apprehended or returns voluntarily to the U.S., he will have to answer the pending charges in the St. Louis federal case. If convicted he could face a long prison sentence and large financial penalties.

Prosecutors Ask For 5 Year Max For Professor Cuba Spying Case (AP)

By Adrian Sainz

MIAMI - A college professor who pleaded guilty in a federal case involving allegations that he and his wife spied for Cuba should receive the maximum five years in prison because he did "classic intelligence work" for Fidel Castro's communist government, prosecutors said Monday.

Carlos Alvarez, 61, and his 56-year-old wife Elsa were set to be sentenced Tuesday. Both pleaded guilty Dec. 19 to reduced federal charges in the case involving accusations of exchanging coded messages with Cuban intelligence services about Cuban-American exile groups and prominent figures in Miami.

Carlos Alvarez's lawyers have asked for a sentence of time served, or a sentence which would allow him to serve his time at home. The Florida International University psychology professor has spent one year and about two months at a federal detention facility.

The professor's attorneys argue he was never a Cuban intelligence agent or a supporter of Castro, and that he was trying to open avenues of communication between the two countries.

In Monday's filing, prosecutors argued the Florida International University psychology professor deserves a five-year sentence because the information he relayed was more sensitive than he said. Alvarez has downplayed the importance of the information.

"The reporting done by the Alvarezes contained substantially more than 'harmless gossip,'" Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod wrote. "Rather, the Alvarezes were engaged in classic intelligence work."

Carlos Alvarez pleaded guilty to conspiracy to become an unregistered foreign agent, while his wife admitted knowing about her husband's illegal activities but failing to report them to authorities. Both were charged previously with the more serious charge of acting as illegal Cuban agents.

Elsa Alvarez faces up to three years in prison on the revised charges. The government Monday requested a 21 month sentence for her, but her attorney Jane Moscowitz requested a sentence of no additional jail time. Elsa Alvarez served five months in a federal detention facility before she was released on bond.

A written report cited by prosecutors stated that one of Carlos Alvarez's contacts met personally with Richard Nuccio, then-President Clinton's special adviser to Cuba, in 1996. The report said Nuccio was "very depressed" and "devastated" by the signing of the Helms-Burton Act, which strengthened U.S. sanctions against Cuba.

Steven Chaykin, Carlos Alvarez's attorney, said his client never personally met with Nuccio and there was no proof that he sent the information found in the computer.

In 2005, Carlos Alvarez admitted in FBI interviews to being a "collaborator" with Cuba's intelligence service beginning in 1977, insisting he was mainly interested in opening dialogue with Cuba's government. His attorneys unsuccessfully tried to have that confession thrown out.

But Chaykin said Carlos Alvarez did not think he was disloyal to the United States and was trying to create dialogue concerning the U.S.-Cuba trade embargo and travel restrictions to the island.

"He naively believed the representations of the people with whom he had been in contact on behalf of the Cuban intelligence service that this was something they also were interested in promoting," Chaykin said. "He got ensnared in their web."

Feds Push For Maximum Sentence In Cuba Spy Case (WFOR)

WFOR-TV, February 27, 2007

Prosecutors Want 5 Years In Prison For Carlos Alvarez

(CBS4) MIAMI An FIU professor who pleaded guilty to working for the Castro government as agents may have cut a deal with the Feds, but they don't appear to be ready to give him a break.

Prosecutors are pressing for the maximum jail time for Carlos Alvarez, who pleaded guilty in a federal case involving allegations that he and his wife spied for Cuba. If they get it, that means Alvarez would serve 5 years in federal prison.

Carlos Alvarez's lawyers have asked for a sentence of time served, or a sentence which would allow him to serve his time at home. Alvarez has spent one year and about two months at a federal detention facility.

Alvarez his 56-year-old wife Elsa are to be sentenced tomorrow. Both pleaded guilty about two months ago to reduced federal charges. The case involves accusations of exchanging coded messages with Cuban intelligence services about Cuban-American exile groups and prominent figures in Miami.

The professor's attorneys argue he was never a Cuban intelligence agent or a supporter of Castro, and that he was trying to open avenues of communication between the two countries.

U.S.: Couple Shared Vital Data With Cuba (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, February 27, 2007

Prosecutors said former FIU Professor Carlos Alvarez and his wife, Elsa, went beyond 'harmless gossip' to supply communist Cuba with information about key exiles. They are to be sentenced today.

One-time Florida International University Professor Carlos Alvarez and his wife, Elsa, supplied agents in Fidel Castro's government with classic intelligence information that went far beyond the "harmless gossip" the convicted couple said they gathered on the Cuban exile community, federal prosecutors said Monday.

On the eve of the couple's sentencings today, the U.S. attorney's office disclosed for the first time that the FBI obtained material from one of the Alvarezes' home computers showing that rather than reducing their illicit operation in the mid-1990s, they were still actively contacting the Cuban Intelligence Service.

In court papers filed Monday, a prosecutor argued for tough sentences as he cited "sensitive details" gathered from "slack space" on the Alvarezes' computer showing that Carlos Alvarez prepared written reports on:

• Brothers to the Rescue leader José Basulto, including that "an investigation should continue" into ``the ties he has to the CIA, the Cuban American [National] Foundation and financial interests such as Bacardi."

• A personal contact who had met with Richard Nuccio, then-President Bill Clinton's special advisor for Cuba, who "was very depressed" by Cuba's shoot-down of two Brothers to the Rescue planes killing three Cuban-American men and a Cuban exile and the subsequent Helms-Burton law toughening the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

• Lula Rodriguez, a Miami-Dade Democrat who later became personal assistant to then-Attorney General Janet Reno and eventually deputy assistant secretary of state for public affairs in the Clinton administration.

"Although it was Carlos Alvarez alone who would write and encrypt the reports [on computer disks], the reports would include information gathered by Elsa Alvarez as well," wrote Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod. 'The reports would be signed with the names `David and Deborah,' the code names given to Carlos and Elsa Alvarez by the [Cuban Intelligence Service]."

Axelrod filed the couple's computer information obtained by the FBI under court seal. But he cited sections to bolster his argument that Carlos Alvarez should receive the maximum five-year prison sentence for pleading guilty in December to conspiring to act as an unregistered agent for Cuba's communist government.

Axelrod also cited parts to back his argument that Elsa Alvarez, an FIU counselor on unpaid leave, should receive 21 months' imprisonment for pleading guilty to knowing about her husband's illegal activities and harboring him.

Carlos Alvarez's attorney, Steven Chaykin, called the latest filing ``another example of the government overstating the nature of this case."

DEEP REGRET

"Dr. Alvarez deeply regrets having disclosed information to the Cuban Intelligence Service regarding details of a personal nature about Mr. Maidique in the late 1980s and early 1990s," Chaykin said. ``But at the time, he didn't think the information was of any import or consequences -- he knew Mitch Maidique well and that he was a leader in the Cuban American community, and he was a moderate."

Chaykin said the rest of the information was readily available from newspapers and other public sources, saying Carlos Alvarez's goal was to loosen the U.S. embargo against Cuba. "That was his thinking process, that he could make a difference," Chaykin said.

The Alvarezes' arrest in January 2006 sent shock waves through South Florida's exile community.

"This man has been dealing with sensitive information for years," said Basulto, a founder of Brothers to the Rescue.

"Don't tell me this is research on the exile community," added Basulto, who denied any involvement with the CIA since the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion or any investments in Bacardi. ``This is information used for strategic purposes by the Cuban government."

The Alvarezes averted a difficult jury trial on the more serious, previous charge of being Cuban agents who did not register with the U.S. government, an offense that carried up to 10 years in prison.

Their plea deals were struck after U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore decided to allow a major piece of incriminating evidence at trial -- Carlos Alvarez's "confession" in summer 2005 to the FBI of his collaboration with Cuban intelligence agents, including use of a home computer, encrypted disks and travel to the island. Carlos Alvarez had destroyed much of the information on his hard drive, but not all of it.

30 YEARS AGO

Prosecutors believe Carlos Alvarez began spying for Cuba in 1977 and that Elsa Alvarez became aware of it in 1982.

Chaykin, in court papers, has urged Moore to be lenient, saying Carlos Alvarez should be sentenced to the time he has already served since he was placed in custody in January 2006 in the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami. Alternatively, he recommended that Alvarez serve whatever sentence he receives at his Miami-Dade home.

Chaykin portrayed Alvarez, 61, a longtime FIU psychology professor before his resignation last year, as a naive intellectual trying to manipulate his Cuban handlers to find an alternative to the U.S. embargo that could lead to the end of the Castro government.

"Of course, Carlos Alvarez did not realize until it was too late that it was he that the [Cuban Intelligence Service] was after, not his information," Chaykin wrote. ``It was he who had been manipulated, not the Cubans. Once he realized he was trapped, there was nothing he could do but to do as little as he could get away with, and pray he would not be exposed by the Cuban government for propaganda value."

In an interview, Chaykin said his client's naiveté with the Cuban Intelligence Service also got him into trouble with the FBI when agents interviewed him three times at a local hotel without a lawyer present. The attorney said Alvarez believed that the FBI agents promised ``all he had to do was tell them the truth and they would leave him alone."

The agents said Alvarez's confession amounted to enough evidence to charge him and his 56-year-old wife.

Many Knew Of FBI Probe (MIH)

By Todd Wright

Miami Herald, February 27, 2007

Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about a two-year undercover FBI probe into his department, defying FBI instructions and possibly opening himself to prosecution.

Word of the FBI investigation somehow reached two of the four veteran officers who were the initial targets of the sting, forcing the FBI to prematurely end the probe and arrest the officers who the feds said were involved.

FBI officials said they told Scarberry to tell no one about the investigation after they informed him on Jan. 18.

But Scarberry told Assistant Chiefs Chadwick Wagner and Louis Granteed, Majors James Jones and Frank McGarry, and two captains on the force.

Within seven days, City Manager Cameron Benson and Mayor Mara Giulianti were added to the list of those who "needed to know," Scarberry said.

Scarberry stands by his decision to tell the mayor, city manager and six high-ranking officers on the force about the sting.

He said he was less than thrilled with the idea that more officers in his department might be implicated in wrongdoing, but contends the FBI never told him not to tell anyone else.

"I was supportive of what the FBI wanted to do," said Scarberry, dismissing the notion that the leak came from inside the department. ``Was I somewhat reluctant? Yes, I was. If I didn't want the investigation to go forward, I would have suspended them immediately and shut the thing down."

Veteran officers Kevin Companion, Stephen Harrison and Jeff Courtney were arrested on Thursday and accused of a wide range of crimes, including extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a rigged, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a large load of heroin.

UNDERCOVER AGENT

He made a deal to work as an undercover agent for the FBI about a month ago.

The group was snared in an FBI sting in which agents posed as members of a New York organized crime family needing added protection for its South Florida operations.

Companion, the ringleader, recruited the other three officers to assist the agents.

In addition, he had contact with several other officers, who have yet to be named, FBI officials said.

The city will conduct its own internal investigation to identify the other officers, who likely will be fired, Scarberry said.

Investigators realized that Companion and Courtney had learned of the probe when the two called in sick Monday through Thursday of last week, then began inquiring about their retirement benefits.

The U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on whether any action would be taken against Scarberry.

"This was an undercover operation, which means it was conducted in secret. That's how it works," said Alicia Valle, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. ``. . . We are not going to be pointing fingers at this time. . . . If evidence comes that there was a leak in the city, then we'll pursue it at that time. That's a very serious allegation."

Scarberry said he does not believe information was passed to the officers by anyone he told.

"I seriously doubt any one of them released the information," he said. ``There was nothing to accomplish by doing that."

But FBI agents were furious that someone leaked information before the investigation was complete, a ranking federal law enforcement source said.

Before the case unraveled, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office approached Scarberry about using Simcox in an undercover role to try to snare other Hollywood officers in the scheme.

Scarberry objected, the source said.

"He didn't want to look under any further rocks. He wanted to cauterize it," the source said.

Scarberry denied that.

"We were extremely cooperative," he said.

``Of course I was not happy with [the FBI being] in my department."

JUSTICE OBSTRUCTION

Scarberry's actions could fall under the broad federal guidelines for obstruction of justice, said Martin Jaffe, a Hollywood criminal defense attorney. Jaffe was former chief prosecutor for organized crime and public corruption cases in Broward County for 15 years, before switching sides.

Actions such as telling others information about an undercover operation, leaking information to suspects, leaving out classified documents for people to see or withholding information would all qualify under federal rules.

IMPEDES A PROBE

The rule of thumb is that if your action or inaction impedes a federal investigation, you could face obstruction of justice charges, Jaffe said.

It's usually not a good idea to tell people about an FBI undercover investigation, especially if agents told you not to, Jaffe said.

"From a law enforcement perspective, you would think you'd want to keep the people who know anything to the fewest as possible," he said. ``That way, it's less likely there will be a breach."

Arrests Of Hollywood Officers Jeopardize 61 Criminal Cases They Handled (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum And Ihosvani Rodriguez, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 27, 2007

A former state legislator charged with having sex with a teenager, a man accused in the rape of a 60-year-old woman, and a man who police said molested his 13-year-old stepdaughter are among defendants in 61 pending cases jeopardized by alleged corruption in the Hollywood police department.

The prosecutions, each involving one of four veteran officers charged last week with corruption and drug offenses, are under review by lawyers in the Broward State Attorney's Office, said felony chief Jeff Marcus.

LocalLinks

At the same time, the FBI continued to look into leaks from the Hollywood Police Department that prematurely exposed an undercover investigation of suspected dirty cops. The leaks forced agents to wrap up the sting instead of following up on other leads that could have produced more arrests, according to a federal law enforcement official familiar with the matter.

Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; Officer Stephen Harrison, 46; and Detective Thomas Simcox, 50, are accused of providing services to FBI agents posing as mobsters in exchange for cash, sometimes using official police vehicles and equipment.

Companion, Courtney and Harrix son were arrested Thursday and released on bail. Simcox, who was cooperating with investigators, is expected to surrender Wednesday.

Howard Finkelstein, chief public defender for Broward County, said the scandal's effect on pending criminal cases could be "huge."

"This is as serious as it gets," Finkelstein said. "Cases could very easily fall apart."

He said he would advise his staff to take a close look at current and past cases involving all Hollywood police officers, not just the four charged. "I want to find out about every dirty cop in the city of Hollywood," Finkelstein said.

The four officers were involved in pending felony cases that include child sexual abuse, vehicular homicide, kidnapping and drug charges. Companion and Simcox, who ran the sex-crimes unit for the Hollywood police, handled 45 cases, Marcus said.

"We're going through case-by-case to determine what impact there is," he said.

Perhaps the highest-profile prosecution called into question involves a former state legislator who police say admitted paying for sex with a Hollywood madam and an underage girl.

Barry Kutun, 65, surrendered last year after Hollywood police charged him with two counts of unlawful sexual activity with a minor. He was subsequently fired from his post as North Miami's city attorney.

Kutun's attorney Richard Sharpstein said Simcox was the original lead detective in the Hollywood case, adding it was too early to tell how his involvement would impact Kutun's defense.

Simcox also participated in a case where a good Samaritan chased down a man accused of raping a 60-year-old woman in a Hollywood alley on New Year's Day.

Simcox arrested Juan Moreno, 38, whom the woman identified in front of police, on one count of sexual battery with a weapon, records show. The woman suffered serious injuries, including a deep cut on her neck after her attacker allegedly used a belt to try to strangle her.

Assistant Public Defender Jose Alberto Reyes, who represents Moreno, could not be reached for comment Monday. In the case of the man charged with repeatedly molesting his teenage stepdaughter, it was Companion who took the girl's statement at her Hollywood home in December.

The suspect's attorney, Alex Rivero, said that makes him "raise an eyebrow."

"It's definitely something I have to look into," Rivero said Monday. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel is not publishing his client's name to protect the stepdaughter's privacy.

Alberto Milian, a former Broward state prosecutor, said the officers' arrests would undoubtedly cause headaches for his former office.

"It's going to raise credibility issues every time a police officer, especially a Hollywood police officer, testifies," he said. Dennis Siegel, head of the sex crimes unit of the Broward State Attorney's Office, said lawyers would look for ways to make their cases without relying on testimony from the accused officers.

'Waltz' Sting's Newton Leaves Halfway House (KNOXNS/AP)

By Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 27, 2007

CHATTANOOGA - Former Republican state Rep. Chris Newton of Cleveland has been freed from a federal prison system halfway house where he finished a one-year sentence in the FBI's "Tennessee Waltz" bribery sting.

The Polk County native served 9 1/2 months in a minimum-security prison in Atlanta, then another month at a halfway house in Knoxville. He was released Friday but has remaining community service and two years of probation to serve.

Newton is among five current or former state_lawmakers charged with taking bribes from FBI agents who posed as businessmen seeking legislative favors. Local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga and two "bag men" also were charged in the operation.

Newton, 36, pleaded guilty to extortion and bribery conspiracy and then resigned in the middle of his sixth term in the General Assembly.

He also was fined $10,000 for taking a $1,500 bribe.

After pleading guilty, Newton told reporters he "became caught up in business as usual" at the state Capitol.

The Tennessee Waltz scandal prompted a special session of the Legislature and passage of legislation creating an independent ethics commission for lawmakers. The law also restricts contact that lobbyists can have with lawmakers and caps cash political contributions.

The San Jose Mercury News, February 27, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A woman pleaded guilty Friday to federal mail fraud and money laundering charges for leading a $12 million foreclosure scam that victimized more than 100 Southern California homeowners.

As part of a plea deal Martha Rodriguez, 35, of Downey admitted she led the scheme from May 2003 until November 2005 out of her real estate and escrow agencies, the U.S. attorney's office said.

She faces up to 40 years in prison when she is sentenced August 20. Rodriguez also agreed to forfeit to the government her interest in five homes, a truck and about $900,000 in cash.

According to a federal grand jury indictment, Rodriguez and four others visited homeowners defaulting on their mortgages and offered to stop their foreclosures with short-term loans and refinancing options. But instead of applying for refinancing, the defendants allegedly submitted loan applications to banks under the names of the homeowners.

The five allegedly pocketed the loan money from the banks, which were never repaid. The scammed homeowners, meanwhile, lost their property titles, prosecutors said.

Also indicted were Cynthia Valenzuela, 24, of Downey; Vladimir Stefanovic, 35, of Lancaster; Edward Seung Ok, 40, of Huntington Beach; and Maria G. Juarez, 36, of Diamond Bar.

Valenzuela pleaded guilty Feb. 16 to mail fraud charges. The other three defendants were scheduled to go to trial on July 10.

Technology Aids Credit-card Crooks (MINNST)

By Chris Serres

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 27, 2007

Digital camera technology and account-number software have made it difficult even for experts to spot counterfeit credit cards.

After 20 years as a financial crimes investigator, Joe Guy of the Roseville Police Department was reasonably confident of his ability to detect a counterfeit credit card.

But Guy looked perplexed as he gazed at a fake American Express card confiscated two weeks ago from Ricardo Petit-Homme, a 29-year-old from the New York City borough of Brooklyn, who was charged with stealing more than $22,000 in computer equipment from local Apple stores.

"This card looks so good, it damn near fooled me," Guy said, as he put it under a magnifying glass.

Over the past year, Twin Cities law-enforcement officials and retailers have become troubled by a dramatic jump in the sophistication of counterfeit credit cards, which have been linked to tens of thousands of dollars in thefts at local malls and shopping centers.

U.S. losses from stolen and fraudulent credit cards totaled $3 billion last year, according to the National Retail Federation, a Washington, D.C.-based trade group.

Financial crimes investigators say neither retailers nor credit-card companies are doing enough to stay ahead of the technology used by counterfeiters. It's possible to download computer programs from the Internet that automatically generate thousands of credit-card numbers at a time. These numbers so closely mimic authentic numbers, which are generated by computers using set patterns, that they fool credit-processing machines used at many stores and restaurants.

The fake cards are appearing at a time when credit-card fraud is already on the rise. The Minnesota Financial Crimes Task Force, a state law-enforcement agency that investigates financial crimes, prosecuted 1,900 cases of financial fraud last year, up 70 percent from the previous year. About 80 percent of the cases involved counterfeit credit cards and checks, according to John McCullough, business coordinator for the task force.

The Roseville Police Department and the FBI are investigating an organized ring of 20 people who they say stole goods worth more than $250,000 in local electronics stores, primarily by using stolen credit-card numbers and fake IDs. Investigators believe the group sold much of the stolen merchandise online.

And last February, a 21-year-old named Zhan Biao Zhan went on a buying spree with fake credit cards at Mall of America jewelry stores, buying $12,000 worth of Rolex watches, according to a Bloomington police report. Zhan, who used a fake driver's license with the name Benny Wong, was arrested after he attempted to buy two more Rolex watches from R.F. Moeller Jewelers in Edina.

"It's like the Alamo -- they keep coming over the walls," McCullough said. "We're grossly understaffed to investigate all these cases."

To the naked eye, the eight credit cards confiscated from Petit-Homme look like the real thing. The MasterCards had the slanted letters "MC" next to the expiration date -- a feature normally absent from counterfeit cards. The four-digit bank identification numbers were printed directly below the first four digits on the card; with phony cards, those numbers are often absent or altered somewhat.

They look so real

Even when Roseville police placed the cards under ultraviolet lights, they still seemed authentic. Under the lights, the letters "AMEX" and the bust of a Centurion were visible on the American Express cards -- an effect that is impossible to duplicate without sophisticated technology. The holograms on all the cards also looked real.

The magnetic strips on the cards didn't work, but the account numbers on all of them were valid, so the Apple salespeople made the sales after keying in the numbers. "It's worrisome. Once you jump a hurdle with technology, you never go back," Guy said. "Eventually, these are going to be the benchmark for what we see in the field."

Traditionally, accessing credit-card numbers has been the chief obstacle to producing large numbers of fake cards. But with modern technology, that's no longer as difficult. Using digital cameras, bank tellers and store clerks can photograph the fronts and backs of credit cards surreptitiously. And computer software available on the Internet can generate account numbers using the same algorithms as the credit-card companies.

"It's now possible to buy and sell batches of account numbers," said Mike Hartley, a detective in the property crimes unit of the Bloomington Police Department.

According to a Roseville police report, Petit-Homme managed to steal six computers at three local Apple stores before police nabbed him. Typically such thieves aren't caught, and Petit-Homme probably would have gotten away with it had he been more temperate with his purchases.

An alert employee at the Mall of America Apple store wondered how a man dressed in a worn jacket could afford two laptops and related computer applications. His purchase totaled $6,668.27. The employee called other Apple stores in the area to alert them; when the man bought the exact same merchandise at the Apple store at Rosedale Center, police were called immediately.

After his arrest, police searched Petit-Homme's car and found a printed list of stores and shopping centers. The list included addresses for the Shoppes at Arbor Lakes, the Galleria in Edina, four local Apple stores and several jewelry stores.

Conversations with Petit-Homme led Roseville police to believe that he was acting on behalf of a larger organization based in Brooklyn. He carried a counterfeit New York driver's license with the name Andrew Waters, the same as on the fake cards.

Police aren't sure why he was buying the same computers, but theft rings often buy products in bulk because they've already lined up buyers.

"It's much, much simpler that way," Guy said.

Justices Take Up Police Use Of Lethal Force (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — There was no dispute in the Supreme Court on Monday about the disastrous consequences of a high-speed police chase over the back roads of a rural Georgia county six years ago.

A deputy sheriff caught up with the car that he and other officers were pursuing and, still traveling at high speed, rammed it with his own car, causing an accident that left Victor Harris, the 19-year-old driver, a quadriplegic. Mr. Harris's original offense that set off the chase: driving 73 miles an hour in a 55-mile-an-hour zone. The Coweta County police delivered speeding citations to his hospital room.

The question for the court was whether the forcible termination of the chase had been reasonable under the circumstances, or whether a jury should at least be permitted to consider Mr. Harris's claim that Deputy Sheriff Timothy Scott violated his constitutional rights by unreasonable application of deadly force. At issue were the standards to apply to such a determination.

The United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, based in Atlanta and not known for being overly solicitous toward criminal defendants, ruled in 2005 that Mr. Harris was entitled to take his suit for damages to a jury. The appeals court refused to give Deputy Scott either summary judgment or immunity, basing its ruling on a series of Supreme Court decisions from the 1980s that set boundaries on the use of deadly police force against fleeing criminal suspects.

But the lawyers arguing for the deputy, both Philip W. Savrin of Atlanta and Gregory G. Garre, a deputy solicitor general in the Justice Department, argued that those precedents were not relevant, given the particular danger that Mr. Harris's driving, at speeds of up to 90 miles an hour on dark and winding country roads, had posed to other drivers.

The court's leading precedent, Tennessee v. Garner, from 1985, held that the police had acted unreasonably in shooting an unarmed suspect in the back as he fled from a house he was suspected of burglarizing.

But this case, Scott v. Harris, No. 05-1631, is "fundamentally different from Garner," Mr. Garre said. When the deputy decided to use force, Mr. Garre continued, he "reasonably determined" that Mr. Harris "posed a grave threat to other motorists, the police and any bystanders who might come in his way."

Most justices appeared to agree rather readily, describing their reactions to watching a videotape of the pursuit, made by an automatic camera mounted on the deputy's dashboard, which is part of the record of the case. "He created the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " Justice Antonin Scalia observed. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. told Craig T. Jones, Mr. Harris's lawyer, that his client "created a tremendous risk" to other drivers.

Only Justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg raised the question of whether it would have been more reasonable for the police simply to have abandoned the chase. "If the police weren't after him, there is no indication that he would have been speeding," Justice Ginsburg said.

Justice Stevens raised the issue repeatedly. When Mr. Garre gave a hair-raising description of Mr. Harris's behavior in trying to elude the police, Justice Stevens observed, "Before being chased he hadn't done any of this."

And when Deputy Scott's lawyer, Mr. Savrin, said he had decided to intercept Mr. Harris after concluding that there was "a high likelihood, in fact a probability," that harm would otherwise come to others on the road, Justice Stevens asked, "Would that have been likely if the officer had discontinued the chase?"

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. intervened several times to depict the deputy's behavior as reasonable. "Is it reasonable to suppose that there might be something more going on if the guy is trying this hard to get away from a speeding ticket?" the chief justice asked at one point. Later he suggested that the car might have been stolen or that the deputy could have assumed Mr. Harris was being pursued "for mass murder or terrorism."

With the court seemingly set against him, it was not easy for Mr. Harris's lawyer, Mr. Jones, to get much traction during his 30 minutes at the lectern. His client was "an unsafe driver," he said, but was not an aggressor. Mr. Harris even used his turn signal when he passed other cars, Mr. Jones noted.

That drew a sarcastic response from Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. "He used the turning signal!" Justice Kennedy said, adding, "That's like the strangler who observes the 'no smoking' sign."

For deadly force to be justified under the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable seizure, Mr. Jones persisted, "something more than just unsafe flight" is required. The rule the Supreme Court set 22 years ago in the Garner case to protect fleeing suspects should apply in this setting as well, he said, adding:

"The rule simply says you don't kill him just because he is driving unsafely. And it simply says that if the choice is between killing him and letting him go, you have to let him go if the Garner factors aren't present. And we find nothing in the law and no reason to create a new exception in the law that says that Garner doesn't apply if you're fleeing by vehicle."

Court Ponders Police Chase Liability (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Can a police officer be sued for hitting into a fleeing car during a high-speed chase and causing an accident that leaves the driver badly injured or dead?

The Supreme Court took up that question today in a case from rural Georgia, and the likely answer appeared to be "no."

The case has drawn wide attention because it could set national rules to limit police chases. More than 300 people per year are killed in police chases. Most of the victims are the motorists who tried to flee the police, but a substantial number are innocent bystanders. Each year, several police officers die in such chases.

But during the oral arguments today, most of the justices said they were not inclined to restrict the police from using force when they are pursuing a dangerous speeder.

"We are talking about 90 miles per hour on a two-lane road," said Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., referring to the case before the court.

Six years ago, 19-year-old Victor Harris was paralyzed after losing control of his speeding Cadillac in Coweta County, Ga. He had been clocked going 73 mph on a highway where the speed limit was 55.

When a police officer flashed his blue light, Harris sped away. He was pursued through the parking lot of a small shopping center, where he collided with a police car.

Still undeterred, Harris raced down a dark and winding two-lane road, sped through red lights and swerved back and forth across the lanes to avoid other cars.

"Go ahead and take him out," a police supervisor radioed to Deputy Timothy Scott. Unable to stop Harris safely, Scott rammed into the rear bumper of the Cadillac, causing it to spin. The car careened over an embankment and the accident left Harris a quadriplegic.

That was the "scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " said Justice Antonin Scalia, referring to a police videotape of the chase that was supplied to the court. "It was frightening ... cars coming in the opposite direction, at night, on a two-lane winding road," he said.

Several other justices said they, too, had watched the videotape and agreed with Scalia's description. Harris had "created a substantial risk of serious bodily harm to others. How would a jury find otherwise?" asked Justice David H. Souter.

In his client's defense, Harris' lawyers said the young man had been driving "under control" and used his turn signals when he changed lanes.

"He used the turning signal! That's like the strangler who observes the 'no smoking' sign," interjected Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

Despite the scary scene captured on the police video, Harris won two preliminary victories in the lower courts. He had sued Scott, alleging that the ramming of his car by the deputy amounted to excessive force and therefore violated the 4th Amendment and its ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures."

Lawyers for the police expected this claim would be rejected. Instead, both a federal judge and the U.S. court of appeals in Atlanta said the suit should go before a jury.

More than 20 years ago, the high court had said an officer may not use "deadly force" to stop a fleeing suspect unless he poses a true risk to the public or the police. That ruling arose when a police officer, answering a burglary call, encountered a teenage boy in the backyard and shot him in the back of the head.

Last year, the appeals court in Atlanta said the same rule against the use of "deadly force" should apply in cases involving high-speed chases. If that rule were upheld by the Supreme Court, it could force the police to break off high-speed chases and to let fleeing motorists get away.

But most of the justices said today they leaned in favor of a ruling that says police may use reasonable force to stop a dangerously speeding vehicle.

It will be several months before the justices issue a ruling in the case of Harris vs. Scott.

The Supreme Court relies on precedents and case law, dry recitations of fact and the sometimes bloodless decisions of the courts below it. But in a case involving a now-paralyzed man who instigated a high-speed police chase, most of the justices, as a sportscaster might say, went to the videotape.

And the reviews rolled in.

"He created the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " Justice Antonin Scalia said during yesterday's hour-long oral arguments.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg: "Anyone who has watched that tape has got to come to [the] conclusion, looking at the road and the way that this car was swerving, and the cars coming in the opposite direction . . . this was a situation fraught with danger."

Videotape, in this case taken from cameras inside the police cars, is an unusual piece of the record for Supreme Court justices to weigh, but it is at the heart of Scott v. Harris (05-1631). The tape was not played yesterday, but it appeared that a majority of the justices had watched it.

The case involves Coweta County Deputy Sheriff Timothy Scott's decision in 2001 to end a wild, high-speed chase through dark and wet Georgia highways by finally ramming the back of Victor Harris's Cadillac, sending him down an embankment and flipping his car. Harris, then 19, was left a quadriplegic and has sued, claiming it a violation of his constitutional rights for Scott to take such drastic action.

Scott has countered that his maneuver was reasonable to save others who were endangered by Harris's unlawful driving and that, even if not, he should be granted immunity because it was not clearly established law that his action would violate Harris's Fourth Amendment right to unreasonable seizure.

The case comes amid a backdrop of sensational high-speed police chases that have become a staple of cable television shows, as well as increasing debate about whether it is more dangerous for law enforcement officers to chase and capture wrongdoers than to let them go and hope to arrest them later.

In this case, both a lower court and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit have ruled in favor of Harris. The 11th Circuit said that Scott's actions constituted deadly force, and that it was unreasonable because the officer had no reason to think Harris had done anything more than violate traffic laws. The police gave chase because they clocked him going 73 mph in a 55-mph zone.

"Mr. Harris was simply an unsafe driver," his attorney, Craig T. Jones of Atlanta, told the justices. Jones agreed that Harris should have stopped when officers attempted to pull him over, and that the chase, which lasted six minutes and covered nine miles, involved speeds of more than 90 mph.

But he pointed out that Harris, who Jones has said panicked when police gave chase to him, did not use his car to try to assault other drivers, and that at times he even used his turn signals. That fact did not elicit much sympathy.

"He used the turning signal," repeated Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. "That's like the strangler who observes the no-smoking sign."

Still, Jones argued, Supreme Court precedent holds that police may not use deadly force to stop fleeing suspects unless the suspects threaten the officer with a weapon or there is reason to believe they have committed a serious crime of physical harm or are a threat to do so.

And he said the police pursuit of his client is what created the dangerous conditions.

After Harris had eluded Scott and other officers, Scott told a fellow officer to "let me have him, my car's already tore up." He asked a supervisor for permission to ram Harris's vehicle from the side, which could cause him to spin around and stop. "Go ahead and take him out," the supervisor replied.

But Scott decided he could not make that work, because of the speed at which they were traveling and the road conditions, so he rammed Harris from behind, which sent him careening off the road.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre, who represents the Bush administration's support for Scott, said the deputy sheriff's split-second decision was valid. "When a suspect disobeys a lawful command to stop, races off in a reckless attempt to elude the police, and demonstrates a disregard for his own life and the lives of others in his path, the police may use force, including deadly force, to bring the suspect's vehicle flight to a halt and protect the public safety," he said.

But Jones pointed out that the 11th Circuit had found otherwise, and that the justices' rules for hearing questions of immunity require them to accept the lower court's finding of facts.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said seeing the videotape himself makes that complicated. He said he had been back and forth on the case until he saw the tape. "Am I supposed to pretend I haven't seen that?"

"Well, I think you apply the law, Your Honor," Jones replied.

Breyer said later that he would look at the tape again, but was afraid that "I end up with Chico Marx's old question with respect to the Court of Appeals: Who do you believe -- me or your own eyes?"

High Court Case Could Change Car-chase Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — The nocturnal chase began near Atlanta after a deputy sheriff clocked Victor Harris driving 73 miles per hour in a 55 mph zone and turned on the siren. Harris sped off, weaving past other cars and going through red lights.

He turned into a parking lot, hit the cruiser of another deputy, Timothy Scott, and sped back on the highway. Scott pursued Harris, then slammed into Harris' car to stop him. The car went down an embankment, crashed and left Harris, then 19, a quadriplegic.

In a nationally watched case heard Monday by the Supreme Court, Harris sued Scott for violating his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. He said Scott was wrong to use such an extreme maneuver when Harris' only wrongdoing was speeding.

Harris won in an early stage of his lawsuit in which a lower court said Scott could be held personally liable for Harris' injuries. Scott's lawyer is asking the justices to reverse an appeals court's decision that said Scott lacked grounds to believe Harris posed a threat of serious harm to others.

The high court's decision could broadly affect the rules for police chasing fleeing suspects.

High-speed chases, a staple of TV news, are controversial because they often cause injuries to suspects, innocent bystanders and police officers themselves.

Harris "created the scariest chase I ever saw since The French Connection," Justice Antonin Scalia said Monday, referring to the gritty 1971 cop film set in New York City. Scalia and other justices viewed the dashboard camera videotape of the 2001 chase.

Other justices, too, suggested by their comments that lower-court judges wrongly assessed the risk Harris created.

"This was a situation fraught with danger," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

Scott, and groups siding with him, including 28 states, say that the court should reverse the appeals court and provide more protection from lawsuits for police who injure others in the line of duty. Civil libertarians and defense lawyers stress the need to hold police accountable for extreme tactics.

Philip Savrin, Scott's lawyer, said he acted properly in hitting Harris' car.

"There was a high likelihood that this was going to end in tragedy," Savrin said.

Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Gregory Garre, representing the Justice Department and on Scott's side, said police can use "deadly force" to stop a speeder if he is "a substantial risk" to others.

Craig Jones, Harris' lawyer, argued that if the court applies that standard merely to a person's driving, it would be easier for police to defend using deadly force and "to literally take out anyone who is speeding."

Jones insisted Harris never lost control of the car until it was hit. "He only crossed the center line to pass, and when he passed, he used his turn signal," Jones said.

"That's like the strangler who observes the no-smoking sign," Justice Anthony Kennedy said.

Chase Video Steals Show As High Court Hears Case On Police Force (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 27, 2007

Even at the Supreme Court, a picture -- or in this case, a video -- can be worth a thousand words. Or more.

In the case of Scott v. Harris, which was argued Monday, justices debated whether Coweta County, Ga., sheriff's deputy Timothy Scott used reasonable force in 2001 when he rammed his vehicle into a Cadillac he was pursuing during a high-speed chase. The driver, Victor Harris, who at the time was 19, had been targeted for speeding. Scott's maneuver was intended to end the chase, and it did. Harris' car careened down an embankment, leaving him paralyzed from the neck down. Harris sued, and Scott claimed he had qualified immunity -- which the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals denied him.

The qualified-immunity issue was barely mentioned as lawyers for both sides argued over the standards the high court has used in deciding whether police act reasonably when they use deadly force -- and even whether the standard is relevant to what happened to Harris. But what justices kept coming back to was the video of the six-minute chase, taken by dashboard cameras in the police cars involved. The grainy nighttime video, part of the public record in the case, shows the car reaching 90 miles per hour as it sped by other motorists under pursuit by the police.

The video was not shown in the courtroom, but it was evident that most if not all the justices had seen it -- and been affected by it.

On the film, Scott is heard asking for and getting permission to use PIT, or Precision Intervention Technique -- a method whereby police can end a chase with a maneuver that causes a car to spin out and stop. But because of the high speeds involved, Scott ultimately decided to ram Harris' car directly, causing the car to run off the road. Justice Antonin Scalia called it

"the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection'" as he grilled the lawyer for Harris, Craig Jones of Edmond & Jones in Atlanta. "It's frightening."

And Justice Stephen Breyer, thinking out loud, told Jones he had been "shifting back and forth" as he read the briefs in the case, "and then I looked at the tape."

Quoting from the noted legal scholar Chico Marx -- of Marx Brothers fame -- Breyer later said, again referring to the tape, "Who are you going to believe, me or your own eyes?" The quote is from the classic Marx Brothers' movie "Duck Soup."

Justice Samuel Alito Jr. also said watching the tape led him to think that Harris created "tremendous" risk to other drivers by speeding, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg agreed that the tape showed the situation was "fraught with danger," implying that the officer was acting reasonably in ending the chase however he could.

Jones tried to argue that Harris did not pose an immediate threat to anyone when he was speeding, and even bragged that Harris had "used the turn signal" as he shifted from lane to lane.

For some justices, the video may also have cut against the officer, whose lawyer, Philip Savrin of Freeman Mathis & Gary in Atlanta, argued that the ramming did not amount to the use of deadly force.

Justice David Souter, who had also seen the video, was incredulous as he asked Savrin how the officer could have reasonably believed his actions would not result in death or serious injury.

When Savrin said not all high-speed chases result in injury, Souter said, "Some people are lucky."

Justice John Paul Stevens, who also appeared sympathetic to the target of the chase, kept asking why the officer had not simply stopped chasing the Cadillac -- which, he said, would have resulted in Harris slowing down and being captured by a roadblock or other means down the road.

Scalia came to the officer's defense, arguing that merely ending the chase without stopping Harris might have left Harris free to endanger "the public at large."

The 11th Circuit ruled that "the use of deadly force is not 'reasonable' in a high-speed chase based only on a speeding violation and traffic infractions where there was little, if any, threat to pedestrians or other motorists as the roads were mostly empty and Harris remained in control of his vehicle."

Court Turns Away Appeal By Mohawk Industries (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday refused to rehear a worker immigration lawsuit filed against Mohawk Industries Inc., rejecting a renewed appeal a year after sending it back to lower courts.

The justices last year remanded the lawsuit to a federal court so it could determine whether allegations that the company hired illegal immigrants and suppressed worker wages could proceed as a civil racketeering lawsuit. Last year's action gave the carpet and floor-coverings company a new chance to stop the worker lawsuit, filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations, or RICO, Act. But the Eleventh U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta ruled the lawsuit could proceed against the company.

Mohawk Industries, in its latest appeal, said the Eleventh Circuit ruling amounted to a "cramped misinterpretation" of the legal precedent the Supreme Court asked lower courts to use as guidance in the racketeering suit. "The Eleventh Circuit decision permits plaintiffs to proceed with racketeering suits based upon ordinary business conduct," the company said in its appeal.

Mohawk Industries was sued in January 2004 by a group of current and former hourly workers. The company attempted to get the suit thrown out of a federal court, but first a trial court and then the Eleventh U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the lawsuit could proceed, before the Supreme Court heard the first appeal last year and remanded it based on a decision in another case involving the RICO statute.

That outcome left unanswered a significant legal question presented by the Mohawk Industries appeal on whether corporations, when working with a third-party contractor, meet the definition of an "enterprise" in federal racketeering laws. The case is Mohawk Industries v. Williams.

Court Rejects Iraq Wrongful-Death Case

Also Monday, the high court rejected an appeal from Blackwater Security Consulting LLC, a defense contractor fighting a state wrongful death suit over the 2004 death of four of its employees in Fallujah, Iraq. The workers were killed at a mob scene where they were beaten, set on fire and their remains were mutilated and hung from a bridge. The four men were with a truck convoy headed for U.S. Army Camp Ridgeway in Iraq.

In January 2005, the estates for the four sought damages under North Carolina's wrongful death statute, despite efforts by the defense security contractor to obtain benefits under a special Defense Base Act that provides compensation to the families of individuals killed in a war zone. Blackwater Security attempted to get the state suit dismissed, arguing the federal defense compensation program, administered by the Labor Department, was the families' exclusive remedy. A U.S. District Court and the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., declined to intervene with rulings that let the lawsuit proceed in North Carolina.

Blackwater Security, in its appeal, said the federal court decisions expose "civilian contractors carrying on their Defense Department-mandated operations in hostile territory to the destabilizing reach of 50 state tort systems."

Richard Nordan, the estate administrator for the four, accused Blackwater Security of being discontent with lower court's proper conclusions of the laws. "Simply put, Blackwater requests preferential treatment of its case," Mr. Nordan said. The case is Blackwater Security Consulting v. Nordan.

The court also refused to consider the case of a former Phoenix high school teacher sentenced to 200 years in prison for possessing child pornography. Morton Berger argued that his sentence was grossly disproportionate to his crime, amounting to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The case is Morton Berger v. state of Arizona.

Court Takes Up Election, Education Cases

The court did agree to hear several cases. Justices will consider the constitutionality of a statewide primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party.

The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over its "Top 2" primary system that voters created. The system allows candidates to indicate their party affiliation on the ballot and is open to voters regardless of their party. The system is the successor to the blanket primary that the Supreme Court struck down in 2000 on the grounds that it violated political parties' rights.

The Washington Democratic and Republican parties sued to block the new system, approved by voters in 2004. The parties said they would be forced to be associated with candidates they did not choose. Lower federal courts agreed with the parties. The new system, which has never been used, infringes on the rights of political parties to choose their own nominees, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said.

The court also will consider whether taxpayers must reimburse parents who enrolled their learning-disabled student in private school after deciding public schools were unable to meet the child's needs. New York City's board of education asked the justices to take the case after a federal appeals court said tuition reimbursement is available to the parents under the Individuals With Disabilities Act. The case is Board of Education v. Tom F. on behalf of Gilbert F.

Justices Decline Case On 200-Year Sentence For Man Who Possessed Child Pornography (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — An Arizona man who received a 200-year prison sentence for possessing 20 pornographic images of children failed Monday to persuade the Supreme Court to consider whether the sentence was unconstitutionally excessive.

Arizona law imposes a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for "sexual exploitation of a minor," and it requires that sentences for multiple convictions be served consecutively.

The sentence that the man, Morton R. Berger, received was consequently longer than the sentence any other state would have imposed for a similar offense, a justice of the Arizona Supreme Court wrote in an opinion last year dissenting from that court's decision upholding the 200-year sentence.

A majority of the Arizona Supreme Court declined to examine the aggregate sentence as a whole, instead focusing on the sentence of 10 years for possessing a single pornographic image, which it found was not excessive or disproportionate. It was this aspect of the analysis that Mr. Berger, a 57-year-old former high school teacher, challenged in his appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

"If this court reviews Berger's entire punishment instead of examining the sentence for a single count," the brief said, "it would find Berger's punishment cruel, unusual and unconstitutional."

His appeal said that in most states, sentences for similar crimes would run concurrently, and an offender would serve no more than five years, with the additional possibility of probation or early release. Both are barred under Arizona law. Had the offense been prosecuted under federal law, Mr. Berger's brief said, the federal guidelines would have provided a five-year sentence.

The case, Berger v. Arizona, No. 06-349, has drawn considerable attention in criminal law circles as providing a possible occasion for the justices to take a fresh look at a subject they have treated only sparingly. While fully engaged in reconsidering the respective roles of judges and juries in criminal sentencing, the court has been extremely reluctant to strike down particular sentences as excessive.

Douglas A. Berman, a professor at the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University and an authority on sentencing, also noted the difference in the court's treatment of punitive damages and criminal sentencing.

In an interview on Monday, recalling that the court last week vacated an award of punitive damages against Philip Morris, Professor Berman said, "For a host of good reasons, the justices think they have a role in regulating extreme corporate punishment, but I fear the court doesn't embrace a role in regulating extreme individual punishment." Professor Berman has been writing about the Berger case for months on his blog, Sentencing Law and Policy.

Arizona vigorously opposed Supreme Court review of the sentence, telling the justices that it had been properly based on "overwhelming evidence" of Mr. Berger's "large-scale, deliberate and long-term acquisition of child pornography."

The state's brief said that after Mr. Berger turned down a plea bargain, the prosecutor whittled the case to 20 counts out of fear of "deluging the jury" with highly graphic and disturbing images. The police had found the images in Mr. Berger's possession after learning that his credit card number had been used to buy contraband images from a child pornography Web site based in Dallas.

Primary Elections

The justices agreed to decide the constitutionality of the open primary system adopted in 2004 by Washington State. Under that system, people can vote for any candidate without regard to the party affiliation of the candidate or the voter. Candidates, however, can designate their own party preference on the ballot. The top two vote-getters advance to the general election regardless of party label.

The Republican, Democratic and Libertarian parties in the state challenged the system on the ground that it violated their First Amendment right to freedom of association by depriving them and their members of the ability to control the selection of candidates running under their banner. Two lower courts agreed, on the basis of recent Supreme Court precedents upholding the rights of political parties to control their own affairs.

The justices granted and consolidated two separate appeals, one filed by the state (Washington v. Washington Republican Party, No. 06-730) and one by the Washington State Grange, an organization that advocated for the voter initiative that established the new system (Washington State Grange v. Washington Republican Party, No. 06-713).

Gun Use

In its latest effort to parse a federal law that makes it a crime to “use” a gun in relation to a drug offense, the court agreed to decide whether the receipt of an unloaded firearm as payment for drugs amounted to a prohibited “use.”

The federal appeals courts are divided on this question, which the Supreme Court did not directly resolve in 1995 when it ruled that “use” required “active employment” of the gun, a definition that the court said then included using a gun as an item of barter or commerce even if the gun was never fired.

In the new case, Watson v. United States, No. 06-571, the defendant, Michael A. Watson, acquired a gun from a police informant in return for 24 doses of the drug OxyContin. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, rejected his argument that receipt of a gun under such circumstances did not meet the “active employment” test.

The question occurs often, in various permutations, because a violation of the statute in question carries a mandatory minimum sentence of five years in prison in addition to any underlying offense. More than one in 10 of all federal drug convictions carry an enhanced sentence for use of a firearm.

Supreme Court Declines Polygamy Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

The US Supreme Court Monday declined to consider the appeal by a Utah man with three wives who sought to overturn his bigamy conviction by citing the high court's 2003 landmark ruling on gay rights.

The action lets stand a Utah Supreme Court decision upholding the state's bigamy law even though it clashes with some residents' sincerely held religious beliefs.

"There are literally thousands of religious people in Utah ... who now have to be concerned to look over their shoulder that some day [state Attorney General] Mark Shurtleff and the state of Utah will come after them," says Raymond Berry, one of the lawyers representing polygamist Rodney Holm. The ruling will raise concerns among religious fundamentalists in Utah that the state will step up its pressure against them, he adds. "They are kind of like turtles, they pull their heads in, they stay out of the public eye."

The Holm case offers a glimpse into a world rarely seen by most Americans. There are an estimated 37,000 religious polygamists in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, South Dakota, and Utah.

Mr. Holm's lawyers hoped to use the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling on gay rights as a means to challenge state laws against multiple marriage.

In that landmark case, called Lawrence v. Texas, the court invalidated Texas' sodomy law, ruling that gay adult Texans, like all other adults, were entitled to intimate relations without government interference. In a fiery dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia warned that the court's rejection of moral disapproval as a foundation for certain laws would open the door to legal challenges to state statutes banning same-sex marriage, prostitution, and bigamy, among others.

A key legal question is how broadly Lawrence v. Texas should be read. Most judges have interpreted that case narrowly. But within five months of the Lawrence decision, the Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts announced a constitutional right in that state to gay marriage.

Lawyers for Holm were hopeful that a majority of justices would see his case as an opportunity to extend the holding in Lawrence v. Texas to protect polygamist relationships from state prosecution in cases where all the parties were aware of and approved of the practice.

There has been no shortage of other challenges as per Justice Scalia's warning, but the high court has so far avoided revisiting the 2003 landmark. In declining to take Holm's case, the justices offered no explanation.

Holm is a member of a religious group that practices polygamy as a tenet of their faith.

"They are the philosophical, and often biological, descendants of early Mormons who refused to compromise their religious principles in the face of the most extreme form of coercion," wrote Holm's other lawyer, Rodney Parker of Salt Lake City, in his petition to the court.

Although polygamy was once accepted, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints banned the practice in 1890.

The issue arose recently on the presidential campaign trail with the Associated Press reporting over the weekend that Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney had a great-grandfather who had five wives and a great-great-grandfather with 12 wives.

Mr. Romney, a Mormon, says he is opposed to polygamy. He has been married for 37 years to his high school sweetheart. But prejudice against Mormons might hurt Romney's chances in a run for the White House, some analysts say.

The Holm case arrived at the Supreme Court after the Utah resident was convicted of violating the state's bigamy law and of having unlawful sexual contact with a minor. Holm was charged after his third wife – then age 16 – moved into his house with his two other wives and children following an unlicensed religious marriage ceremony.

The third wife was the younger sister of Holm's first wife.

Holm believes his religious faith requires that he have more than one wife. He and his wives are members of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, a spinoff sect with no connection to the Mormon Church.

At issue in his case was whether state prosecutors violated his constitutional right to practice his religion and maintain an intimate family relationship without intrusive government interference.

In Lawrence v. Texas, the high court declared that a state sodomy law treated gay Texans as second-class citizens. Holm's lawyers told the high court that Utah's polygamy statute does the same for certain religious fundamentalists.

In urging the high court not to take the case, Assistant Attorney General Laura Dupaix said the protections established in Lawrence v. Texas only apply to relationships between consenting adults.

"This case does not involve consenting adults," she wrote. "It involves an arranged polygamous and sexual relationship between a 32-year-old adult and his 16-year-old sister-in-law, who conceived two of his children before her 18th birthday."

In contrast, Mr. Parker said Utah's bigamy law applies a double standard that targets and punishes religious fundamentalists but allows others to engage in the same conduct and escape criminal punishment.

"Widespread popular departure from traditional marriage practices has made the anti-polygamy laws, like laws against cohabitation, adultery, and fornication, anachronistic," Parker wrote. "These laws are not enforced against those practicing contemporary lifestyles, but are asserted as weapons, as in this case, against those living a traditional, family-grounded, religious-based life."

He added, "In gross absurdity..., one can behave in the same way in two circumstances but in one (polygamy) the action is illegal, and in the other (promiscuity) the action is ignored by the law. One can do legally the same act with immoral or amoral intent and have it be legal. Yet the same act with religious intent is deemed illegal."

Local Law Enforcement Says Crime Fighting Here Needs Federal Money (SEATIMES)

By Christine Clarridge, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 27, 2007

In a meeting with local law enforcement leaders this morning, U.S. Sen. Maria Cantwell listened to a lot of people -- including Seattle's police chief, the King County sheriff, city officials, federal agents and a few community leaders -- talk about the area's crime problems and what it will take to fix them.

Mostly, the law enforcement officials said, keep federal funding for local law enforcement.

"Gang membership, gang crime, and gang violence is surging in our state," said Cantwell. "Our local law enforcement is doing great work meeting this threat head on, but they need federal support."

Cantwell called for the community meeting to hear firsthand about the region's recent rise in gang violence, according to her media representative.

Cantwell, who's hosting several meetings around the state with law enforcement leaders, last month introduced new anti-gang legislation that seeks to provide additional tools to law enforcement officers and prosecutors.

The top brass of the local FBI, DEA and ATF branches said the state has an increasing drug problem, due in part to the ease with which it moves up and down the Interstate-5 corridor.

Several people, including Executive Director Tony Orange of the Central Area Motivation Program and James Kelly of the Urban League said jobs and internships and treatment programs help keep at-risk youth and prior offenders out of prisons and jails.

Stella Chao, of the Seattle Department of Neighborhoods, talked of Seattle's efforts to reduce crime in the South Park area with a comprehensive program that addresses school drop-out rates, crime, unemployment, recreational opportunities and mentorships.

King County Sheriff Sue Rahr talked about the need for increased database information and police intelligence so that officers can spend their time efficiently looking for offenders and not "just shaking down kids on street corners."

Cantwell also discussed other federal initiatives to help local law enforcement combat gangs and gang-related crime.

The president's most recent budget proposal undercuts federal support for local law enforcement, she said in a news release.

Ex-CIA Official Urges Silence After Spy 'Sting' (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

A former high-ranking CIA official refused FBI appeals for help in tracking Chinese spies and urged others via e-mail not to cooperate because of the recent prosecution of former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst Ron Montaperto.

Robert G. Sutter, a former national intelligence officer for East Asia and holder of a security clearance, told a mailing list of current and former government officials that a 2003 FBI "sting" operation against Montaperto, who was convicted in June of mishandling classified documents, raised fears that he and other officials could be damaged for discussing their contacts with Chinese officials.

The FBI and other U.S. counterintelligence agencies are stepping up efforts, including outreach to academics, to counter Chinese intelligence efforts after a string of damaging spy cases over the past five years, U.S. officials said.

Mr. Sutter, a Georgetown University professor, stated in the e-mail sent two weeks ago that he had met then with two "relatively young" FBI agents who asked for his help "regarding activities of Chinese officials that I judged might be deemed matters of espionage."

"They also seemed to want and need some educating on policies and priorities of the Chinese administration, and the state of play in U.S.-Chinese relations," he stated.

Mr. Sutter has specialized in Asian affairs for 33 years at CIA, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress and State Department intelligence bureau. He did not return telephone calls or e-mails seeking comment.

FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment on the FBI's outreach on Chinese intelligence, but she said generally "we do contact a number of people ... to better know our domain."

Mr. Sutter's e-mail was sent to an exclusive list of some 30 current and former officials, including Lonnie Henley, acting national intelligence officer for East Asia, and Dennis Wilder, White House National Security Council staff Asia director.

The Washington Times obtained a copy of the e-mail from a member of the group.

Mr. Sutter stated that his recent meeting with FBI agents was similar to debriefings in the 1970s and 1980s, when he volunteered to share intelligence on meetings with European and Chinese officials.

"My reaction this time was very different than my reaction in the 1970s and 1980s," he stated. "I still have a security clearance, but this time I said almost nothing about China."

"What I did talk about was the credibility of the FBI " Mr. Sutter said. "I referred at some length to the Ron Montaperto 'sting.' I told the agents that while they seemed like nice people, and I tried to be cooperative with the U.S. government, I could not trust them or have any assurance that they would not use any information I provided in some way that would hurt me or others."

Mr. Sutter wrote that the agents then told him that they were "well-versed" on the Montaperto case and said that "the Montaperto sting had indeed closed doors and cut off contacts for the FBI."

"They went on at some length that the sting had seriously damaged the FBI's ability to tap U.S. expertise as it sought to deal with Chinese espionage," Mr. Sutter's e-mail said.

Montaperto in 2003 disclosed to the FBI and Navy counterintelligence agents during a sting operation that he provided both "secret" and "top secret" intelligence to two Chinese intelligence officers during more than 60 meetings, according to court documents in the case. He pleaded guilty to lesser charges of illegally retaining classified documents, but he admitted as part of a plea bargain to passing the secrets to Chinese intelligence.

The prosecution was a setback for a network of pro-China specialists in government and academia who have sought to play down China's growing military capabilities and intelligence operations in a coordinated effort they claim is aimed at improving U.S. ties to China.

Mr. Sutter said he wrote the e-mail as a warning to other China specialists, implying that they too should refuse to help the FBI.

"I pass along this account because I believe others will be contacted -- the two agents that talked to me said that the FBI is trying to broaden its contacts among China specialists," Mr. Sutter said.

Former U.S. intelligence officials and academics in the past privately supported U.S. government counterintelligence efforts, and Mr. Sutter's refusal to help is a sign that the FBI is lacking in its expertise and knowledge about Chinese spying.

Chinese agents are "extremely comfortable working in ambiguous situations, [like] 'I help you, you help me,' " Mr. Moore said.

China has successfully "wormed" classified information out of U.S. nuclear-weapons scientists in meetings in China by showing them secret Chinese designs for warheads and then asking if the United States uses similar designs, he said.

"By saying 'no,' a scientist is revealing classified information," Mr. Moore said, and thus risks later prosecution when reporting the encounters.

"Smart people then wonder if they talk to these [FBI] guys they might slice and dice what is said and send it over to the Justice Department for an espionage prosecution," he said. "When you're dealing with counterespionage, it will suck you in."

More Counterfeit Money Changed Hands In '06 (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

WASHINGTON — The amount of counterfeit money being accepted by consumers and stores in the USA is climbing as crooks are increasingly using inexpensive home computers and printers to produce phony money.

About $62 million entered circulation that was later deemed fake in the 2006 fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30. That represents a more than 10% increase from the prior year and a 69% rise from just three years earlier, according to the latest data from the Secret Service obtained by USA TODAY.

Terry Tilka says he sees fake bills about once a week at Rock Island Brewing, a restaurant/bar he owns in Rock Island, Ill., as well as at a dance club he owns. "It's been worse in the last three or four years than I have ever seen in my 33 years of business," he says.

There has been a noticeable rise in counterfeiting in the past eight months in Pasco County, Fla., says Sgt. Bill Moltzan of the sheriff's office economic crimes unit there.

The crooks are bold. One person who was arrested charged people, including an undercover agent, for a counterfeiting how-to class. One man was arrested after dancers in a strip club realized he was passing out fake bills and called police while the bouncer held the man. A 62-year-old woman known as Grandma was caught this month trying to sell fake money at less than face value.

"Technology is making it easier for the people trying to do this on their own," Moltzan says.

Despite the rise, the amount of fake money in circulation is a fraction of 1% of genuine currency, Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren says. The fact the money was caught suggests security features that have been added starting in 2003, such as colors and watermarks, make it easier to detect fakes, says Dennis Forgue, head of currency at Harlan J. Berk in Chicago.

The increase in currency caught should be seen "not necessarily as a sign of defeat, but as a sign of success," he says.

But Zahren says the ease of using home computers to make the money has added challenges to catching counterfeiters.

About 54% of the counterfeit currency collected in fiscal 2006 was made using digital technology vs. so-called offset printing, which involves more skill, time and expense. In 1996, only 1% of counterfeits were digitally produced, according to the Secret Service.

The government has been updating U.S. bills to try to thwart counterfeiters. In 2003, the $20 bill, the most frequently counterfeited currency in the USA, was the first to feature a color other than green. Other features such as a watermark and color-shifting ink also were added.

Since then, new $10 bills and $50 bills have entered circulation. This year, a new $5 bill will be introduced.

Probe Sought Of Collins & Aikman Fees (AP)

Bankruptcy Trustee Wants Probe of $100M Plus in Collins & Aikman Professional Fees

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Justice Department is backing a call by a big creditor of Collins & Aikman Corp. to appoint an examiner to look into more than $100 million in fees charged by professionals in its bankruptcy case.

U.S. Trustee Saul Eisen, a Justice Department employee, said Collins & Aikman investor Third Avenue Value Fund had made "troubling allegations that merit an independent investigation," according to court papers filed Friday.

In December, Third Avenue asked for an examiner to look into the fees charged by Collins & Aikman's lawyers and advisers after the company abandoned its plan to reorganize. Third Avenue, which is owed $250 million from the auto supplier, argues the bankruptcy professionals should have cut their hours as soon as it was apparent the company would liquidate.

The trustee says Third Avenue's allegations merit an independent investigation and that the examiner should pay particular attention to decisions made by turnaround firm Kroll Zolfo Cooper LLC, which advised Collins & Aikman during its Chapter 11 case.

The Michigan automotive-parts maker has said the appointment of a fee examiner is unnecessary at this late stage in its bankruptcy case -- Collins & Aikman is about to be broken up and sold -- and would unfairly burden it with additional costs and fees.

Rather, Collins & Aikman wants a committee, which would include a company representative, to look into the professionals' fees. But a committee wouldn't have the same authority as an independent examiner.

Third Avenue, Collins & Aikman's largest creditor, resigned from the company's creditors committee in the fall, claiming the panel's bankruptcy advisers were racking up fees on "auto pilot" even while the company's reorganization strategy was failing.

The committee, however, has sided with Collins & Aikman, arguing that the examiner would simply add another layer of fees and expenses to the company's bankruptcy estate.

When he approved the last round of fees in Collins & Aikman's case two months ago, Bankruptcy Judge Steven W. Rhodes asked the company and its creditors to submit opinions about the need for an examiner. Rhodes will consider the request for an examiner at a hearing scheduled for March 12.

Collins & Aikman filed for Chapter 11 in May 2005 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Detroit amid production cutbacks by the biggest U.S. auto manufacturers and protection and allegations of fraud by investors who claimed they had been misled about the company's financial condition. But after 18 months in Chapter 11, the Southfield, Mich., company pulled the plug on its strategy and said it would sell its assets rather than emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone entity.

WASHINGTON (AP) _ The Supreme Court on Monday agreed to consider whether taxpayers must reimburse parents who enrolled their learning-disabled student in private school after deciding public schools were unable to meet the child's needs.

New York City's education department asked the justices to take the case after a federal appeals court said tuition reimbursement is available to the parents under the Individuals With Disabilities Act.

Lawyers for the boy's parents said the special education program proposed by the public school system was inadequate to meet the child's needs, prompting them to send him to a private school. The parents say that under federal law, they may challenge inappropriate proposals and obtain reimbursement for the costs of placement in private school.

The child is identified in court papers only as Gilbert F.

The case is Board of Education v. Tom F. on behalf of Gilbert F., 06-637.

High Court To Hear Case For Autistic Boy (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Jeff and Sandee Winkelman don't have the money to pay for private schooling for their autistic son, let alone hire a lawyer to sue their public school district.

The Winkelmans want the Supreme Court to rule that the main federal special education law gives them the right to go before a federal court to argue that taxpayers should pay for 9-year-old Jacob's private school, even though neither parent is a lawyer.

The case is before the court Tuesday, when the Winkelmans will be represented free of charge by a private lawyer.

Whether Jacob should have private schooling at public expense is not before the Supreme Court, only his parents' right to go into federal court without a lawyer.

The parents objected to the Parma, Ohio, public schools' plan to educate Jacob at a public school. They wanted the district to pay for his $56,000 yearly enrollment in a private school that specializes in educating autistic children.

The Individuals With Disabilities in Education Act gives every child the right to a free appropriate public education, which in the case of special needs children sometimes means enrollment in a private facility.

Parents unhappy with a district's plan can appeal the decision through an administrative process. If they remain dissatisfied, they can file a civil lawsuit.

At that point, however, they have to find a lawyer, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in the Winkelmans' case. People who are not lawyers can represent themselves in court proceedings, but not other parties. The appeals court said the law requires the child to be the plaintiff.

The Winkelmans also are asking the Supreme Court to decide that they can file their own lawsuit under IDEA because they are responsible for Jacob, financially and otherwise.

Most parents who want to sue over special education decisions can't afford a lawyer, according to a brief filed by the Autism Society of America and related rights groups.

The Bush administration and 12 Democratic lawmakers, including Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, have sided with the Winkelmans. They argue that Congress clearly intended the special education law to allow parents to go into court without a lawyer's help.

"Congress recognized the interests of parents in guiding the course and substance of their child's education," the Democrats' legal brief said.

In response, the school district said Congress declined in its most recent amendments to the special education law to allow the kind of representation the Winkelmans are seeking. A provision that passed the Senate said, "A parent of a child with a disability may represent the child in any action ... without the assistance of an attorney." But the language dropped out of the legislation before it became law.

The Winkelmans have spent about $30,000 in legal fees since first contesting Jacob's treatment in 2003. Jeff Winkelman has taken a second job while his wife has researched previous court rulings and written her own filings.

Center Helps FBI With List Of Potential Victims Of Racial Violence (AP)

By Chris Talbott

AP, February 27, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - George Love was killed in a 1958 Mississippi Delta gun battle with police who believed he was involved in a murder - one year later he was cleared of the allegation.

Jimmie Lee Griffin was killed in a hit-and-run accident in 1965. A coroner's report showed the Sturgis resident was run over at least twice.

Hubert Orsby's body was found in the Black River near Canton. He wore a shirt with "CORE," the acronym for the Congress of Racial Equality, on it.

Their deaths are among 74 in 11 states the Southern Poverty Law Center says could be racially motivated killings of black men and women between 1952 and 1968.

The center, which reports on hate crimes, has forwarded the list to the FBI and the Justice Department is expected to hold a press conference Tuesday to talk about a new database of old civil rights era cases that now could be investigated.

Center officials believe the list can be helpful in future investigations.

"In each case there was significant evidence that the death may have been a racial murder," said Mark Potok, director of the center's Intelligence Project.

Researchers at the Montgomery, Ala.-based center can't prove the people on their list - which includes 32 Mississippi cases - were killed because of their race. But they believe each is worth investigation.

Researchers developed the list in the late 1980s while identifying 40 victims of racially motivated killings whose names were etched in a memorial. Those names were also included in the book, "Free at Last: A History of the Civil Rights Movement and Those Who Died in the Struggle."

"We did a lot of research on these names and we're very hopeful that this information will be helpful to the FBI and particularly that it will be helpful to the families of those who were murdered."

In addition to potential Mississippi victims, the list includes deaths in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York.

The list covers an era of extreme tension and violence across the South as federal authorities tried to force recalcitrant segregationists to integrate schools under the Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kan., ruling in 1954.

Violence against blacks and the whites who hoped to help better their lives spiked, peaking during the so-called Civil Rights summer of 1964.

"Before 1954 there was somewhat of a thaw" in race relations in Mississippi, said DePauw University historian John Dittmer, whose book, "Local People," chronicles the time.

"You had a more enlightened Legislature ... and more blacks registering to vote in some places. There were even black police in one or two cities patrolling black areas. But the Brown decision changed all that."

Many of the people identified by the center allegedly died at the hands of law enforcement officers. If charged, whites were often exonerated by sympathetic juries.

The center's researchers wrote this of Woodrow Wilson Daniels' 1958 killing in Water Valley: "Sheriff Buster Treloar, identified by four witnesses as the man who beat Daniels to death in a prison, was freed after 23 minutes of deliberation by an all-white jury. "By God," Treloar said after the trial, "now I can get back to rounding up bootleggers and damn niggers."

Many things have changed about Mississippi in the decades that have passed since that era of violence, including a large number of black elected officials. But Sheriff Reginald L. Jackson of Wilkinson County, where one of the victims on the list was killed, said times in his county of 11,000 people have changed little in 40 years.

"Rich, poor, black or white or other race, it doesn't make any difference in my opinion," said the 49-year-old Jackson, who is among a handful of black sheriffs in Mississippi. "But yet we still have some segregation problems and things have not changed a whole lot.

"Within Wilkinson County as a whole, you can see we're still operating pretty much under the old standard."

CINCINNATI - The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday sued a landlord, accusing him of a pattern of sexual harassment against female tenants over the past nine years.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court here accuses James G. Mitchell, of Cincinnati, of making sexual comments, touching women sexually without permission, entering their apartments without permission or notice, and denying housing on the basis of gender. It also said he retaliated against women who rejected his advances.

It lists at least 53 properties Mitchell owns, some of which have more than one unit. Most are in Cincinnati, with a handful in Fairfield, Hamilton and West Chester.

The lawsuit seeks a court finding that Mitchell has violated the Fair Housing Act, an order forbidding future discrimination and unspecified monetary damages for any woman harassed.

"No woman should be subjected to sexual harassment in her home," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the justice department's Civil Rights Division, in a news release.

Boca Zoning Ordinance For Sober Houses Is Discriminatory, Judge Rules (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, Sun-Sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 27, 2007

A judge ruled Monday that a Boca Raton ordinance that bans so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods is discriminatory and violates the federal Fair Housing Act.

The ruling from U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks came in a lawsuit filed by Steve Manko, who operates two apartment buildings - Boca House for men and Awakenings for women - and several homes for recovering alcohol and drug addicts.

LocalLinks

Attorneys for Manko and several former Boca House residents said the ruling was victory for recovering addicts, who are considered handicapped and are entitled to housing protections under federal law, but the judge's decision also favored the city in some aspects of the complex litigation.

"It's a good ruling in that the judge found the city violated the Fair Housing Act. It's not a complete victory, but the judge said at the end of trial it was not going to be a complete victory, but it is a victory," said Manko's attorney, William Hill. "The city violates the Fair Housing Act - that should be the headline from this ruling. We've said that all along. They should not have passed this ordinance."

In May 2002, the City Council passed an ordinance that would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels. The ordinance was never enforced because of the threat of litigation.

Manko filed suit in 2003, and in September the U.S. Department of Justice also filed suit against the city alleging the ordinance was discriminatory. That case is still pending.

"It is a win for us," said Jim Green, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union who represented several former residents of Boca House when the case went to trial last month.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the ruling was a mixed one - while the judge struck down parts of the city's ordinances, he upheld other parts, including a provision that the city can require that state-licensed facilities be in commercial districts. None of Manko's operations are required to be licensed by the state, his attorney said.

The city maintained that Manko's sober houses are commercial and medical operations - involving on-site drug testing, counseling and other services - that are inappropriate for a residential neighborhood. In his ruling, the judge said he had problems with some of the commercial aspects of Manko's operation, which currently help nearly 400 people.

Cole said he was pleased the judge found that the city had not intentionally discriminated against addicts, and that the city has an interest in protecting the residential character of its neighborhoods.

"We are happy the judge is sympathetic to our position," Cole said. "He did not find that we intentionally discriminated." Mayor Steven Abrams said Monday he did not know how if the council would pursue changes to the sober-house ordinance to make it enforceable or just drop the issue.

"The council hasn't discussed it. I just don't know at this point. We need advice from our lawyers on that," he said.

The judge also ruled that another city ordinance, which prevents more than three unrelated people from living together, can't be enforced until the city establishes a process that complies with federal law for making exceptions. Cole said the city has such a process, but it is not spelled out in city code.

The judge's ruling will allow the city to enforce the three-person limitation in the apartment building units, Cole said.

Manko's attorney asked the judge to award about $925,000 to Manko for lost profits, but the judge said during the trial that was a tenuous claim. The judge awarded nominal damages of $1 to each plaintiff.

Judge: Law Discriminates Against Disabled (AP)

By Associated Press

BOCA RATON — A city zoning ordinance discriminates against disabled people and violates the federal Fair Housing Act, a judge ruled Monday.

The complaint was filed by the U.S. Justice Department and Steve Manko, who operates two apartment buildings and several homes for recovering alcohol and drug addicts. The lawsuit alleged that the ordinance excluded housing recovering drug and alcohol addicts in residential areas and imposes “conditions and prohibitions on housing for persons with disabilities that are not imposed on housing for an equal or greater number of persons without disabilities.”

Attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union and Manko called the ruling a good one, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

“The city violates the Fair Housing Act — that should be the headline from this ruling. We’ve said that all along. They should not have passed this ordinance,” said Manko’s attorney William Hill.

U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks also ruled Monday that the city can require that state-licensed facilities be in commercial districts. The city claimed that Manko’s buildings are commercial and medical operations, which involve onsite drug testing, counseling and other services. Manko’s operations are not required to be licensed by the state, Manko’s attorney said.

Manko was seeking about $925,000 for lost profits. The judge awarded him $1.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the ruling proved city officials did not intentionally discriminate.

Mayor Steven Abrams said Monday that he did not know how if the council would pursue changes to the ordinance to make it enforceable or just drop the issue.

“The council hasn’t discussed it. I just don’t know at this point. We need advice from our lawyers on that,” he said.

NY Village Wants To Keep Voting System, Let Hispanic Power Evolve (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. -- A suburban village that is nearly half Hispanic but is governed mainly by whites asked a federal judge on Monday to let its politics evolve naturally rather than cancel elections and impose a new voting system to give Latinos a greater voice.

Anthony Piscionere, attorney for Port Chester, said "an organic and natural system is beginning to take hold" to the benefit of Hispanics. Cutting the village into districts to increase the chances of Hispanic representation, as the Department of Justice has asked, "would be officially segregating the Village of Port Chester forever," he said.

Piscionere spoke in federal court in White Plains during closing arguments on the government's request for an injunction against village trustee elections scheduled for March 20. The Department of Justice claims that the village's at-large method of electing trustees is unfair to Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act, which the village denies.

The Voting Rights Act is often used to oppose at-large voting. In the 1990s, actor Ossie Davis and other black activists went to court to challenge New Rochelle's at-large City Council elections, and the city eventually approved a referendum that changed the system.

Soon after that, a federal judge found that Hempstead's at-large town board system "invidiously excluded blacks from effective participation in the town's political life" and ordered six districts drawn up.

"It's a powerful act," said lawyer Randolph McLaughlin, who was involved with both those cases. It's been used "countless times around the country" by the government and individuals to battle at-large voting, he said.

In Port Chester, which has about 28,000 residents, according to the 2000 census, the government is seeking to delay the election until the village accepts or the judge imposes a district system that would include one sector in which a Hispanic candidate could be expected to win.

Port Chester is about 25 miles from New York City, on the Connecticut border in Westchester County. It is governed by a mayor and six trustees. The trustees' three-year terms are staggered so that two are elected each year to represent the entire village.

Regardless of how Judge Stephen Robinson rules on whether the election should be delayed, he plans to hold a separate trial on the main issue _ whether the system discriminates against Hispanics.

Most of the issues that are likely to be argued at the main trial came up during the injunction case, as population experts, political leaders and would-be candidates testified.

Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic who lost a race for trustee in 2001, said Democratic leaders turned against him when he began to promote issues that were important to Latinos. They gave him "the cold shoulder" and did not invite him to the Election Night reception, he testified.

A current Hispanic Republican candidate, the Rev. Ariel Acosta, said that during a meeting about the election districts, he heard hecklers shout "Latinos don't belong here" and "Latinos, go back home."

Piscionere and Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy agreed that no Hispanic has ever been elected to the six-member Board of Trustees, but they differed on the success rate of candidates favored by Hispanics.

The government's demographics expert said a six-district system could be drawn in which Hispanics would be 70 percent of the citizen voting-age population in one sector. Piscionere said that didn't necessarily mean a Hispanic would be elected, since Hispanic registration and turnout rates were low.

And if it didn't work, he said, it would be "a Pyrrhic victory."

The village attorney also contended there was no evidence that village voters were "driven by racial bias," and the judge seemed to agree, saying he does not believe "that this system has been put in place or has been maintained for the purpose of diluting the Hispanic vote." But it may have that effect, he added, and he challenged Piscionere's claim that Hispanics have had as much opportunity as anyone else to get involved.

Kennedy said, "Whatever reason this system was put into place, it's broken."

He said that while Piscionere contended Hispanics were poised to take greater political power in the village, what they are really poised for is "to be locked out of the political process for many years to come."

Task Force Report A `step Forward' In Fighting Human Trafficking (AP)

By Jon Sarche, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

DENVER — Like domestic violence 30 years ago, human trafficking is poorly understood and hard to identify, but a new task force report represents a "major step forward" in combating the emerging problem, officials said Monday.

The report, to be delivered to the Legislature on Tuesday, said federal grants and new programs are helping law enforcement officers identify victims, and helping victim advocates learn new methods to help them.

"These people (traffickers) go to the most desolated, desperate areas where families will actually sell children to people they trust," said Rep. Alice Borodkin, D-Denver, who sponsored the 2005 bill that created the task force.

"Then when they come in (to the United States), these people are coerced, broken and they're terrified of any law enforcement. They don't know they can't walk out the door," she said.

The report said authorities in Colorado know of about 30 cases of human trafficking — exploitation of people through force, threats or deception — since 2005. But it also said federal authorities estimate that only 1 percent of victims in the United States have been identified and provided assistance.

State lawmakers have taken initial steps in fighting human trafficking, but the task force was created to help provide guidance to further efforts.

Last year, lawmakers approved a bill to make it a felony to smuggle humans — a crime authorities said can often lead to human trafficking, which was made a felony in separate legislation approved last year.

Another bill gave the Colorado State Patrol about $1.5 million to train up to 24 troopers in working with illegal immigrants to boost enforcement against human smuggling and trafficking. Nineteen troopers volunteered to begin that training next month, said patrol spokesman Sgt. Jeff Goodwin.

Officials said helping train law enforcement officers to recognize victims of human trafficking will be critical. It can be difficult for a police officer to determine whether a woman suspected of prostitution, for example, has been forced into prostitution by people keeping her in the country against her will, Borodkin said.

"Identifying the victim is a big step that's going to have to take place," said Salvation Army Maj. Neal Hogan. "Our state has taken a major step forward in saying our state is not going to tolerate this."

The Justice Department gave the Salvation Army a grant to set up programs in Denver and several other cities to help raise awareness of human trafficking, educate law enforcement and the public about it and track victims and determine how best to serve their needs.

The task force made several recommendations to expand those efforts statewide to help combat the growing problem. It also recommended enhancing penalties for trafficking in children and change victim-assistance laws to specifically encompass victims of human trafficking.

February 27, 2007; Page A8

The Supreme Court said it will consider the constitutionality of a state primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party. The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over its "Top 2" primary system, which allows candidates to indicate their party affiliation on the ballot. Lower federal courts agreed with the Washington Democratic and Republican parties that the system infringes on their right to choose their own nominees.

German Union Sets Pay Target

Germany's labor union IG Metall announced its official claim for a 6.5% rise in wages for workers in the metal and engineering industry, leading unions across the country that have called 2007 the "year of pay rise." Negotiations with employers, including all major German car makers and steel producers, are scheduled to begin March 12. Unions say the wage increase is needed to fuel private consumption. Employers have said they aren't willing to raise wages more than last year's 3% rise. In 2006, IG Metall started by calling for a 5% wage hike.

Ecuador Revives EU Banana Spat

Ecuador asked the World Trade Organization to rule on whether European banana import tariffs are too high, restarting a decade-old dispute over what Latin American countries and the U.S. have argued is unfair trade discrimination. The WTO has consistently ruled against how the European Union sets tariffs for bananas, but the EU says a tariff established last year has brought it into compliance. The WTO's dispute-settlement body will meet March 8 to discuss Ecuador's request.

Supreme Court To Review 'Top Two' Primary System (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The Supreme Court said yesterday it will consider the constitutionality of a statewide primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party.

The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over the "top two" primary system that voters adopted.

The system allows candidates to indicate party affiliation on the ballot and is open to voters regardless of party. The system is the successor to the blanket primary, which the Supreme Court struck down in 2000 on the grounds that it violated political parties' rights.

The Washington Democratic and Republican parties sued to block the new system, approved by voters in 2004. The parties said they would be forced to be associated with candidates they did not choose. Lower federal courts agreed with the parties. The new system infringes on the rights of political parties to choose their own nominees, said the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit.

Security Study Urges Changes At Iowa Prison (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 27, 2007

The Iowa State Penitentiary at Fort Madison still suffers from security flaws that could make it vulnerable to the type of escape that occurred in November 2005 when two dangerous convicts fled from the maximum-security prison, according to a new federal security audit.

Two consultants from the National Institute of Corrections who spent two days inspecting the Iowa prison in October suggested relocating an electronic alarm system on the prison's walls, adding more razor wire, improving outside lighting and acquiring more digital cameras.

The consultants also recommended acquiring better metal detectors, along with so-called "heartbeat monitors" that can catch inmates hiding in vehicles leaving the prison.

In addition, they suggested that inmates working in the Prison Industries building be required to strip naked and go through metal detectors while headed to and from their job assignments.

Inmates Martin Moon and Robert Legendre, both serving life sentences, made a daring escape from the State Penitentiary on Nov. 14, 2005, using a handcrafted rope and a grappling hook to scale a 30-foot limestone wall that surrounds the prison.

Moon, serving time for murder, and Legendre, serving sentences for attempted murder and kidnapping, were the first inmates to escape from the maximum-security since 1979.

Both were captured within days -- Moon in Illinois and Legendre in Missouri, but their escape raised serious questions about security at the penitentiary, which was established in the 1800s and is the oldest prison west of the Mississippi River.

Both inmates had been part of a Prison Industries work crew, and they disappeared over a section of the prison wall that had a guard tower left unstaffed because of state budget cuts.

After the escape, prison officials ordered the tower be immediately staffed around the clock.

The consultants, Stan Czerniak and James Upchurch, were invited to inspect the Fort Madison prison by the Iowa Department of Corrections. Czerniak is assistant director of operations for the Oregon Department of Corrections; Upchurch is bureau chief for security operations with the Florida Deparment of Corrections.

They worked in Iowa under the auspices of the National Institute of Corrections, a federal agency within the U.S. Department of Justice.

Iowa Department of Corrections spokesman Fred Scaletta said Monday the penitentiary has only been in receipt of the report for a short period of time and has not been able to implement many of the recommendations.

Also, many of the recommendations will require a cost that is not currently within the penitentiary's budget, but will be requested in future state appropriations, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137169

County and Municipal Employees, which represents prison workers at Fort

Madison, criticized the security audit.

"This report is the classic a little and too late," Homan said. "The two escapes happened in 2005, and now a federally funded outside group comes forward to say what should be changed and how it should be done."

He said the union and prison officials have been ironing out the security problems for more than one year.

EDITORIAL Redraw Congressional Districts (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

THE DRIVE TO GET California politicians out of the business of selecting their own voters by shaping their own districts may be derailed by the speakership of Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). Although not long ago it was Republicans who didn't want to risk losing any of their California seats, it's now Pelosi and nervous Democrats who are threatening to scuttle badly needed reform by putting their own interests first. They should back down, and quickly.

Redistricting reform may be a low-profile issue, but it's an important one. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has twice called for an end to the unacceptable status quo in which Sacramento lawmakers divvy up state and congressional districts among their parties when new census figures come out every 10 years.

The party leaders who control the line-drawing reward friends — and politicians who prove to be especially adept at raising money — by designing legislative districts that incumbents can easily defend. But that's not even the seamy part. With the genius of chess masters and the artistry of Renaissance painters, creative partisan mapmakers plot the moves of their favorites from the Assembly to the state Senate and then on to the promised land: Congress, the land of no term limits.

Early this year in Sacramento, in the euphoria of bipartisanship, Democrats grudgingly signed on with Schwarzenegger in his latest call for redistricting reform.

Momentum built as state lawmakers put their chess-playing skills to work linking district reform to rolling back their own term limits. With the prospect of more time in office, politicians found the loss of their district-shaping power palatable.

But Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) was candid from the start: He wasn't going to sign on to any plan that could cost Democrats their newly won control of Congress.

So now Democrats are hedging. Sure, they say, let a citizens commission draw the lines for the Assembly, the state Senate, the state Board of Equalization. But not Congress.

Without Congress, though, there is no meaningful reform. Leaving state party leaders with the power to draw congressional lines leaves them with the power to reward and punish candidates rising through the ranks today. Raise a lot of money for the party and they just may draw a congressional district chock-full of voters predisposed to vote for you. Disregard your fundraising chores or vote the wrong way on an important bill and your political future may be over.

Congressional lines must be part of the package. Schwarzenegger is right to insist on it. It would be foolish to expect voters to loosen their grip on state term limits if lawmakers cannot relinquish their stranglehold on districts.

As for Pelosi, here's a radical notion: Trust the voters to pick the people they want to represent them.

Regulatory Clearance Seen As Slow But Sure (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss And Matthew R. Wald

New York Times, February 27, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 26 — The sale of the biggest utility in Texas to private investors faces months of state and federal regulatory hurdles, but experts predict that the broad support for the deal from environmentalists and other important interest groups should help it clear them with ease.

A bigger question, some experts say, is whether the newly formed company will be able to keep all its constituents — consumers and shareholders, growth-oriented politicians and environmentalists — as happy in the years ahead as they appear to be now.

In their official announcement of the merger agreement on Monday, the TXU Corporation and the lead buyers, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, promised a 10 percent rate decrease for consumers while sustaining service to an increasingly energy-hungry Texas. Along with reducing the planned coal-fired plants to 3 from 11, the new owners also vowed to invest more in renewable energy, including solar and wind power.

The agreement was greeted with satisfaction by everyone from Texas officials to national environmentalists, who viewed it as a model for other states and utilities as well as a call to action for Congress to legislate against the spread of traditional coal power and its role in contributing to global warming.

"I applaud this investment in emissions reductions, renewable sources and Texas jobs," Gov. Rick Perry said.

Peter Altman, the coal campaign director of the National Environmental Trust, was equally effusive. But "as welcome as the TXU deal is," he warned , "it is still a wake-up call for Congress that there are more than 100 coal plants on the drawing board."

The utility's promises of sustained service, more renewable energy and lower prices should go far in satisfying the Public Utility Commission of Texas, the regulatory body with the power to review purchases and mergers of electric utilities to ensure that they are in the public interest.

"There is a general expectation," said Terry Hadley, a spokesman for the commission in Austin, "that the new owner would provide at least, if not a better, level of service quality." Mr. Hadley said the commission would take "however long it takes to be comfortable" with the deal and pointed out that "we can take measures to require a higher level of service" if necessary.

The current management of the company has come under criticism from consumer groups and politicians for being too quick to cut off electricity to late payers and not keeping public lighting in downtown Dallas adequately serviced.

In Washington, the challenges are relatively minor because there are few antitrust issues in the company's going private.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission will have some jurisdiction since TXU runs a nuclear power plant. "What we tend to look for is if the successor company has the financial reserves and financial and technical knowledge and know-how to operate a nuclear power plant," said David McIntyre, an N.R.C. spokesman.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has less jurisdiction in Texas than other states, but it will probably review the company's limited operations out of state.

Barbara Struck, an analyst with the Energy Intelligence Group, a research firm, predicted that the deal would be approved by regulators "because of the environmental conditions associated with it" and the promises to cut consumer rates.

Peter Hartley, an economist at Rice University, said the utility would have a very hard time keeping its promises to everyone. "How can you make more for all these groups from the same assets and the same management?" he asked. "In the end, they may have to go to the regulators and ask for a rate increase."

In their statement Monday, the company and equity firms promised the decrease in rates until September 2008. The company did not reply to telephone requests for more information.

Representatives of environmental groups predicted that the TXU deal would make it harder for other companies to build new pulverized coal plants. Eric Cane, an analyst at Innovest Strategic Value Advisors, said the settlement would make companies like Dynegy and Xcel think twice about building more coal plants that do not include a plan to keep carbon dioxide from entering the atmosphere.

What the deal shows, more than anything else, they said, was a growing expectation of carbon taxes in the future. "The economics might be there right now for a utility to build a pulverized coal facility," Mr. Cane said, "but you have to question that company's decision, if they're looking forward past the near future."

That is not the way some big coal producers see it, though. And they say they still have basic economics on their side. Until a significant cost is imposed on each ton of carbon pumped into the atmosphere, coal will stand out as the most cost-efficient way to supply new electricity and most regulators will have a hard time agreeing to impose more expensive alternatives on consumers.

"If what has been proposed takes hold and TXU does not advance with the construction of new plants, it will likely enable" other coal facilities to be built, said Vic Svec, a spokesman for Peabody Energy, a coal mining company that has moved into power generation.

The power will still be needed and the type of plant TXU has proposed, he said, is the cleanest, least expensive proven technology to get it.

In TXU Deal, Texas Regulator Has Few Levers To Pull (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Susan Warren And Dennis K. Berman

Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

PUC's Limited Role May Ease Passage; Rival Suitors Scurry

Texas regulators have little authority to challenge or block the proposed $32 billion private-equity buyout of utility titan TXU Corp., which could ease the deal's completion despite opposition gearing up in the state. Meanwhile, potential rival bidders considered their options.

A group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group announced a proposed acquisition of TXU yesterday, in a deal that includes the assumption of more than $12 billion in debt. The deal, which would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, was made after the prospective buyers negotiated with environmental groups to reduce TXU's debate-stirring plans to build a fleet of coal-fired power plants.

Yesterday, a number of Wall Street banks and potential investors were scrambling to respond to their competitors' headline-grabbing move.

Blackstone Group was looking at launching a rival bid, potentially with an industry player as its partner, people familiar with the matter said. Given the KKR-Texas Pacific group's huge head start, any Blackstone offer would have to include a higher price and perhaps a different structure. A strategic partner would enable Blackstone to arrange a more creative deal and hence pay more. Blackstone declined to comment.

A slew of other buyout groups were checking with banks about financing, according to people familiar with the matter. Some were signing confidentiality agreements with TXU, which is leading a 50-day "go shop" period to attract a higher bidder, another person familiar with the matter said.

While Wall Street observers said they believed other buyers could raise enough money, they were generally skeptical that a rival could line up the environmental and political cover that KKR and Texas Pacific have secured. Others note though, that a rival bid could promise the same concessions and that the ultimate decision rests with shareholders. In weighing bids, certainty can be almost as important as price. KKR also has had longstanding relations with TXU Chief Executive C.John Wilder, and Texas Pacific, which is incorporated in Texas, is the hometown player.

Mr. Wilder, who has expressed a desire to stay with the company, stands to reap a rich payday. He negotiated a lucrative compensation package three years ago, when TXU was in the doldrums; under his direction, TXU stock soared from about $10 a share to more than $60.

By some estimates, he may now be eligible for well over $100 million in payments, reflecting the full vesting of several large stock allotments called for under his complex five-year employment contract. Mark Reilly, a partner at pay consultant 3C, Compensation Consulting Consortium, said ambiguity in the wording of some documents, such as TXU's proxy statement, made a detailed estimate difficult. But he said the contract could be valued at as much as $200 million at the current stock price. The company didn't confirm the amount.

TXU said it is considering dividing the company into three separate ones. That would make the company's regulated power-transmission business distinct from both its unregulated power-generation business, the biggest in the state, and its power-sales unit. Each is the biggest in its field, reflecting TXU's stature as a century-old utility that serves most of the northeastern part of the state from its Dallas headquarters.

As merger interest has surged in the long-neglected utility sector, some states have moved to block major deals. Last year, FPL Group and Constellation Energy Group called off their $12.5 billion merger amid Maryland regulators' concerns about rising power prices. Also last year, Exelon Corp. scrapped its $17 billion acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. because of opposition in New Jersey.

But Texas state regulators have little power to block a sale, even if they feel consumers will be harmed, according to TXU, a spokesman for the Public Utility Commission of Texas and others involved in the deal. The law requires the commission to investigate transactions to determine whether they are "consistent with the public interest," but a finding to that effect isn't required in order for a transaction to proceed.

Under the law, the commission can stop a buyer from jacking up rates for regulated enterprises like power delivery, but it has little or no control over whether a sale takes place. The result is that the largest leveraged buyout in U.S. history is free to proceed with state power regulators on the sidelines. The law allows them to hold hearings but doesn't require full evidentiary hearings, which once were the norm, with document production and the calling of witnesses.

TXU spokeswoman Lisa Singleton said yesterday that TXU regards the commission as "an important stakeholder" but not one with any legal authority over transactions. "We don't need them to approve the deal," she said.

A spokesman for the Public Utility Commission said the commissioners are debating what to do. The company's debt was downgraded to less-than-investment grade yesterday because of expectations of a greater debt load, although some analysts said they don't expect the buyers to load the debt on the regulated part of the business.

The deal won a mixed reaction in Texas, where TXU and Mr. Wilder have been embroiled in debate over the planned coal plants and repeated rate increases. As part of the acquisition deal, the new private-equity owners have agreed to drop plans for eight of the 11 coal plants TXU had envisioned.

As part of the proposed sale, TXU also has moved to placate customers by confirming it will offer a 10% rate reduction. But the reduction will be available only to customers who haven't elected to move off TXU's basic rate, sometimes called its "price to beat" or default service. That in effect excludes about 70% of its residential customers and all of its commercial and industrial customers. The discount would last until September 2008.

The Texas legislature already has been considering several bills that seek to deal with the problem of high power prices in the state and a deregulation law that has left many consumers very unhappy. Texas Sen. Troy Fraser, chairman of the Business and Commerce Committee, said that the deal only heightens his anxiety about the high cost of electricity and that he felt the proposed rate cut was "too little, too late."

He said he was dismayed to learn the parties had been talking about the transaction for months "but they never bothered to visit with the leadership in the legislature or the PUC." He said they "finally ran me down Friday evening, and it wasn't to ask my input. It was to tell me what they were doing."

By James Politi

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

TXU on Monday embarked on a campaign to promote a $45bn leveraged buy-out led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group amid mounting evidence that the private equity boom has entered a new, more highly politicised era.

Executives at the Texas power company said the deal would bring lower prices for consumers and stronger environmental policies, including a reduction in carbon emissions and more investment in renewable energy.

Under John Wilder, chief executive, TXU has been the target of environmental groups, angered by the company's plans to construct 11 coal-fired plants to meet Texas's growing energy needs.

But in a sign of private equity's increasing awareness that acquiring big companies entails garnering the support of politicians and special interest groups as well as investors, KKR and TPG agreed to scrap plans to build eight of those coal plants.

The new owners also agreed to bring in James Baker, former US secretary of state; William Reilly, former Environmental Protection Agency administrator; and Donald Evans, former US commerce secretary, to help oversee the investment.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Mr Wilder said he had originally proposed an "aggressive" stand-alone plan that included many of the moves that would be undertaken by TPG and KKR.

But he said the company's board concluded that his proposal was "inferior" to the buy-out. "[The buyers] bring a network of individuals and capabilities that a company like TXU couldn't construct on its own," Mr Wilder said. "We believe they will be a catalyst for innovation."

In leveraged buy-outs, private equity groups typically aim to generate returns in excess of 20 per cent over a time frame of about five years.

When TPG and KKR take over TXU, they will split it into its three main business lines: retail, generation and transmission. Theoretically, the buyers will earn their return by selling each of the units or taking them public in several years.

TXU shareholders will receive $69.25 per share in the deal – a 15 per cent premium over the company's Friday closing share price.

If completed, the deal would represent the largest leveraged buy-out, exceeding this month's $38.9bn takeover of Equity Office Properties, the commercial real estate group, by Blackstone.

The succession of record-breaking deals by private equity groups has been accompanied by criticism, particularly among some European politicians and trade union leaders, that such transactions are bad for the economy.

The private equity groups buying TXU do not expect their buy-out to result in job losses, however. In addition, KKR and TPG have promised a 10 per cent reduction in prices for consumers.

Meanwhile, shares in other US power companies, including Dynegy and Mirant, rose on speculation that they might be the next private equity targets.

Private Equity Buyout Of TXU Is Enormous In Size And In Its Complexity (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 27, 2007

Wall Street banks have provided billions of dollars to finance takeovers in the last year, essentially serving as mortgage lenders to deal-hungry private equity firms, which are among the banks' best-paying customers.

Now the lenders have created a new type of loan that has them ponying up part of the down payment on these deals as well. That trend is vividly illustrated in the $45 billion buyout of the Texas energy giant TXU, which was announced yesterday. There are risks in the transaction, as there are in any large buyout, but for the Wall Street banks behind the deal, it could be even riskier.

In an unusual twist that may soon become common, the banks are going one step further than simply providing the debt financing involved in the deal, in this case a daunting $24 billion of debt.

The banks are also lending $1 billion to TXU's buyers, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group — not as secured debt, but in the form of equity using the bank's own cash.

Known as an "equity bridge," the arrangement allows leveraged buyout firms to buy companies with even less cash upfront. The idea is that the leveraged buyout firms will find other investors to ante up cash after the deal is announced.

These bridges can lead to trouble, however. If the private equity firms cannot find new investors — and it is their job, not the banks', to find them — or if the value of the asset falls sharply, the banks are left holding the bag.

"This is how things blow up; people take more risk," said Andy Kessler, a former research analyst and hedge fund manager who has written books about Wall Street. "If you go back to the crash of 1987, all the banks had huge bridges that went bust."

Some have compared the use of the equity bridges to a much more risky version of Michael R. Milken's famous "highly confident" letters in the 1980s takeover boom, which gave assurances that his firm, Drexel Burnham Lambert, could sell junk bonds to finance deals for its clients.

Investment bankers say that the private equity firms, which have become some of the largest fee payers to Wall Street, put pressure on them to extend an equity bridge in exchange for syndicating the debt, a job that can prove very lucrative.

"The bridge may be a pay-to-play," Mr. Kessler said.

The new tactic has appeared in a handful of deals recently, including the $39 billion takeover of Equity Office Properties this month. It lets a private equity firm pursue enormous transactions without bringing in partners, at least until it has negotiated a deal on its own terms.

Indeed, the advent of the equity bridge could spell the end of giant consortium transactions, or club deals, in which often rival private equity firms team up on a bid. In the $11.3 billion buyout of SunGard Data Systems in 2005, for example, seven private equity firms banded together, each with a seat at the negotiating table.

The use of the equity bridge may instead spur private equity firms to be more competitive in bidding, because they would not need to forge temporary alliances of convenience with rivals to mount large bids. And that would take some pressure off the firms, which have been under scrutiny by the Justice Department over whether the consortiums constitute a form of collusion.

In the case of TXU, Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific are expected to invite their limited partners — the investors in their own funds, like big pension plans — to invest directly in this deal. By investing alongside the private equity firms, these investors can share in the rewards if the deal pays off without paying the same enormous fees to the firms that they typically do to invest in their funds. Private equity firms offer direct investment as an inducement to also invest in their funds that do carry fees.

The TXU buyout calls for about $8 billion of cash upfront, $24 billion of new debt and the assumption of about $13 billion in debt.

Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific are each putting up about $2 billion in cash. Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley and Citigroup plan to invest $3 billion from their private equity arms.

That brings the cash total to only $7 billion, $1 billion short of the $8 billion required. That's where JPMorgan Chase, Morgan Stanley and Citigroup are planning to come in with a $1 billion equity bridge.

The risk to the banks is that the value of TXU could fall sharply below the $69.25 being offered. Yesterday, TXU shareholders welcomed the deal, driving up the shares 13 percent, to $67.93.

The deal still must undergo months of scrutiny from state and federal regulators. And while the deal has won support through pledges to cut electric rates and scale back a plan to build coal-fired power plants, the private equity firms must still overcome a perception that buyout buyers are temporary owners who are not beholden to shareholders or customers.

Talk about building bridges.

The New Greenmail (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Call it greenmail for a post-Kyoto world. The private-equity firms that just agreed to buy Texas utility TXU have scored something of a PR coup by getting Environmental Defense and other climate-change activists to fall in line with their purchase plans before the deal was announced. The question is what price shareholders are paying for this act of political correctness.

In the old days, a greenmail artist like Carl Icahn would buy up a tranch of some company's stock and threaten to buy the rest unless the target paid him to go away. But 21st-century greenmail works a little differently. Judging by media accounts, the price of Environmental Defense's support was an announcement that the new owners would build only three of the 11 coal-fired power plants that TXU has had on the drawing board.

Last year, Environmental Defense had launched a "Stop TXU" campaign to oppose the new plants. But yesterday it declared "victory" and explained that its agreement had been sought by emissaries of the private-equity investors in return for mothballing the eight coal plants and an agreement to sign on to mandatory emissions caps and an overall reduction in TXU's CO_2 emissions by 2020.

TXU had painted a green bull's-eye on itself when it announced plans last year to build the 11 new plants. Never mind that the plants were to be built on the sites of existing plants, that a number of them would replace older, less-efficient plants, or that Texas is already bumping up against the limits of its ability to produce the electricity it needs for its growing population and economy. The announcement sent the environmental movement to the barricades against TXU, and may be one reason that the company's stock, after going up regularly for several years, sputtered and stalled in 2006.

That stock slide wasn't all bad for Kohlberg, Kravis Roberts, which is leading the group buying TXU for not much more than its all-time stock-price high, which it hit in the middle of last year. But then again, giving in to the pressure not to build all 11 plants may not turn out to be all bad for KKR and TXU, either.

Ercot, Texas's independent electric-grid operator, figures that peak electricity demand in the state will catch up with available capacity by 2009, if not sooner. Tight demand means higher electricity prices, which is good for TXU's profits. That squeeze will, in turn, rejuvenate calls for more capacity, which may allow TXU to dust off the plans for the new plants at a moment when the current environmental concerns weigh more lightly in the political scales than skyrocketing electricity bills. The private-equity crowd didn't get to be billionaires for nothing.

Texas's electricity market is bigger than all of South Korea's and nearly the size of the United Kingdom's -- which is to say, it's big. It also has limited interconnection to surrounding states, so its ability to import power on high-voltage lines to make up for any shortfall is limited. Texans learned this last April when a spring heatwave sent temperatures in parts of the state into the triple digits, catching the utilities flat-footed and producing rolling blackouts and brownouts around the state.

The people who run TXU understand all of this at least as well as anyone. They also know that starting this year and continuing in stages into 2009, the state's electricity-deregulation plan calls for the price cap on wholesale power to be raised to three times its 2006 level. The retail price cap expired at the end of last year.

These reductions in price controls would certainly have played a role in TXU's earlier decision to invest $10 billion in the 11 new plants, which was the point of decontrolling prices in the first place -- greater returns mean more investment, which is needed to supply a growing state's energy needs. So now TXU can hope to get the benefit of rising prices by restricting supply, and get environmental plaudits in the bargain. Only Texas consumers might suffer.

Which is not to say that TXU would be giving up nothing by not building the plants. Some of the plants that were to be replaced are gas-fired, and natural gas prices have been volatile and rising. TXU owns a bunch of coal deposits, so it had planned to build the coal-fired plants in part to get a better grip on its supply costs going forward. And given the projections for steadily rising electricity demand in Texas and the rather closed nature of its market, TXU runs the risk of ceding market share in electricity generation to rivals.

As for TXU's current shareholders, the agitation of the greens may have helped bring down TXU's share price last year, so the environmentalists probably did KKR and partners a favor. There may even be a trend in the making here -- environmental protesters bring down a stock, making a private-equity transaction look more attractive, and in return, the equity firm and its management partners buy off the greens with this or that environmental promise. We're not suggesting any such quid pro quo here, but if we were TXU's mom-and-pop investors or Texas energy consumers we'd certainly be asking some pointed questions.

Proposed Satellite Radio Merger Could Set Off Sparks At Hearing (PLTCO)

By Andrew Glass

Politico, February 27, 2007

Up in the sky 22,500 miles above Earth, separate sets of satellites beam hundreds of music, news and sports radio programs to almost 14 million U.S. subscribers in homes, offices and cars. Down on the ground in the nation's capital, a legion of lawyers and lobbyists has launched a multipronged campaign to let them merge.

The proposal calls for XM Satellite Radio Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. to combine their programming. They will try to persuade the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to sanction the union and to do it quickly. The initial skirmish will occur Wednesday on Capitol Hill. While Congress cannot block the deal, it could influence the outcome.

The key issue before the lawmakers is the same one that faces the regulators: What is the scope of the market? If it is satellite radio, as critics allege, a merger would spawn an illegal unregulated monopoly. But Mel Karmazin, Sirius' CEO, will testify that the market should also include the 223 million weekly listeners to about 10,000 AM and FM domestic radio stations, the 219 million Americans with access to the Internet and millions more who own iPods and other hand-held music players.

The projected XM-Sirius merger, announced Feb. 19, will be the first item to come before the newly created House Antitrust Task Force. House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., D-Mich., who set it up on a provisional basis, said, "We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry."

Karmazin will argue that the merger would allow automakers to mount receivers without having to choose between the two incompatible systems. Post-merger subscribers could listen to both Howard Stern (Sirius) and Oprah Winfrey (XM). They could tune into National Football League and National Basketball Association games (Sirius) and Major League Baseball games (XM), too. Karmazin will also say that dropping duplicate channels and replacing them with a wider range of niche programming would benefit consumers.

Over the last eight years, the two firms have lost a combined $7 billion. They don't see a way to profitability. In 2006, their collective losses will exceed $1.5 billion. But no matter how the congressional session goes, the would-be partners must still surmount high regulatory hurdles in attaining a government-sanctioned bailout.

Conyers plans to question Karmazin about why his company, being in such dire financial straits, signed Stern, the nation's most sexually explicit shock jock, to a five-year $500 million contract. "Bad management is no excuse for a monopoly," said Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America (CFA), who will also testify.

Opponents of the merger include the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB), which will be at the witness table, represented by its president, David Rehr. In a statement, the NAB said: "… Policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming. We're hopeful that this anti-consumer proposal will be rejected."

But Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons want to leverage the NAB's hostility to deflate the monopoly charges. Earlier, the FCC allowed each of them, against NAB opposition, to offer real-time traffic and weather reports in top urban markets.

Not all critics play in the same big league as the NAB and the CFA. Law school student subscribers, calling themselves the Consumer Coalition for Competition in Satellite Radio (C3SR), will resist the merger as well. Chris Reale, a founder of C3SR, said, "A monopoly satellite radio provider would be able to raise prices and cut programming to a growing number of consumers that have come to rely on satellite radio for news and entertainment."

To counter the negative onslaught, XM and Sirius have hired a slew of top-of-the-line investment bankers, law firms and lobbyists.

J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. is handling the financial side for XM and Morgan Stanley for Sirius. Three law firms -- Skadden Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP, Jones Day and Latham & Watkins LLP -- are acting as legal counsel for XM. Sirius will get by with two: Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP and Wiley Rein LLP.

Their task is to persuade both Justice Department trustbusters, led by Thomas Barnett, and a fractured five-member FCC that a combined system will serve the public interest. The FCC would have to overturn its decade-old edict that they should remain separate. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has said, "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

XM, based within walking distance of Capitol Hill, has employed a larger and somewhat rotating gallery of lobbyists. Last year, records show, XM spent $403,705 in lobbying fees, allocated among nine firms.

One of them was Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti Inc., which along with a predecessor firm, Mehlman Capitol Strategies, earned $80,000 for its efforts. "Politics are partisan, policy is bipartisan," said Alex Vogel, a co-founder of the firm and chief of staff to former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. Vogel's partners are Bruce Mehlman, whose brother Ken served until January as chairman of the Republican National Committee, and David Castagnetti, formerly chief of staff to Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.

XM also employs Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, an arm of Hill & Knowlton. Paddy Link serves as the chief XM account executive. She was the first woman to head the staff of the U.S. Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, where she helped draft the breakthrough Telecommunications Act of 1996. Before going over to the committee, Link served as chief of staff to former Sen. Larry Pressler, R-S.D.

XM's Losses Narrowed In 4th Quarter (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Continued growth in subscribers helped XM Satellite Radio Holdings slightly reduce its losses in the last quarter of 2006 from the fourth quarter of 2005, the company said yesterday.

XM, which broadcasts from the District, hopes to merge with rival Sirius Satellite Radio, which is based in New York. Both companies will continue to operate separately as they await regulatory approval from the Federal Communications Commission and Department of Justice, which is expected to take several months.

XM's last-quarter revenue increased by 45 percent, to $257.1 million from $177.1 million in the fourth quarter of 2005. The company narrowed its loss to $263.2 million (90 cents a share) from $270.5 million ($1.22).

XM finished the year with 7.6 million subscribers, a 29 percent increase over the year before, that was, however, lower than the projections the company made in early 2006. Executives said they hoped to have at least 9 million subscribers, who typically pay $12.95 a month, by the end of this year.

XM reduced its quarterly marketing expenses by more than 25 percent, spending $142 million compared with $196 million, company executives said in a conference call with analysts and reporters. The cost of gaining each new subscriber fell from $141 to $128.

In the last quarter of 2006, XM took a charge of $57.6 million to reflect the reduced value of its stake in a Canadian satellite radio affiliate.

For all of 2006, XM lost $732 million, or $2.70 per share. In 2005, it lost $675 million. XM and Sirius have paid heavily to recruit such stars as Howard Stern, Oprah Winfrey and Martha Stewart. They contend they need to merge to remain competitive with over-the-air, commercial radio, iPods and other audio services, but some consumer groups oppose monopoly ownership of satellite radio.

XM Cuts Its Loss To $263m For Quarter (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

XM Satellite Radio yesterday reported a narrower fourth-quarter loss as it prepared for Congressional hearings concerning its proposed merger with rival Sirius.

For the quarter, XM lost $263.1m, or 90 cents per share, compared with $270.4m, or $1.22, during the same period a year ago. The company, which has never made a profit, benefited from a reduction in costs, and from a jump in subscriptions that helped push revenues up 45 per cent to $257m.

The results came a week after XM announced an $11.4bn merger with Sirius. Analysts and investors have projected $5bn in cost savings that would push the companies toward profitability.

However, the biggest obstacle to the deal will be allaying antitrust concerns at the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission. At a Congressional hearing tomorrow, the companies are expected to argue that they are part of an expanding market for portable audio that includes iPods, mobile phones and other devices.

"We're working to close the deal and we're confident it's going to go through," Hugh Panero, XM's chief executive, said yesterday.

XM suffered last year because of product delays and increased competition from Sirius, which spent heavily to lure top talent such as Howard Stern, the radio shock jock. It finished the year with 7.6m subscribers - up 1.6m over the previous year but shy of the 9m it had forecast.

One bright spot was that XM managed to lower its average cost of acquiring new subscribers in 2006 - to $126 from $141 the previous year.

Editorial: A Monopoly -- Not (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 27, 2007

TEN YEARS AGO, federal regulators sold a pair of satellite radio licenses -- and sternly warned that a competition-chilling merger wouldn't be tolerated.

How quaint that worry seems now. The two operators -- XM and Sirius -- are losing billions of dollars and want to huddle together to stop the bleeding. Meanwhile, HD radio, iPods, Internet broadcasts and other trends have rushed past regulators and redrawn the landscape. There are 90 million people wearing dangling iPod ear-buds, 65 million who listen to free Internet radio and about 14 million satellite-radio subscribers.

It's hard to see a stifling monopoly in the making when the two satellite networks are gasping for air. Consumers, who need defending when choices narrow dramatically, don't need any help on this shift.

In Washington, the Justice Department is judged likely to bless the deal after surveying the larger landscape of audio choices. It's a sensible reading of broadcast reality.

It's the Federal Communications Commission, which laid down the no-merger threat a decade ago, that may stop the deal. The panel shouldn't, even if it risks going back on its guiding words, issued at the dawn of the Internet age.

A merged satellite market will create a semblance of a monopoly, but only over one slender source of information. If the merged network raises prices or cuts options, unhappy subscribers can turn elsewhere for their entertainment fix.

This infant industry was touted as a major breakthrough way back when. How far away that era seems now when cheaper, handier and more varied choices now abound.

CME, CBOT Shareholders To Vote On $8B Deal On April 4 (AP)

By Jesse Thomas

AP, February 27, 2007

CHICAGO - Shareholders of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., the two largest U.S. derivatives exchanges, will vote on CME's proposed $8 billion acquisition of CBOT on April 4.

In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, CME said Monday its meeting on the deal will be held at the W Chicago City Center, while CBOT's Class A shareholders will meet at Union League Club of Chicago.

In addition, a special meeting for Series B-1 and Series B-2 members of CBOT will be held at the Union League Club before the Class A shareholder meeting to approve an amended and restated certificate of incorporation to become effective upon the deal, the filing said.

The SEC filing states CME and CBOT "enthusiastically support" the combination, which would create the world's largest derivatives exchange. Executives from both exchanges have repeatedly stated they expect the deal, originally announced on Oct. 17, to close midyear.

The deal is still awaiting regulatory approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Department of Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said the investigation is ongoing, but did not say when a decision might be made.

The proposed acquisition has come under fire in recent weeks. The Futures Industry Association, a trade organization that is not required to approve the deal, said that the new company, to be called CME Group Inc., a Chicago Board of Trade company, could wield unfair pricing power, which could "raise even higher the barriers to entry for new competitors."

The association said the deal also would substantially lessen competition among U.S. futures exchanges.

CME officials have said that the acquisition will increase competition in the global marketplace. CME and CBOT also expect to generate annual cost savings of at least $125 million as a result of the deal, while saving exchange users about $70 million on an annual basis.

On the New York Stock Exchange, CME shares closed down $8.26, or 1.5 percent, at $536.59. CBOT shares closed down $2.00, or 1.2 percent, at $160.50.

Regulators OK GE Purchase Of Abbott Unit (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve $8.1B General Electric Purchase of Abbott Labs Division

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators on Monday approved General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion purchase of Abbott Laboratories' diagnostics business.

The Federal Trade Commission said it has approved the transaction without requiring any changes.

General Electric will acquire Abbott's in vitro diagnostics and point-of-care diagnostics businesses, the companies said when they first announced the transaction in January. The in vitro diagnostic division tests blood and urine samples to diagnose diseases and other conditions.

Abbott expects to receive $6 billion in after-tax cash from the transaction, the company said last month. Abbott plans to use the money to pay down debt and supplement share repurchases.

The two companies said in January that they expected the transaction to close in the first half of 2007.

Shares of GE rose 9 cents to $35.19 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Abbott increased 84 cents to $54.43, also on the NYSE.

Caremark Rx Downgraded Amid Bidding War (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, February 27, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Raymond James downgraded Monday its rating on Caremark Rx Inc. shares on the belief there will be no further bidders for the company beyond fellow pharmacy-benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. on the one hand, and retail pharmacy-chain operator CVS Corp. on the other.

"Based on our analysis, we believe a [per-share purchase] price in the mid-$60s begins to become dilutive from CVS' perspective," Raymond James analyst Michael Baker wrote in a research note. He cut his rating on Caremark to market perform from outperform.

"We do not expect CVS to push the price beyond this point; therefore, upside is modest from current levels, in our opinion."

Caremark agreed last November to a so-called merger of equals with CVS under which Caremark stockholders would receive 1.67 shares of the combined company for each share they own.

The following month, however, Express Scripts launched a hostile cash-and-stock counterbid for Caremark that at the time carried a 15% premium to the CVS deal. Terms call for Express Scripts to pay $29.25 in cash and 0.426 share of stock for each outstanding Caremark share.

CVS subsequently sweetened its bid with a $2-a-share special dividend, which it then tripled to $6 a share.

Shares of Caremark closed Monday's session higher by 17 cents at $63.24. Express Scripts shares added 19 cents to finish at $78.82, while shares of CVS slipped 10 cents to end at $32.38.

Twists and turns

A judge in Delaware on Friday delayed a shareholder vote on the proposed Caremark-CVS merger for the second time, until at least 20 days after Caremark shareholders are provided with additional information about the deal. Caremark subsequently mailed supplemental disclosures containing the information in question to its shareholders and scheduled the vote for March 16. See full story.

The Caremark shareholder vote, analyst Baker noted, will take place after the March 8 deadline for the Federal Trade Commission to make a second information request concerning the Express Scripts bid.

Antitrust questions have been among the top concerns raised in reference to a Caremark-Express Scripts deal. Caremark's the largest PBM in the country on a market-capitalization basis, ahead of Medco Health Solutions Inc. and Express Scripts.

With an eye to avoiding the need for a second request from the FTC, Express Scripts at the end of January withdrew and then submitted again its Caremark bid antitrust filing, resulting in the March 8 deadline. See full story.

The key, said Raymond James' Baker, will be whether the FTC takes a broad view of the market or attempts to redefine it more narrowly.

From a broad market perspective, a combined Caremark-Express Scripts would have roughly a 29% market share, and it would "likely be of little concern" Baker said. He also estimated Medco's share of the market at 19%, followed by WellPoint Inc. at 11%.

"A more narrow definition of the large-employer market (Fortune 100) could be more problematic and require Express Scripts to provide additional information under a second request," Baker said. Carolyn Pritchard is a reporter for MarketWatch in San Francisco.

Linux Camp Rages Over Novell Pact (BOS)

By Hiawatha Bray, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 27, 2007

Microsoft accord could leave other open-source software companies more vulnerable to patent suits

Last year's surprise partnership between software titan Microsoft Corp. and leading Linux distributor Novell Inc. was supposed to be a kind of peace treaty. Instead, it's brought the open-source software community to the brink of civil war, over a provision that could help Microsoft sue other open-source software companies for patent violations.

As part of the deal, Novell agreed to compensate Microsoft for features in Linux that Microsoft claims to have patented. Critics say Novell has betrayed other Linux vendors and made it easier for Microsoft to threaten Linux companies with patent infringement suits.

"Anybody who has not signed a deal now . . . is somehow under a cloud," said Peter Brown, executive director of the Free Software Foundation, a group that oversees the creation of most Linux code. "When will Microsoft act against them?"

But for renowned open-source programmer and former Novell employee Jeremy Allison, the deal came at too high a price. Allison helped develop Samba, a popular program that lets Linux computers interact with machines running Windows. In December, Allison quit . "I left Novell over the deal because I felt it was not consistent with the responsibilities of an open-source company or an open-source programmer," Allison said.

The deal with Microsoft amounts to a $308 million lifeline for Waltham-based Novell, a company brought to the brink of ruin thanks to years of fierce rivalry with Microsoft. Originally based in Utah, Novell invented the first system to link desktop computers into networks. It grew into the world's third-largest software company, at one time employing 10,000 workers.

But Novell's business was gutted when Microsoft added networking capability to its Windows operating system. Novell then challenged Microsoft with an alternative operating system and office software suite. Both ventures were costly failures. Today, Novell has just 4,800 employees, mostly in Utah. Only about 200 are based in the Boston area. Still Novell is one of the biggest technology companies based in Massachusetts.

Novell now hopes to become the leading distributor of Linux software to businesses -- a position held by Red Hat Inc. of Raleigh, N.C. Red Hat officials say they're unworried by the Novell-Microsoft deal. At a technology conference earlier this month, Red Hat's chief financial officer, Charlie Peters, said he sees no sign that an alliance between Novell and Microsoft is hurting Red Hat's sales. "Just in the last week or two you've seen several good customer wins from us," Peters said. "This clearly is not an issue."

Open-source supporters favor some features of the deal. Microsoft paid $240 million for Novell Linux licenses, which it will distribute to customers who want to use both Windows and Linux in their data centers. The two companies also will cooperate on ways to make Linux work better with Windows . After all, even companies that use Linux for high-end server applications still use Windows on most of their desktop machines. Microsoft will also pay $108 million to Novell for permission to use Novell patents in Microsoft's products.

But it's Novell's $40 million patent payment to Microsoft that infuriates open-source specialists. That's because Novell's SUSE Linux, like all versions of Linux, is made up of hundreds of pieces of software produced by the GNU Project, an open-source development group led by the Free Software Foundation in Cambridge. Linux companies like Novell and Red Hat compete by selling support for their Linux products. Meanwhile, the Free Software Foundation insists that no version of Linux violates patents held by Microsoft or anybody else.

Brown, the foundation's executive director, said that those who buy Novell's version of Linux will be shielded from Microsoft patent litigation. But people who buy from other Linux companies are still exposed to patent lawsuits, even though all versions of Linux are nearly identical.

Brown said that Microsoft singled out Novell because the company's sales and profits are weak. . Novell revenue fell from $1.2 billion in fiscal 2005 to $967 million in 2006. The company posted a $376.7 million profit in 2005, but that was mainly due to a $536 million payout from Microsoft to settle an antitrust dispute between the two longtime enemies. Last year, Novell's net income dropped to $32 million.

The company's financial woes made it a prime target for Microsoft, said Brown. He thinks Novell entered into negotiation in good faith, but learned too late about Microsoft's patent tactics. "They wave a big check under their noses, they get Novell desperate for the money, and then they spring the patent provision on them."

Novell says the critics are wrong. Susan Heystee, the company's vice president of global strategic partnerships, said Novell does not believe that Linux contains any Microsoft-patented code. "There is definitely no statement that we're making that there are any patents being infringed," she said. "We do not acknowledge that there is any issue there."

But within days of signing the deal with Novell, Microsoft chief executive Steve Ballmer told guests at a software industry conference that Linux contains Microsoft intellectual property. "In a sense you could say that anybody who has got Linux in their data center has an undisclosed balance-sheet liability," he said, suggesting that Microsoft might demand compensation from Linux users not covered by the Novell agreement. Microsoft agrees that Novell did not concede any patent violations in Linux, saying that the companies have "agreed to disagree" on the issue.

Leaders of the open-source movement are at work on a legal strategy that could let Novell retain the benefits of the deal, while preventing Microsoft from using it to attack other open-source firms. They're drafting a new version of the General Public License or GPL, the Free Software Foundation's legal rulebook, which governs how Linux and other open-source code can be used.

Under the new license, called GPL3, if a company waives its patent rights over GPL software distributed by one company, that waiver will apply to all other companies distributing the software. If the provision had been in place when Novell and Microsoft struck their deal, the patent protection won by Novell would have applied as well to Red Hat, Ubuntu, and other Linux versions. Microsoft would have forfeited its patent infringement claims against all Linux distributors.

The foundation hopes to have the new license completed within a couple of weeks. It can then issue future versions of Linux code under the license. As they're upgraded over time, the hundreds of programs that make up Novell's Linux will be covered by the new license.

Brown said GPL3 would ensure that no other Linux company will be able to make a separate peace with Microsoft. "We want to attempt to stop these type of deals being struck," he said.

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 27, 2007

Washington — Federal antitrust regulators have approved Coca-Cola's purchase of juice and tea maker Fuze Beverage, according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Monday.

The FTC cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal.

Atlanta-based Coca-Cola will buy all Fuze Beverage brands, including the Vitalize, Refresh, Tea and Slenderize lines. The company said Feb. 1 that it expects to close the transaction this year.

Insurers Prepare A Battle Strategy To Protect A Key Exemption (column) (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The insurance industry is one of Washington's fiercest and best-funded lobbies, so it rarely gets surprised. But last week several industry representatives privately acknowledged amazement that their most important federal benefit -- an antitrust exemption -- is in danger.

Angry with how insurers have been treating Hurricane Katrina victims and others, the chairman and the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), as well as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), have joined forces to propose a repeal of the 62-year-old exemption, known as the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

"This is the big one," said Carl Parks, senior vice president of the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies and a leader in the effort to save the exemption. "We are upset and disappointed."

The insurers say they are doing nothing wrong. Yet lawmakers are outraged on behalf of constituents who believe they have not been properly compensated for their property losses.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who lost his house during Katrina and is a co-sponsor of the legislation, has said that even "the nightmares of FEMA" did not prepare his constituents for their "abandonment by insurance companies."

McCarran-Ferguson provides insurers with an exemption from federal antitrust laws so that thousands of companies can exchange and aggregate data on accidents and injuries. They use that information to formulate the rates they charge their customers.

The exemption can operate only if states regulate the insurers, and lately a growing number of lawmakers have complained that some states have failed to do so. Hence the legislation -- and its companion bill in the House -- which would repeal the exemption and impose regulation by the consumer-focused Federal Trade Commission.

Large insurers that have enough data to set rates themselves have been proposing a modified repeal of McCarrin-Ferguson for years, but only if companies can opt to replace state regulation with a more compliant captive federal regulator. The new legislation, however, would add stiff federal regulation on top of the state regimen.

"The concern is that the industry could end up with double regulation," said Stanton D. Anderson of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Insurers are beginning to muster their forces for an epic battle. Some of the bigger firms are hoping that the friendly-federal-regulator option will emerge somehow. But Parks and others who represent smaller insurers are not taking any chances.

The National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies has already created a "war room" that is targeting the districts and states of lawmakers who might be sympathetic or persuadable. It is hunting for insurers with employees in those places whom they can train to lobby their elected representatives. A broad coalition of insurance lobbies is also in the offing.

Parks, 60, knows this ground well. He has worked in public affairs for the insurance industry on and off since 1969, first for Allstate and later for the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. In between, he helped the Credit Union National Association stage a huge grass-roots lobbying effort that persuaded Congress to pass a bill overturning a Supreme Court decision that would have hamstrung credit unions.

Now he has an even bigger fight. "This is an issue that we have to win outside the Beltway," Parks said. "We think we will win when we communicate our message."Lobbying Winner -- and Loser

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the affiliated U.S. Chamber Institute for Legal Reform have broken their own record for expenditures on lobbying. Their combined total skyrocketed to $49.2 million for the second half of 2006, more than double the $23.5 million they reported for the first six months of the year. The latest six-month period shattered their earlier record of $30.1 million, set during 2004's first half, PoliticalMoneyLine said.

The institute, which alone spent $17.8 million in the second half of 2006, does all manner of lobbying and research to fight trial lawyers. The rest of the Chamber buys issue advertising and houses a stable of lobbyists and policy analysts.

By contrast, the National Association of Manufacturers -- the Chamber's onetime rival -- spent just $3.6 million in the second half of 2006, down dramatically from $9.6 million in the year's first six months. NAM said the 63 percent decline resulted from its withdrawal from lobbying on the asbestos bill that it wanted but failed to get.

NAM was outpaced in lobbying expenditures in last year's second half by a wide range of groups and individual companies. Twenty of these spent more than $5 million during the period.Thank You, Mr. Chairman

If it's good to be a Democrat on K Street these days, it's even better to be a Democrat who once worked for a current chairman of a congressional tax-writing committee. That's clearly where the money is.

Timothy E. Punke, a former trade aide to Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) of the Senate Finance Committee, was named a partner of Monument Policy Group, a lobbying firm. His new clients include heavyweights such as Microsoft and the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

Former Baucus chief of staff Jeffrey A. Forbes of Cauthen Forbes & Williams also has a slew of new clients. They include Merck, Genentech, Ford and Intuit.

William A. Signer, a former staffer to Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) of the House Ways and Means Committee, has a new job -- managing director of health-care and tax practices at Carmen Group. "His experience in understanding Chairman Rangel's goals and motivations are invaluable to clients," said David M. Carmen, president of the firm. Signer's ties to Rangel, Carmen added, were "definitely a factor" in his hiring.A Republican Purge on K?

majority, on the group's chief executive, former congressman Dan Glickman (D-Kan.), and on left-leaning Hollywood. Feehery had been the spokesman for then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and a veteran GOP leadership aide.

But last month, the MPAA named Seth Oster, a Democrat, as executive vice president for communications, in effect taking part of Feehery's portfolio. My colleague at washingtonpost.com, Mary Ann Akers, reports that lobbyists worry that the move might presage a citywide purge of Republicans. But Feehery professes no bitterness. "It was a good time for me to start my own business," he said. "It gives me a greater range to do things I want to do." The MPAA will be one of his first clients, he added.

EU Takeover Law In Tatters (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

The European Union's decades-long struggle to abolish "poison pills" and other barriers to hostile takeovers has ended in failure, the European Commission will conclude on Tuesday.

The commission will also warn it could overhaul the Union's ineffective takeover law earlier than planned.

"A large number of member states have shown strong reluctance to lift takeover barriers," the Commission says in a report on the effects of the EU takeover directive. The report finds the vast majority of member states have exploited the law's many loopholes to ensure that takeover defences can be used as extensively as before.

"The number of member states implementing the directive in a seemingly protectionist way is unexpectedly large," the report says.

The report's publication comes amid rising concern about protectionism in several European countries, and follows recent controversies over the growing power of hedge funds, private equity groups and other activist investors.

The report's downbeat conclusions also suggest that most EU governments are unconvinced by the Commission's assertion that takeovers offer "benefits for companies, investors and ultimately the European economy as a whole".

The EU takeover directive – which was finally adopted in 2004 after more than 14 years of debate – was originally designed to make it harder for companies facing a takeover bid to use poison pill defences, such as issuing new shares or entering into complex joint ventures. It would also have curbed the use of shares with multiple voting rights – another method of keeping suitors at bay.

But strong resistance from countries such as Germany and Sweden and a last-minute change of heart by the European Parliament meant the proposal was watered down.

Crucially, member states were allowed to opt out of a key provision that forces companies to seek shareholder approval for poison pill defences.

Another vital clause – known as the breakthrough rule – to ensure that existing defences become ineffective during the takeover period was also made optional.

The Commission report, a copy of which has been obtained by the FT, finds that "the vast majority of member states have not imposed (or are unlikely to impose) the breakthrough rule". Only Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania have opted into the clause, which means that less than 1 per cent of listed companies in the EU will apply the rule on a mandatory basis.

Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, has repeatedly voiced his frustration over the final version of the takeover directive.

The report suggests that he may want to return to the issue earlier than planned.

The directive is scheduled to be revised as late as 2011, but the report says that "in the light of the evaluation" this overhaul may have to be bought forward.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Western States Agree To Cut Greenhouse Gases (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137184

Five Western governors agreed yesterday on a plan to cut their states' emissions of gases linked to global warming and to establish a regional carbon-trading system, though they stopped short of saying how drastically they will seek to reduce greenhouse gases.

The governors -- including Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger of California and Democrats from Arizona, Oregon, New Mexico and Washington -- said that within six months they will set a regional target for lower emissions. A year after that, they pledged, they will devise a regional cap-and-trade system allowing polluters to buy and sell greenhouse gas pollution credits.

"In the absence of meaningful federal action, it is up to the states to take action to address climate change and reduce greenhouse gas emissions in the country," said Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano. "Western states are being particularly hard hit by the effects of climate change."

The move won immediate plaudits from environmentalists. Jeremiah Baumann, an environmental advocate at the Oregon State Public Interest Research Group, said, "This regional global-warming solution will benefit the environment on a global scale."

It remained unclear how much the five states will cut their carbon dioxide emissions and how soon they will do it. Several states on the East and West coasts have adopted reduction targets in recent years, but in the immediate term all fall short of the targets that the European Union, Canada and Japan are seeking to meet by 2012 under the international treaty known as the Kyoto Protocol.

California passed legislation late last year mandating a 25 percent cut below current levels of greenhouse gases, which would bring its emissions down to 1990 levels. The four other Western governors have all established, through executive orders, reduction goals that are slightly more modest than California's, and state officials predicted the final pact is likely to equal the sum of all the states' individual targets.

Dan Skopec, undersecretary for California's Environmental Protection Agency, said the significance of the agreement is that companies in the five states will be able to trade emissions.

"It's not as important that the different states may have a different emissions reduction goal. The important thing is that an emission reduction in Arizona means the same thing as an emission reduction in California or Oregon," Skopec said.

The states' agreement came as scientists and interest groups continued to debate the best way to curb the country's global-warming pollution. In a presentation at the National Press Club yesterday, James E. Hansen, the outspoken climate scientist who directs NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said the United States should stop building coal-fired power plants and older polluting utilities must "be bulldozed" before mid-century.

Also yesterday, the AFL-CIO endorsed the idea of a more modest cap-and-trade emissions-reduction plan that "should initially seek to gradually slow the growth in greenhouse gas emissions" but also contain a "safety valve" cost cap to protect the economy."

Carbon Curbs Gain Backers (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Energy Groups Shift Stance, Possibly Giving Campaign New Fuel

WASHINGTON -- Seeking to shape legislation before Congress, three major energy trade associations have shifted their stances and decided to back mandatory federal curbs on carbon dioxide and other man-made emissions that could accelerate climate change.

Joined by the AFL-CIO, the groups say they now plan to use their lobbying clout to stake out positions that favor modest, economy-wide regulations, in hopes of minimizing anticipated energy-price increases and pre-empting state efforts that could result in a patchwork of differing state and regional regulations.

The shift by the groups, which include the Edison Electric Institute and the American Gas Association, underscores their belief that Congress is in a mood to pass some form of mandatory emissions controls, perhaps before the next election in 2008. "We want to be at the table" during the debate, said Paul Wilkinson, a vice president of the American Gas Association, which represents 200 utilities that distribute natural gas throughout the U.S.

Taken with environmental concessions made in the proposed $45 billion purchase of electric utility TXU Corp. by seven buyout firms, as well as the Oscar-related attention over former Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming on Sunday, the efforts could provide new momentum to the campaign to reduce the emissions believed by many scientists to cause global warning.

Separately yesterday, the governors of California, Oregon, New Mexico, Arizona and Washington state jointly announced plans to reduce "greenhouse gases" through a "cap-and-trade" program that would allocate emissions credits to companies, which could use or trade them. New England states and New York have adopted a similar, regional approach.

The American Gas Association had previously opposed federal action to control climate-change emissions as "unwarranted." Mr. Wilkinson said the association's board reversed itself last week because of growing signs that Congress could pass mandatory controls. While debates could go on for years in Congress, he said, the basic structure of the bill could be determined soon.

The largest trade group, and the one likely to be hardest hit by any energy-price increases under national regulations, is the Edison Electric Institute, whose members generate 60% of electricity in the U.S. The institute's board, including 50 chief executive officers of utilities, last month approved a set of principles supporting "federal action" to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions.

Institute chairman James E. Rogers described the lengthy, closed meeting as "crossing a bridge" for members of the group, which previously supported only voluntary reductions. He added that his group wants a "safety valve" that would require the government to intervene as needed to keep the price of credits stable and low.

The Electric Power Supply Association, which represents 22 companies that sell electricity on a wholesale basis, also recently endorsed mandatory federal measures. Association president John E. Shelk said members want some certainty over what kinds of power plants they should invest in. "This is what's really driving the do-it-now argument," he said.

The AFL-CIO yesterday joined the drive by issuing its own plan calling for mandatory controls that would "gradually slow the growth" of greenhouse-gas emissions. The plan seeks implementation of a cost cap to prevent sudden increases in energy prices that could hit businesses. Robert Baugh, who heads a task force developing the labor group's energy strategy, said the critical issue is jobs. "We don't want to close down businesses here and put them offshore," he said.

At least five different versions of a federal cap-and-trade system to reduce emissions have been introduced on Capitol Hill. All would require companies that produce carbon-based fuels or emissions to have government-allocated permits for each ton of carbon in the fuel they handle. Regulators would gradually reduce the caps, but companies could trade their credits. Those that modernize their equipment to reduce emissions to below the federal caps could sell their extra quotas. Companies that need more credits could buy them to get under the declining caps, or pay a penalty.

All five bills target electricity producers, because half of the nation's electricity is generated by coal-fired plants. Coal has the highest carbon content among all fuels.

Mr. Rogers of the Edison Electric Institute said that under a mandatory cap system, his industry would need more federal assistance to develop new emission controls, particularly ways to separate CO2 emissions and inject them into the ground. If the technology, which remains unproven on a commercial scale, fails, power producers would have more emissions than they had planned and would need to buy more emissions credits. In that case, the government should intervene by freezing the market price for carbon credits, which would otherwise rise, he said. Eventually, most costs would be passed on to consumers.

While none of these groups backs a particular bill, legislation being prepared by Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) and Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) features the safety valve to keep emissions-credit prices low and a more moderate approach towards emissions reductions. "These groups are saying it's time to go," said Jason Grumet, staff director for the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy, which helped draft portions of the Bingaman bill.

Another bill sponsored by Sens. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I., Conn.), which takes a more aggressive approach and doesn't have a safety valve, is favored by environmental groups. Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense, called safety-valve proposals a form of government "price controls" that would discourage innovation.

Estimates of the cost the various bills would impose on the nation's economy haven't been fully worked out. One environmental group, Resources for the Future, estimates that the Bingaman measure would increase electricity prices by 3.5% while the more-aggressive McCain bill could hike prices by as much as 35%.

Wall Street Adds Climate Change To Bottom Line (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

The environmentally tinged takeover of TXU Corp. illustrates global warming's increased financial relevance.

NEW YORK

Wall Street now views the color green as something other than money.

In the latest sign that global climate change is becoming a major factor for investors, potentially the largest private takeover in the nation's history has environmentalists' fingerprints all over it.

A consortium of private investors announced Monday they would pay almost $45 billion to acquire TXU Corp., which generates electricity in the state of Texas. What makes the deal more than just another gigantic financial transaction is that the buyers of the company consulted with environmental groups and agreed to sharply scale back plans to build new coal-fired power plants.

"This is a real breakthrough, an indication investors are paying attention to the real financial risk associated with climate change," says Dan Bakal, director of electric power programs at Ceres, a Boston-based environmental group that advises investors controlling $3.7 trillion in assets. "It means Wall Street is really beginning to pay attention."

Wall Street analysts believe the deal could mean that future takeovers will start to factor in the cost of corporate carbon emissions.

This could affect mergers and acquisitions in a broad range of industries, including manufacturing companies, the auto industry, mining companies, and other utilities.

"What it shows is the environment has a much greater presence than in the past and the issue of global warming is under increased scrutiny," says Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "These are additional factors that must be addressed in future mergers."

In fact, there are some signs Wall Street is trying to get up to speed as quickly as possible. For the past three years, the World Resources Institute (WRI), an environmental think tank in Washington, D.C., has been working with investment banks and securities firms such as Merrill Lynch, Citigroup, and Goldman Sachs to teach them how to establish their own carbon "footprint" and analyze other companies' emissions.

Analysts eye carbon 'footprint'

By calculating the footprint – the amount of greenhouse gases a company pumps into the atmosphere – analysts can begin to forecast the potential risks of climate-change lawsuits and future costs of any greenhouse-gas regulations.

"It's been a slow start, but we have been pleased to see financial institutions begin to grapple with those systems," says Jennifer Layke, deputy director of climate and energy for WRI. "But this is the first time we have seen a set of investors reach out to the environmental community around the terms of a new investment deal."

Last year, the New York Stock Exchange began to educate CEOs about the issue. It sponsored a lunch with former Vice President Al Gore, who gave a slide-show version of his Oscar-winning documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth."

Investors call for carbon accounting

This year there will be a record number of shareholder resolutions asking companies about their carbon footprint.

Normally, shareholder propositions don't receive much traction in the corporate world.

But, the proposals have been receiving a significant amount of institutional support from such large shareholders as Calpers, the California public-employee pension fund. And there is increasing concern that corporate boards may have a liability if they don't start to plan for future limits on carbon emissions.

Pressure was already building on TXU to scale back its proposal to build 11 coal-fired power plants. Over the weekend, Ceres issued a report that looked at the potential carbon taxes the utility would face, assuming that Congress or the states begin to enact such charges.

"Our report made some reasonable assumptions, including that none of the costs would be grandfathered in," says Mr. Bakal. "That means 100 percent of the carbon dioxide must face a carbon tax, which we estimate could be as much as $780 million per year, perhaps for 15 years."

At the same time, the Ceres report called into question some of the revenue and cost assumptions that TXU had made to justify the new plants.

"We think they had overestimated the amount of growth and underestimated the amount of the coming carbon controls and the cost of complying with the existing Clean Air Act," says David Gardiner, one of the authors of the report and a sustainability consultant in Arlington, Va.

TXU buyers moved to ease opposition

Some of these issues resonated with the group of TXU buyers, which includes the Texas Pacific Group, Goldman Sachs, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. Texas Pacific and KKR are private equity groups that amass money from pension funds and wealthy individuals and buy companies.

Monday, in Dallas, the buyers' group said they would drop eight of the 11 new coal-fired power plants if their deal succeeds. They also said they would roll back electricity rates by 10 percent. And, they indicated they would work towards meeting any national emissions caps in the future.

"It's a sign people are paying attention," says Rodney Taylor, managing director of the environmental-services group at Aon, a large Chicago-based insurance broker. "From a financial standpoint, it also says something about the perception of where energy costs are going. KKR is kind of a medium-term investor, so they must be looking at energy costs going up sharply over the next three to five years."

Global Warming A Hot Spot For Investors (USAT)

By Adam Shell And Matt Krantz

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Droughts. Hurricanes. Rising temperatures. Melting glaciers. In a world abuzz with talk about global warming, climate change is elbowing aside tech and biotech as the major investment theme of the future.

Wall Street's savviest analysts are devising ways to cash in on crazy weather, just as they did in response to the profound changes brought on by the dawn of the digital age, globalization and the graying of America.

Discussions about what interest rates mean for stocks are giving way to chatter about what a 1-degree rise each year in temperature would do to profits at businesses ranging from carmakers to solar companies.

Global warming has emerged as a major market-moving force that represents a generational shift likely to influence how people invest for decades. The world's biggest financial services firms are investing massive amounts of time and brainpower trying to pinpoint what stocks and sectors will benefit — and be hurt — by changes in Earth's weather patterns.

"We are approaching a tipping point when it comes to climate change," says Edward Kerschner, a strategist at Citigroup.

Kerschner should know. He spent nine months researching "Climatic Consequences," a 120-page report that zeroes in on 74 companies in 18 countries well-positioned to profit from changing weather patterns. "The interest in this report is unprecedented," says Kerschner. He says presentations to clients are booked through the fall.

Similarly, UBS released a 97-page tome, "Climate Change: Beyond Whether." And Lehman Bros., with input from analysts in London and Tokyo, this month published a 143-page paper, "The Business of Climate Change." The well-being of the planet, the report concludes, has gone from a "fringe concern" of scientists and activists to a "central topic" for CEOs and investors.

"Global warming is likely to prove (to be) one of those tectonic forces that — like globalization or the aging of populations — gradually but powerfully changes the economic landscape," writes John Llewellyn, senior economic policy adviser at Lehman.

And California's Calpers, the nation's largest public pension plan and considered a trendsetter among giant money managers, is committing $800 million to invest in clean technology in emerging markets of Eastern Europe, Latin America and Asia.

Earlier this month, the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) concluded that it was more than 90% likely that human activity is causing global warming. Former vice president Al Gore came to a similar conclusion in his film, An Inconvenient Truth, which Sunday won the Academy Award for best documentary feature.

The IPCC says temperatures around the globe could rise 2 to 12 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100. Likely result: more intense heat waves, more powerful tropical storms and a rise in sea levels that could swamp low-lying cities.

From an investors' standpoint, it doesn't matter if people believe global warming is real or if greenhouse gases are to blame, Kerschner says. What does matter is if consumers, regulators, governments and corporations "react to the perceived threat." That is what creates investment opportunities — and risks, he says.

Agriculture.

Ethanol, which is made mainly from corn, has been the talk of the farm since President Bush pushed for greater ethanol use in his January State of the Union address.

The biggest ethanol producers, Archer Daniels Midland, Aventine Renewable Energy, Pacific Ethanol and VeraSun, seem obvious places for investors. The problem is, investments that are obvious rarely pan out. Ethanol plays, at least in the short run, have been no exception. These stocks have all tumbled as corn prices have soared, making the main raw ingredient used to make ethanol prohibitively pricey.

Corn, as a feed for ethanol, is limited, says Michael Hoover, managing director at U.S. Trust. If ethanol were to provide just 10% of the nation's automotive fuel needs, it would consume 35% of the nation's corn crop. And 25% of all food prices are affected by corn prices, he says: "You've got a food-vs.-fuel issue."

But that doesn't mean there's no money to be made on the farm. There are high hopes about cellulosic ethanol, which is made from farm leftovers ranging from grasses to empty corn husks and beets. The trouble is, it takes more energy to extract starches from this "biomass" than it produces. Companies such as Diversa are working on developing enzymes that could be a cheap way to extract parts from biomass to create fuel.

Cashing in on the food boom requires thinking more creatively. For one thing, as in most gold rushes, the companies selling the picks and axes often cash in. That's why Kerschner thinks tractor-maker John Deere could benefit as farmers look to handle bigger crops more efficiently. Citing strong demand for tractors because of rising corn prices, Deere issued a bullish outlook for 2007, and analysts say the ethanol boom is just getting started. Similarly, Monsanto is working on crops that are more resistant to drought.

Alternative energy.

Windmills. Fuel cells. Solar panels. Those global warming plays pop into most investors' minds. There's no shortage of companies working on these technologies. Energy Conversion Devices and SunPower, for example, are developing types of clean solar panels with the hope of rivaling oil and coal, deemed "dirty" by scientists.

Don't count on making big-time dough, says Robert Wilder, CEO of WilderShares, a company that creates stock indexes that track eco-friendly companies. He says the technology is too immature.

Wilder is skeptical about how soon these technologies will make meaningful contributions. Solar, for instance, provides only one-tenth of a percent of the world's energy. Even if production were ramped up tenfold, it would provide 1% of current demand.

Alternative energy plays, he believes, are not the best route to profits. He prefers technology that makes dirty energy sources, such as coal and oil, cleaner. Fuel Tech, for example, makes devices that help factories reduce the dangerous carbon spewed out of smokestacks. "Ironically, people interested in benefiting from climate change should look at the really dirty stuff, not the clean stuff," Wilder says.

Another potential play: nuclear power generators. While disposing of nuclear waste is problematic, the actual generation of nuclear energy is clean and doesn't produce carbon, he says. FPL Group is a play on both nuclear and alternative energy because it produces nuclear power in addition to being the nation's biggest producer of wind power, Wilder says.

Automotive.

Cogan lists hybrid technology as a can't-miss investment. Hybrid cars are powered by an intelligent system that knows when to run on liquid fuel and when to switch to electricity. Hybrid technology works with all the fuels to make them more efficient. Toyota, Honda, General Motors and Ford are the leaders, in that order, he says.

Another way to profit is to invest in companies that make the parts used to build hybrid vehicles. International Rectifier, for instance, makes many of the components that end up in hybrids made by General Motors and Ford. Energy Conversion makes the batteries.

Financial services.

One potential beneficiary, analysts say, is the Chicago Mercantile Exchange (CME), a futures exchange with an already-broad weather-related product lineup and plans to create markets. Last year, the CME traded 797,508 weather contracts valued at $21 billion, up nearly tenfold from $2.2 billion in 2004. Those options and futures enable insurance, energy and utility companies to hedge potential losses related to weather. Similarly, the CME recently launched "hurricane contracts" that enable insurers to transfer risk to financial markets. "Companies are becoming increasingly aware that climate is closely tied to profits," says Felix Carabello, CME's director of alternative investment products. "Investors are always looking for new asset classes" to diversify portfolios.

Stock investors seeking broad exposure to "green" investments could consider mutual funds offered by Domini Social Investments. All Domini holdings promote "the enrichment of our natural environment."

Infrastructure.

While the Earth may be choking on contaminants, the world's demand for energy is only accelerating as economies in places such as China and India enjoy growth spurts. And that's why heavy construction and engineering companies that build power plants will be busy, U.S. Trust's Hoover says.

But the enlightened ones that build ecologically sensitive plants will steal market share. Case in point: McDermott International. It builds and designs everything from coal-fired boilers to power-generation systems in 90 countries and nuclear steam generators.

The company is finding ways to make these plants more efficient and cleaner. One technology, clean coal, puts devices in smokestacks that pull the carbon out of the exhaust and plow it back into the soil. "It's about taking the harmful things out of the stack," Hoover says.

Real estate.

In a post-Hurricane Katrina world, many folks may rethink their dream of buying or remaining in coastal homes with coveted water views, David Lereah, chief economist at the National Association of Realtors, writes in his upcoming book, All Real Estate Is Local. Lereah cites global warming as a "megatrend" and notes that people have an "increasing aversion to locations on the water" and are avoiding "severe-weather-prone" areas.

He predicts households will "move from oceanfront properties to homes several miles away from the water." Many folks, he notes, are fleeing Florida in favor of the Smokey Mountain region, which includes Georgia, Tennessee and western North Carolina. "They feel more secure in the mountains," says Lereah.

Red Lyons, a Georgia Realtor, confirms a stream of buyers, many from Florida, are moving to the mountain region: "It's without a doubt weather-related." Skyrocketing insurance premiums are also affecting property values. "Higher premiums come directly out of the asking price," says Dean Baker, co-director at the Center for Economic and Policy Research.

Technology.

Small parts and components that go into everything from washers and dryers to fighter jets and elevators could play a gigantic factor in curbing energy use. Technology that exists right now could reduce the world's power use by 30% overnight, says Alex Lidow, CEO of advanced control maker International Rectifier. About 11% of the savings could be achieved with efficient electric motors inside washing machines, conveyor belts and other motors that use half the energy of older technology, Lidow says. Another 11% could be saved in transportation uses including hybrids. The last 8% can be saved with energy-efficient fluorescent bulbs.

Making devices that go into bulbs, hybrid cars and electric motors is paying off for International Rectifier. It gets a third of its business, which is growing at an annual 25% clip, from such energy-saving devices. Those businesses focused on energy efficiency are also the company's most profitable.

Despite the forward-looking mind-set of Wall Street analysts, profiting from climate change is still in its infancy. Citigroup's Kerschner learned that firsthand at a recent meeting with wealthy clients in Florida, a state known for both its beautiful beaches and run-ins with deadly hurricanes.

Says Kerschner: "I asked them, 'How many of you are aware of global warming?' Virtually everyone raised their hand. Next I asked, 'How many of you are concerned about global warming?' Most kept their hands up. Finally I asked, 'How many of you have adjusted your investments due to climate change?' Sheepishly, most put their hands down."

At that moment, Kerschner says, he knew most investors hadn't even started to think about how to profit from changes in the Earth's weather patterns.

Wildlife Refuges Lack Means To Survive (LAT)

By Tim Reiterman

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The San Luis National Wildlife Refuge Complex, where tule elk bugle across grassy uplands and migratory waterfowl splash in languid sloughs, has been run for years out of a strip mall 12 miles away, next door to a Sears store.

There is no money to build a visitors center on the 44,000-acre complex that provides recreation for about 90,000 tourists, anglers, hunters and bird watchers each year. Nor is there money to hire a second full-time law enforcement officer for the complex's three far-flung refuges in Merced and Stanislaus counties.

A high-energy, 80-pound Belgian Malinois, Scott can be a formidable ally when Merrill is tracking down poachers, breaking up altercations, searching for marijuana patches and meth labs, or investigating burglar alarms at refuge warehouses. But the pair can cover only one refuge at a time, although drug crimes, fish and game violations, vandalism, dumping and medical emergencies occur throughout the complex.

The National Wildlife Refuge System, part of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, was created a century ago to provide a haven for the most imperiled species. But today the mosaic of 547 refuges covering nearly 100 million acres of swamps, islands, wetlands, deserts, grasslands and forests is itself jeopardized by budget constraints.

Distributed across all 50 states, the refuges are home to hundreds of types of birds, mammals, reptiles, amphibians and fish — many threatened or endangered. But refuge managers say cutbacks are undermining efforts to protect an array of sensitive species, including red wolves, sandhill cranes, pronghorn antelope, sea turtles and rare butterflies.

Personnel scarce

More than 225 jobs at refuges were cut between fiscal 2004 and 2006, leaving some refuges with no employees. Many refuges operate without full-time law enforcement. Some are losing battles against invasive plant species that choke out wildlife habitat. Education programs for schoolchildren and others are being curtailed or dropped at some refuges. At the 1.5-million-acre Desert National Wildlife Refuge, the largest in the lower 48 states, there is no money to fix a washed-out stretch of a 75-mile dirt road from Las Vegas across the Mojave Desert in Nevada. Some visitors insist on driving through the closed section and get stranded. "I just hope someone does not die before I have the opportunity to have it fixed," manager Amy Sprunger said.

Across the country, in North Carolina's Pocosin Lakes National Wildlife Refuge, half of the 100 miles of roads have been closed. "We can't pay for materials to fix the holes," manager Howard Phillips said.

At California's Antioch Dunes refuge along the San Joaquin River near Antioch, budget constraints have contributed to a steep decline in endangered Lange's metalmark butterflies, a subspecies only found there, according to manager Christy Smith.

From a peak of 2,300 eight years ago, Smith said, the population plunged to about 100, because invasive plants overran buckwheat that sustains the butterflies. Now the refuge is using volunteers and others to attack the invaders, and a zoo plans to capture some butterflies to propagate them for release. "They are no longer sustainable in the wild," Smith said.

At Southwestern Arizona's Cabeza Prieta National Wildlife Refuge, manager Roger Di Rosa said he does not have staff to adequately monitor the well-being of endangered Sonoran pronghorn antelope. The wilderness the animals once had largely to themselves has become a busy corridor for smugglers and illegal immigrants. "It is affecting them," Di Rosa said. "Watching them over time, we feel it is hampering efforts of recovery."

The refuge system's Mountain-Prairie region, which covers almost 5 million acres from the Dakotas to Colorado, has lost almost half of its 31 biological technicians, and that has deputy assistant regional director Ron Shupe especially worried about migratory birds that use wetlands in the Alamosa refuge in Colorado's San Luis Valley.

Without biological monitoring, Shupe said, employees are left to guess "when to raise and lower the water to provide correct habitat for migrating waterfowl and sand hill cranes.... If the fowl pass [the wetland], they will roost on private land, increasing exposure to hunting" and the likelihood that the birds would feed on crops.

Bill Reffalt, who was national chief of refuges in the early 1980s, said habitat degradation was a nationwide problem.

"Hundreds of millions of birds and other wildlife depend on refuges ... and if you reduce the capacity of refuges to take care of them, the animals have no place to go," he said. "They can't just go buy a plane ticket."

Refuge funding, now about $380 million annually, has remained relatively flat since 2003, while salaries and other operating costs have risen. Anticipating that domestic security, hurricane relief, and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will remain higher priorities, officials are preparing to trim 75 regional and headquarters office jobs and 248 more field jobs in the next couple of years. That means the field staff will have been cut by one-sixth since fiscal 2004.

"I told them [managers] we can no longer do more with less if we are going to have quality delivery," U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Director H. Dale Hall said in a telephone interview. "We are going to have to do less with less and make ... intelligent management decisions.... We are going to come out of this with a strong wildlife system."

Battling invaders

But many refuge managers aren't so sure. Nearly two-thirds of them, responding to a recent survey by the nonprofit Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, said the refuge system is not accomplishing its missions.

"I've been with this agency 30 years and have seen ups and downs, but I have never seen anything like this," said Patricia Martinkovic, manager of the Minnesota Valley refuge near Minneapolis.

After losing 20% of her staff, Martinkovic said, the refuge is drastically reducing the mowing of 35 miles of trails, prescribed burning for fire protection and invasive plant control.

"Fast forward it a few years and you will see that wetlands have basically filled in with [invasive plants] and will not see that nice vista of egrets and trumpeter swans," Martinkovic said.

The Southeast, with 128 refuges, has been particularly hard-hit by cuts.

President Theodore Roosevelt founded the first refuge at 5.5-acre Pelican Island on the east coast of Florida to protect birds. By the system's centennial celebration there in 2003, the refuge had expanded to 5,400 acres with a staff of six.

The staff is about to be cut to two. No biologists work at the refuge even though the staff is responsible for looking after the country's largest concentration of threatened loggerhead and endangered green sea turtles nesting at a nearby refuge. "It is a little oasis of species diversity," said manager Paul Tritaik, "because lots of Florida is growing tremendously."

Managers have been doing whatever they can to keep the refuges running. They have relied more heavily on volunteers, sought outside funding sources and have done manual labor themselves, such as laying pipe for wetland management and mending fences to keep cattle out of fragile habitat.

At South Carolina's Cape Romain, budget cuts have forced the refuge manager to choose between two successful programs: one that nurtures threatened loggerhead turtles and another that has helped bring back the nearly extinct red wolf.

Manager Donny Browning said he favored the turtles because nests on the refuge produce a quarter of the loggerheads hatched north of Florida. "That program is so vital," he said.

For two decades, the coastal refuge also was an integral part of efforts to save the red wolf, which had dwindled to fewer than 20 animals. Wolf pups bred on Bulls Island in the refuge, then reintroduced to wolf habitat in the region, proved better at surviving alligators and other hazards than wolves from captive-breeding programs.

But about two years ago, the program was halted — and the wolves were removed from the island. Although the red wolf has rebounded to around 300 animals, most are in captivity, and the total population is about 250 shy of the recovery goal.

Now Bud Fazio, the biologist who heads the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's Red Wolf Recovery Program, said plans for more budget cuts threaten the remaining offshore breeding program at St. Vincent Island in Florida. If there is no biologist available, Fazio said, "We will have to take wolves off that island as well and will have no source of wild-raised wolves to reintroduce unless we can establish one elsewhere."

Honeybees Vanish, Leaving Crops And Keepers In Peril (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

VISALIA, Calif., Feb. 23 — David Bradshaw has endured countless stings during his life as a beekeeper, but he got the shock of his career when he opened his boxes last month and found half of his 100 million bees missing.

In 24 states throughout the country, beekeepers have gone through similar shocks as their bees have been disappearing inexplicably at an alarming rate, threatening not only their livelihoods but also the production of numerous crops, including California almonds, one of the nation's most profitable.

"I have never seen anything like it," Mr. Bradshaw, 50, said from an almond orchard here beginning to bloom. "Box after box after box are just empty. There's nobody home."

The sudden mysterious losses are highlighting the critical link that honeybees play in the long chain that gets fruit and vegetables to supermarkets and dinner tables across the country.

Beekeepers have fought regional bee crises before, but this is the first national affliction.

Now, in a mystery worthy of Agatha Christie, bees are flying off in search of pollen and nectar and simply never returning to their colonies. And nobody knows why. Researchers say the bees are presumably dying in the fields, perhaps becoming exhausted or simply disoriented and eventually falling victim to the cold.

As researchers scramble to find answers to the syndrome they have decided to call "colony collapse disorder," growers are becoming openly nervous about the capability of the commercial bee industry to meet the growing demand for bees to pollinate dozens of crops, from almonds to avocados to kiwis.

Along with recent stresses on the bees themselves, as well as on an industry increasingly under consolidation, some fear this disorder may force a breaking point for even large beekeepers.

A Cornell University study has estimated that honeybees annually pollinate more than $14 billion worth of seeds and crops in the United States, mostly fruits, vegetables and nuts. "Every third bite we consume in our diet is dependent on a honeybee to pollinate that food," said Zac Browning, vice president of the American Beekeeping Federation.

The bee losses are ranging from 30 to 60 percent on the West Coast, with some beekeepers on the East Coast and in Texas reporting losses of more than 70 percent; beekeepers consider a loss of up to 20 percent in the offseason to be normal.

Beekeepers are the nomads of the agriculture world, working in obscurity in their white protective suits and frequently trekking around the country with their insects packed into 18-wheelers, looking for pollination work.

Once the domain of hobbyists with a handful of backyard hives, beekeeping has become increasingly commercial and consolidated. Over the last two decades, the number of beehives, now estimated by the Agriculture Department to be 2.4 million, has dropped by a quarter and the number of beekeepers by half.

Pressure has been building on the bee industry. The costs to maintain hives, also known as colonies, are rising along with the strain on bees of being bred to pollinate rather than just make honey. And beekeepers are losing out to suburban sprawl in their quest for spots where bees can forage for nectar to stay healthy and strong during the pollination season.

"There are less beekeepers, less bees, yet more crops to pollinate," Mr. Browning said. "While this sounds sweet for the bee business, with so much added loss and expense due to disease, pests and higher equipment costs, profitability is actually falling."

Some 15 worried beekeepers convened in Florida this month to brainstorm with researchers how to cope with the extensive bee losses. Investigators are exploring a range of theories, including viruses, a fungus and poor bee nutrition.

They are also studying a group of pesticides that were banned in some European countries to see if they are somehow affecting bees' innate ability to find their way back home.

It could just be that the bees are stressed out. Bees are being raised to survive a shorter offseason, to be ready to pollinate once the almond bloom begins in February. That has most likely lowered their immunity to viruses.

Mites have also damaged bee colonies, and the insecticides used to try to kill mites are harming the ability of queen bees to spawn as many worker bees. The queens are living half as long as they did just a few years ago.

Researchers are also concerned that the willingness of beekeepers to truck their colonies from coast to coast could be adding to bees' stress, helping to spread viruses and mites and otherwise accelerating whatever is afflicting them.

Dennis van Engelsdorp, a bee specialist with the state of Pennsylvania who is part of the team studying the bee colony collapses, said the "strong immune suppression" investigators have observed "could be the AIDS of the bee industry," making bees more susceptible to other diseases that eventually kill them off.

Growers have tried before to do without bees. In past decades, they have used everything from giant blowers to helicopters to mortar shells to try to spread pollen across the plants. More recently researchers have been trying to develop "self-compatible" almond trees that will require fewer bees. One company is even trying to commercialize the blue orchard bee, which is virtually stingless and works at colder temperatures than the honeybee.

Beekeepers have endured two major mite infestations since the 1980s, which felled many hobbyist beekeepers, and three cases of unexplained disappearing disorders as far back as 1894. But those episodes were confined to small areas, Mr. van Engelsdorp said.

Today the industry is in a weaker position to deal with new stresses. A flood of imported honey from China and Argentina has depressed honey prices and put more pressure on beekeepers to take to the road in search of pollination contracts. Beekeepers are trucking tens of billions of bees around the country every year.

California's almond crop, by far the biggest in the world, now draws more than half of the country's bee colonies in February. The crop has been both a boon to commercial beekeeping and a burden, as pressure mounts for the industry to fill growing demand. Now spread over 580,000 acres stretched across 300 miles of California's Central Valley, the crop is expected to grow to 680,000 acres by 2010.

Beekeepers now earn many times more renting their bees out to pollinate crops than in producing honey. Two years ago a lack of bees for the California almond crop caused bee rental prices to jump, drawing beekeepers from the East Coast.

This year the price for a bee colony is about $135, up from $55 in 2004, said Joe Traynor, a bee broker in Bakersfield, Calif.

A typical bee colony ranges from 15,000 to 30,000 bees. But beekeepers' costs are also on the rise. In the past decade, fuel, equipment and even bee boxes have doubled and tripled in price.

The cost to control mites has also risen, along with the price of queen bees, which cost about $15 each, up from $10 three years ago.

To give bees energy while they are pollinating, beekeepers now feed them protein supplements and a liquid mix of sucrose and corn syrup carried in tanker-sized trucks costing $12,000 per load. Over all, Mr. Bradshaw figures, in recent years he has spent $145 a hive annually to keep his bees alive, for a profit of about $11 a hive, not including labor expenses. The last three years his net income has averaged $30,000 a year from his 4,200 bee colonies, he said.

"A couple of farmers have asked me, 'Why are you doing this?' " Mr. Bradshaw said. "I ask myself the same thing. But it is a job I like. It is a lifestyle. I work with my dad every day. And now my son is starting to work with us."

Almonds fetch the highest prices for bees, but if there aren't enough bees to go around, some growers may be forced to seek alternatives to bees or change their variety of trees.

"It would be nice to know that we have a dependable source of honey bees," said Martin Hein, an almond grower based in Visalia. "But at this point I don't know that we have that for the amount of acres we have got."

To cope with the losses, beekeepers have been scouring elsewhere for bees to fulfill their contracts with growers. Lance Sundberg, a beekeeper from Columbus, Mont., said he spent $150,000 in the last two weeks buying 1,000 packages of bees — amounting to 14 million bees — from Australia.

He is hoping the Aussie bees will help offset the loss of one-third of the 7,600 hives he manages in six states. "The fear is that when we mix the bees the die-offs will continue to occur," Mr. Sundberg said.

Migratory beekeeping is a lonely life that many compare to truck driving. Mr. Sundberg spends more than half the year driving 20 truckloads of bees around the country. In Terra Bella, an hour south of Visalia, Jack Brumley grimaced from inside his equipment shed as he watched Rosa Patiño use a flat tool to scrape dried honey from dozens of beehive frames that once held bees. Some 2,000 empty boxes — which once held one-third of his total hives — were stacked to the roof.

Beekeepers must often plead with landowners to allow bees to be placed on their land to forage for nectar. One large citrus grower has pushed for California to institute a "no-fly zone" for bees of at least two miles to prevent them from pollinating a seedless form of Mandarin orange.

But the quality of forage might make a difference. Last week Mr. Bradshaw used a forklift to remove some of his bee colonies from a spot across a riverbed from orange groves. Only three of the 64 colonies there have died or disappeared.

"It will probably take me two to three more years to get back up," he said. "Unless I spend gobs of money I don't have."

Show On The Road (WSJ)

By Robert Poole

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Lou Dobbs recently griped on his popular CNN show that parts of the Interstate highway system "built with your tax dollars are now being sold to the highest bidder. And incredibly, it's being done with the federal government's encouragement." Worse, according to America's loudest economic nationalist: "Some of the leading bidders: foreign investors."

I was interviewed for this segment and pointed out, helpfully I thought, that a Spanish company sinking $7 billion into new highways in Texas, meanwhile creating thousands of U.S. jobs, is the very antithesis of protectionists' dreaded "outsourcing." But that tidbit was left on the cutting-room floor.

Mr. Dobbs and others are riled up, but the public-private toll road partnerships sweeping the nation promise to revitalize our highway system. It's a seismic shift in the way roads are financed and managed -- the biggest change since the launch of the Interstate system 50 years ago. In these deals, investor-owned companies pay for the right to design, finance, build, operate, maintain and rebuild an existing or new toll road. In return they get the right to collect tolls on the road for 50 to 99 years.

Headlines may scream "New Jersey Turnpike for Sale!" but highways are not "sold" under these concessions. The government still owns the roads and the contracts spell out exactly what the company can -- and must -- do. The deals (whether for a new or existing road) typically include limits on allowable toll increases and rates of return, maintenance requirements, etc.

Private roads aren't exactly new: In the 19th century, private toll roads provided much of England and America's pre-auto-era highway capacity. Public-private toll road partnerships were rediscovered in France, Spain and Italy during the 1960s and '70s as the main method for building nationwide toll motorway systems.

The re-emergence of this model in the U.S. has been driven by a transportation system burdened with pork projects and funded by gas taxes that fail to keep up with construction and maintenance costs, let alone travel demand. From 1980 to 2000 highway travel increased 80% and the number of drivers rose by 30%, but highway capacity grew by just 2%.

Woefully short of funds, states are turning to the private sector. But private capital will only invest in projects people or shippers are willing to pay tolls to use. Money is therefore directed to routes and roads most appealing to users, not according to the agendas of pork-happy politicians.

State and city governments are also realizing that they are sitting on billions in untapped assets. Chicago's Democratic Mayor Richard Daley moved first, leasing the 7.8 mile Chicago Skyway for $1.8 billion in 2005. The Spanish-Australian consortium leasing the road quickly improved traffic flow by installing state-of-the-art electronic toll collection equipment.

Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels leased an Indiana toll road for $3.8 billion and is working to partner with the private sector on a new one that would connect several counties. Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell may lease the Pennsylvania Turnpike, while his Democratic cohort, Gov. Jon Corzine, is considering the same for New Jersey's.

While states are trying to reduce congestion and build roads without raising taxes, we can never underestimate the federal government's power to stop progress dead in its tracks. At a recent hearing on toll road public-private partnerships, Oregon's Democratic Rep. Peter DeFazio mused that "the federal government may have to step in" if the leasing of existing toll roads continues.

Congress would be wise to get out of the way and let a crucial experiment play out, in which some states embrace the new approach and others don't. In 10 years, we'll all be able to see whose highways resemble packed parking lots, and which states have booming economies because they're moving goods on free-flowing roads.

Billings Gazette, February 27, 2007

The Boys & Girls Club of the Northern Cheyenne Nation has received a $15,000 grant to start a pilot program called Meth SMART. The program is to run through June with federal funding from the Office of Justice Programs Prevention Initiative. It provides age-appropriate curriculum to teach kids ages 6-18 about meth and its effects.

SMART Moves

The Arizona Alliance of Boys & Girls Clubs developed the program, which is based on the national Boys & Girls Clubs' successful Skills Mastery and Resistance Training Moves programs. SMART Moves focuses on prevention and healthy choices.

"The kids see the use out there," Bureau of Indian Affairs Chief of Police John Grinsell Grinsell said. "They need to know that it isn't right, it isn't good."

The Crow Tribe is anticipating about $100,000 from the Department of Justice. It also received a $45,000 grant from Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice. The Justice funding will help the Crow/Northern Cheyenne Safe Trail Task Force, which was created last year to fight drug use and dealing, Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne said.

"It's a big boost to us," Venne said. "We're doing everything we can to cope with the problem."

Meth Free Crow will help administer the other grant. Coordinator April Flores said the program is under way with youth task forces in the schools developing anti-meth messages.

"We need to reclaim our communities, to reclaim our children, their mothers and fathers," Flores said.

Funding, programs fit

Ernie Weyand, senior supervisory resident agent with the FBI, said the funding and programs fit with law enforcement's efforts.

The Crow/Northern Cheyenne Safe Trail Task Force has had several successes in terms of arrests and executing search warrants, Weyand said. It also has an education and prevention component that aims to help keep people off the drug but also gather community support to help law enforcement stop dealing and distribution.

The task force is a partnership among the two tribes, the FBI, the Bureau of Indian Affairs Office of Justice Services, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Colstrip Police Department.

"It's really all about awareness and education," Weyand said. "As we've said before, we will never arrest our way out of this problem. It just won't happen.

"It's about providing education and empowering community members to join the fight and be part of this effort."

Northern Cheyenne

DOJ_NMG_0137196

As program director at the Boys and Girls Club of the Northern Cheyenne Nation, Harris has seen that poem play out in the lives of the children she works with.

Harris has asked children if they know what meth is.

"Little hands came up," Harris said. "And it's just amazing.

"The kids know, it affects and impacts them," Harris said. "Man, it just makes you step back and take a deep breath."

Some of the kids are so young, Harris said, that sitting in the club chairs "their legs don't even reach the floor."

"Kids are smart," Harris said. "They know what the light bulbs and needles and straws and pens are used for."

Adults have a responsibility to talk to kids about methamphetamine use, Harris said. The question is how to do so in an age-appropriate manner. The Northern Cheyenne club has hopefully come up with an answer.

Lane Spotted Elk is the club's coordinator for the Meth SMART. A teenager, Spotted Elk will work with the kids three times a week.

"This was just a blessing because now we have the tools to be able to work with them, to be able to help them," Harris said.

The Northern Cheyenne club has several anti-meth awareness messages, including a three-day summer camp. It is also affiliated with the tribe's War on Meth committee that hosts activities and awareness events.

The Meth SMART program is divided by age groups: kids, ages 6-9; youth, ages 10-13; and teens, ages 14-18. The curriculum has several components. For example, kids start with an introduction to drugs that harm with an emphasis on meth; youths learn facts about meth and its effects on the body and mind; teens continue that track and case studies on methamphetamine users are added.

Parents receive a handbook that explains the program and offers ways to start family discussions.

Meth SMART comes at a time when there is "an awakening" on the reservation about the effects of methamphetamine, Harris said and added she works with kids whose families are torn apart by the drug. Talking about meth not only helps prevent use, it helps those affected by the drug know they are not alone and they have a safe place to talk.

Grinsell and the department's drug officers took part in an orientation meeting for the program.

"The more awareness that people have the better off I think they will be," Grinsell said. "A lot of people don't know too much about meth. They need to know once you experiment with it you're going to be hooked, it's not like any other drug."

Crow Reservation

Crow Bureau of Indian Affairs Chief of Police Ed Eastman has a new graffiti issue in Lodge Grass.

Lately, the spray-painted messages around town have shifted from seemingly gang related to an anti-meth language.

The idea is right, Eastman said, even if the medium is not.

"They're asking for help," Eastman said.

The infusion of money will help with law enforcement overtime and resources, Eastman said.

The grant allows the Crow Reservation to tap resources available through a High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Area designation. Indian Country is seen as a target for methamphetamine dealers, especially Mexican drug traffickers, according to the Department of Justice's "National Methamphetamine Threat Assessment 2007." Access to the Crow Tribe is easy with Interstate 90 running across the reservation and connecting it to urban areas including Billings.

The new prevention program will give kids a chance to use their creativity to spread the "no meth" message in a more productive way than graffiti.

Flores, the Meth Free Crow coordinator, said the program will develop a DVD and campaign posters. She also sees kids using their own talents, whether that is traditional or hip-hop music or skits, to spread the prevention message.

"Our intent is not to throw everybody in jail," Venne said. "How can we help them? To teach them it is bad and we are here and we can help them."

But that does not mean that dealers, in Crow or elsewhere, won't be prosecuted. "We really want to nail them," Venne said.

Venne said it is important for the tribe to take responsibility for fighting the drug.

"Now the people are aware of it and they're wanting some thing done," he said. "What's dangerous about this drug, it has no barriers, whether you're rich or poor. I think it's the devil himself."

FBI Unsure If Missing Notebook PCs Contain Sensitive Data (GCN)

By Jana Cranmer, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 27, 2007

The FBI has reduced notebook PC losses by 312 percent since 2002, but the bureau has failed to adequately report whether stolen computers contain classified or sensitive data, the Justice Department Office of the Inspector General said in an audit report last week.

"When losses occur, the FBI must timely report the loss, be able to identify the contents of lost laptops and determine whether the laptop is encrypted," the bureau's IG said in a follow-up report to a 2002 analysis. "In addition, the FBI "must investigate these losses and thefts, enter required data into the National Crime Information Center and report the losses to the DOJ as required."

The IG's "most troubling" discovery was "the FBI could not determine in many cases whether the lost or stolen laptop computers contained sensitive or classified information."

The FBI's data was incomplete, auditors found. Of the 160 notebooks that disappeared between February 2002 and September 2006, employees filed only 152 forms to provide information about whether the notebooks contained sensitive or classified information. This information could include counterintelligence or counterterrorism case information, personal identifying information or classified information on FBI operations, the report said.

The forms revealed that eight missing notebooks contained sensitive classified information, but these forms failed to provide a complete picture of the losses. The auditor said 43 other forms did not state whether the lost notebook contained sensitive or classified information.

"Without knowing the contents of these lost and stolen laptop computers, it is impossible for the FBI to know the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security," the audit said.

In addition to the insufficient information reported on these forms, employees reported in a less than timely manner that 38 notebooks were missing — more than 10 days after their disappearances — delaying loss investigations.

After discovering the FBI's insufficient tracking of missing notebooks, auditors recommended that the FBI:

Document the disposal of excess notebooks and hard drives to ensure sanitation of all sensitive or classified information prior to disposal.

Report weapon and notebook losses to DOJ.

Adhere to its policy on property storage. The bureau agreed with most of the recommendations and plans to implement them.

"While the Inspector General acknowledged that the loss of certain resources is inevitable in an organization the size of the FBI we nevertheless stand committed to increasing the institutional and personal accountability to further increase the progress we have made in minimizing the loss of information technology components," said FBI assistant director John Miller in response to the audit.

News Area Man Sentenced For Role In Meth Conspiracy (DRR)

Mt. Carmel Daily Republican Register, February 27, 2007

BENTON, Ill. — A Fairfield man and a Springerton man were sentenced to in federal court after pleading guilty to conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine.

Acting United States Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois Randy G. Massy said Fairfield resident Kevin L. Garrett, 40, was sentenced to 30 years imprisonment, fined $1,000, and placed on 10 years of supervised release following his incarceration during sentencing in United States District Court in Benton last week.

Stewart W. Poore, 44, of Springerton, to 20 years imprisonment, fined $900 and placed on 10 years of supervised release following incarceration.

Garrett and Poore were charged along with 29 other defendants by a federal grand jury in July 2005 with conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of meth.

Both pled guilty to the offense in October 2006.

Under federal law, parole has been abolished and defendants are required to serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.

These guilty pleas resulted from a long term investigation into the manufacture of methamphetamine in Wayne and White counties.

Thus far, that investigation, which began in 2003, has resulted in the federal indictment of 33 individuals in related cases who, in total, were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 400,000 grams of methamphetamine.

In addition to the 33 defendants who have been indicted federally, over 20 additional defendants have been prosecuted in related cases in state court by the State's Attorneys in Wayne and White counties.

Investigation into the case is on-going and is being led by the Carmi office of the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force, with the assistance of the Illinois State Police, the Fairfield Police Department, the Carmi Police Department, the White County Sheriff's Department, the Joint Narcotics Unit of the Mt. Vernon Police Department and Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, the Wayne County State's Attorney's Office, the White County State's Attorney's Office, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the United States Drug Enforcement Administration.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorney James M. Cutchin.

AP, February 26, 2007

The U.S. Coast Guard says a crew based out of Maine seized $14 million worth of cocaine and heroine during a 54-day patrol in the central Caribbean.

Coast Guard Officials said the crew of the New England-based cutter Tahoma intercepted a freighter carrying more than a thousand pounds(462 kilograms) of cocaine, 66 pounds (30 kilograms) of heroin and a machine gun equipped with a silencer.

The Coast Guard towed the ship 500 miles to San Juan, Puerto Rico for further inspection and turned the drugs and freighter passengers to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

Foster's Daily Democrat, February 26, 2007

Coast Guard Officials said on Feb. 4, the crew of the New England-based cutter Tahoma intercepted a freighter carrying 462 kilos of cocaine, 30 kilos of heroin and a MAC-10 machine gun equipped with a silencer on board the Bolivian-flagged vessel Osiris II, according to the Coast Guard's website.

The Osiris II, a 130-foot cargo vessel, was intercepted by the cutter Tahoma approximately 228 miles southeast of the Dominican Republic. After successful coordination and cooperation between the Caribbean Corridor participating agencies and the government of Bolivia, Coast Guard personnel boarded the vessel.

The Tahoma towed the ship 500 miles to San Juan, Puerto Rico for further inspection and turned the drugs and eight freighter passengers to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, Coast Guard spokeswoman Sarah Rousseau said in a statement Saturday. The Caribbean Corridor Initiative consist of members from the U.S. Coast Guard, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Agency, Customs and Border Protection, FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office.

"The Coast Guard has a proud and successful history of intercepting contraband in the Caribbean," said Captain James Tunstall, commanding officer for Coast Guard Sector San Juan. "With the aggressive work of ICE, DEA, FBI, CBP and the U.S.

Attorney's Office, the Caribbean Corridor Initiative's collective resources are maximized as we continue our combined aggressive efforts to keep drugs off the streets."

The crew of the Tahoma is expected to return today to the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard.

Fehr Says Union Will Advise Players On Mitchell Probe If Asked (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

TUCSON (AP) — The players' association will offer advice but said it's the choice of each individual whether to cooperate with former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell's investigation into steroids use.

"We haven't made any comment about the Mitchell investigation specifically," union head Donald Fehr said Monday. "What you should expect, however, is that any time any player has an issue with that or something arises, then we will give them whatever our best advice is under the circumstances, and then players make their individual decisions."

Mitchell, hired by commissioner Bud Selig just before the start of the 2006 season, warned baseball owners in January that a lack of cooperation with his investigation into steroid use will "significantly increase" the chances of government involvement.

Fehr, starting his annual spring training tour by meeting with the Arizona Diamondbacks, said Mitchell's comments were unnecessary and that important individual rights are involved.

"I don't think there's anything productive for us to engage in a war," Fehr said. "We spend a lot of time in this country lately with lawyers trying to get public relations advantage on things. I'm not sure that when you're dealing with rights which may be in some sense fairly technical and legal that you ought to be doing that."

On another drug-related issue, Fehr said the union will "take a hard look" at any verified test to detect human growth hormone. That drug cannot be detected by a urine test, and a blood test is in its early stages of use.

"So far as I know it hasn't been peer reviewed by anybody," he said. "Nobody knows the details. We'll take a hard look at whatever it becomes when and if it becomes."

He believes baseball's current anti-drug rules, strengthened under pressure from Congress, "are working pretty well."

Fehr sidestepped an opinion about Barry Bonds and whether Selig would honor him if Bonds breaks Hank Aaron's career home run record.

"You know, look, at this point with all the controversy surrounding him, you ask Bud what he's going to do and he's going to demure and basically say 'I don't know yet,'" Fehr said. "We'll wait and see what happens. I'm not going to prejudge anything."

Fehr said this is his 30th spring training tour, and for a change, there is no contract rancor between the union and owners. The sides reached a new labor agreement last October without the usual public angst.

"It was remarkable," Fehr said. "It never happened before in my career. It made me feel pretty good."

The agreement currently is in the proofreading stage.

Ore. Medical Marijuana Users Ask Lawmakers To Protect Jobs (AP)

SALEM, Ore. (AP) — Medical marijuana advocates pleaded with lawmakers Monday to enact a bill that would prohibit employers from firing them because of their choice of medication.

"The bottom line is I need a job and I don't make enough through social security and food stamps," said Judy Adamson, a 61-year-old widow, breast cancer survivor and registered medical marijuana user. Last year Adamson was suspended from her job as a driving instructor when she tested positive for cannabis after her former employer ordered her to take a drug test.

The new bill comes just a few weeks after a previous bill was introduced that would allow employers to fire employees who fail drug tests — even if they are a state registered medical marijuana user. That bill is currently being considered by the Business, Transportation and Workforce Development committee.

Both measures aim to clarify whether an employer in Oregon has the right to terminate someone's job if they fail a drug test but are a registered medical marijuana user.

Many employers say they already have that right. "The goal is to make sure that medical marijuana is treated as a possible intoxicating substance," said Jeff Dean, director of government affairs for the Pacific Northwest chapter of Associated Builders and Contractors.

During the last few weeks everyone from former commercial helicopter pilots to representatives from the construction industry have spoken about the importance of drug-free workplaces. But on Tuesday, lawmakers heard mostly from those who use medical marijuana for a variety of illnesses, and say that doing so helps them maintain their jobs.

"The nature of the discussion is straightforward," said Leland Berger, an attorney who testified on behalf of medical marijuana users. "It should be treated as any other medication."

But employers warn that medical marijuana users pose risks to themselves and other employees, and that drug tests are the surest way to keep out workers who might be impaired by marijuana use. Others say the best way to identify if a worker is impaired — not just by cannabis but by any type of medication or drug — is through computer programs and even video games that can test a person's reflexes and hand-eye coordination.

Andrea Meyer, a representative for the American Civil Liberties Union, said drug tests done through a urine analysis provide a false sense of safety because they don't reflect a worker's ability to function.

"If someone is using heavy equipment, they should be tested using technology that detects impairment," she said. "The issue shouldn't be what medicines they are on; the issue should be whether they are impaired, whatever the cause."

Democrats Spar Over Medical Pot For Workers (OREG)

By Janie Har, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, February 26, 2007

On the job - One legislator's bill would let employers fire legal weed users; another's stops them

SALEM -- The political stakes might not be as high as for school funding or tax increases, but two Democratic senators are jousting over workers' right to smoke medicinal dope.

Last Monday, Sen. Rick Metsger of Welches hustled out of his business and transportation committee a bill giving employers leeway to boot workers who use medical marijuana.

Today, Sen. Floyd Prozanski of Eugene will take up a bill in his Commerce Committee that would prohibit those same employers from discriminating against legal pot smokers.

Oregonians approved the medical use of marijuana in 1998 but didn't spell out how it would intersect with workplace laws, other than to say employers don't need to accommodate users. About 13,000 people in Oregon carry a card allowing them to ingest marijuana to treat severe pain or a "debilitating medical condition" such as cancer or glaucoma.

Employers say they shouldn't have to stub out their drug policies for medical marijuana users, some of whom might be high on the job and putting co-workers at risk.

"We don't have the time to deal with this stuff. We're not a social service agency, and we cannot take the risk of somebody hurting their fellow workers because they were impaired," says Bob Shiprack, lobbyist for the building and construction trades council.

"We'll let the Legislature sort this out, I guess," he says.

Medical marijuana and civil rights advocates say workers shouldn't be punished for treating a medical condition. If employers are so concerned about safety, they argue, businesses should test to see whether workers actually clock in unable to do their job.

"The only way they are testing is through urine analysis, which does not show whether a person is impaired at the time they are at the workplace," says Andrea Meyer of the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon.

Prozanski agrees with the need for safeguards at work, but he says, "we need to not just go on a witch hunt."

He plans to pass Senate Bill 423 out of committee. Prozanski hopes the two sides can work out a deal.

"Good for him," Metsger says. "I'm going to try to do my best to block" his bill.

Later, Metsger tempered his comments to say he'd have to study Prozanski's proposal. Still, if there's any language "that would conflict with our efforts on (SB) 465," Metsger warned, "I would vigorously oppose it."

Hillman To Be Hired As Marshal (BOS)

By Frank Phillips, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 27, 2007

Former state representative and lieutenant governor candidate Reed V. Hillman is expected to soon land a much-coveted political appointment as US marshal for Massachusetts, leading state GOP sources said.

The White House is on the verge of announcing that Hillman, 58, a former head of the State Police, will be named to the $130,000-a-year patronage post, which has been vacant for the past 18 months, the sources said. The position was last held by Anthony Dichio, who was dismissed in August 2005 after a Justice Department report found he routinely failed to work full work weeks and had misused his official vehicle.

Hillman said today that he was unaware of any pending announcement, but confirmed that he would take the job if offered. "Anything on that will have to come from the White House," said Hillman, who stepped down as State Police commander in 1999 and then represented Sturbridge in the House of Representatives for six years. "All I know is that I am in the mix with four others."

But two leading Massachusetts Republican officials who have followed the appointment process said the White House has decided to give Hillman the job and will make an announcement within days.

"It's a matter of paperwork," said one of the sources, who has been involved in the appointment process and confirmed that the Massachusetts Republican leadership has lined up behind Hillman. "All the appropriate people agree that he's the right person."

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Could Pull The Welcome Mat (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The Lone Star State has long welcomed Latino immigrants, no matter how they got across the state's 1,200-mile border with Mexico.

Back when California voted to cut public services to illegal immigrants, then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush was preaching that immigrants were equal players in the state's economy.

But the atmosphere has changed markedly in Texas, home to about 10% of the nation's illegal immigrants.

Now, a growing chorus of Republicans and some Democrats is pushing some of the harshest immigration-related measures in the United States — laws that would not only deny public services to illegal immigrants but strip their American-born children of benefits as well.

The proposal to deny services to American citizens, which is thought to be the first in the country, is part of a push to challenge the citizenship given automatically to children born in this country to illegal immigrants.

Prior rulings have affirmed that nearly all such children were entitled to birthright citizenship under the 14th Amendment. But some legal scholars have questioned whether the amendment, which redefined national citizenship to include the children of slaves after the Civil War, should cover babies born to foreign parents.

The Pew Hispanic Center estimated last year that more than 3 million U.S. citizens were born to illegal immigrant parents.

"The Texas bill could be a vehicle to get this before the courts, and we strongly support that," said Ira Mehlman, a spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which has been pushing Congress to revisit the 14th Amendment. "There is no question that it is time for a review, given the number of people entering the country illegally and giving birth."

Texas' shift toward a more incendiary brand of immigration politics comes at a time when many state lawmakers are frustrated that Washington has failed to stop illegal immigration. Few think President Bush's moderate proposals, which include a guest worker program and enhanced border security, will help much, even if they are approved by Congress.

State Rep. Leo Berman, the Texas legislator who wrote the bill to deny benefits to the children of illegal immigrants, admits that his goal is to set off a fight in the federal courts. His legislation has been compared to Proposition 187, which was ruled unconstitutional after California voters approved it in 1994, but it goes further. It would deny citizens born to illegal immigrants numerous state services, including unemployment benefits and the ability to obtain professional licenses.

"A pregnant illegal alien can wait at the border, check into a hospital in Texas, give birth without paying a penny, and be rewarded for her illegal behavior," Berman said. "That's outrageous."

Berman's bill is one of more than two dozen proposals targeting illegal immigration in Texas. Other measures would tax money that illegal immigrants wire abroad; require patients to prove they are in the country legally before receiving state medical services; eliminate in-state college tuition breaks for illegal immigrants; and require state agencies to do a thorough accounting of how much illegal immigration is costing the state. Texas is home to between 1 million and 2 million illegal immigrants.

"Why should illegal immigrants, who by virtue of being in the country have broken the law, be able to get the same state services as a citizen?" asked state Sen. Royce West, a Democrat from Dallas who is proposing one of several measures to tax remittances to Mexico. He said his legislation was one way to raise money for healthcare programs.

Texas politicians say that proposing such laws would have been unimaginable a decade ago. During his days as governor, Bush regularly praised the cultural and economic contributions Latino immigrants were making to the state. His political strategy paid off: He won 40% of the Latino vote in 1998, a number previously considered unreachable for a Republican.

Bush's approach was a stark contrast from the immigration politics in California during the tenure of Gov. Pete Wilson, who backed Proposition 187, using it to win reelection.

"California has always been more liberal than Texas, but yet the treatment of immigration issues has been night and day," said Rogelio Saenz, a sociology professor at Texas A&M University.

The Texas Republican Party added hard-line immigration language to its platform last year in response to the demands of its conservative base. It included the line "No amnesty! No how. No way," and a call to "suspend automatic U.S. citizenship to children born to illegal immigrant parents," the idea now proposed by Berman.

Latino leaders say they are stunned by the Texas proposals to deny services to children. They promise retaliation at the ballot box.

"How could anyone be so mean-spirited?" said Rosa Rosales, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, the nation's oldest Latino civil rights group, which originated in Texas. "We're just going to have to get the community out to show these representatives that we matter."

For undocumented Texans such as Ofelia Lopez, the state's push to get tough on illegal immigrants elicits sadness as much as fear. Lopez , who crossed into the U.S. from Mexico seven years ago with the hope that she could give her children a better life, has two daughters, one 3 years old and one 6 months old, who are U.S. citizens.

"I don't think the solution is to deny children the opportunity to become better people. That's not going to help anyone," said Lopez, 35, who also has a 15-year-old daughter born in Mexico who is attending a Texas high school. "That's not going to stop people from coming here. People are coming here because it's the only way to survive."

Last year, state lawmakers nationwide proposed a record 570 immigration measures, and 84 were signed into law, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. The group predicts that immigration will again be among the hottest state issues in 2007.

In Texas, Democratic state Rep. Pete Gallego, head of the Mexican American Legislative Caucus in the House, said that though some of the new proposals were harsh, a few might have momentum, particularly the bills to tax wire transfers.

"People are appalled at how hard core some of these things are," Gallego said. "We will have a fight."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a conservative Republican who talked tough on illegal immigration during his reelection campaign last year, has tempered his rhetoric in recent weeks, and sounded a message of compassion and unity during his oath-of-office address last month. He has singled out Berman's proposal as divisive.

Berman counters that his bill may not make him the darling of Austin's lobbyists or the governor, but he is convinced his cause is popular.

"My mail is running 30 to 1 in favor of what I am trying to do," he said. "This problem is costing Texas money. Texas has to act."

TEST CASE Immigration Crackdown Targets Bosses This Time (WSJ)

By Barry Newman

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

GUILDERLAND, N.Y. -- Early in April of 2005, a man whose friends knew him as César went looking for a job at a wholesale distribution hub near this upstate village. At a workshop run by IFCO Systems North America Inc., the nation's biggest recycler of wooden pallets, César let the boss know that he was in the country illegally, but would be trying to buy some fake "papers."

"That will work," said Robert Belvin, the 42-year old IFCO site manager.

What Mr. Belvin didn't know was that César was an undercover informant working for federal immigration enforcers. Or that he was wearing a wire.

The conversation -- and many others César recorded -- helped build a case that is the biggest test so far of a heavily touted government campaign to control illegal immigration.

A year after César went to work, agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau pounced on 52 IFCO workshops in 26 states, arresting 1,187 foreigners. Unlike raids on many other companies -- including December's arrests of 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. -- the motivation for the raid on IFCO wasn't to catch foreigners. It was to catch the Americans who hired them. Seven IFCO middle managers were also arrested that day and charged, in identically worded complaints, under the same felony statute that punishes human smuggling. Five of them, people familiar with the case say, are expected to plead guilty today in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York.

Neither the company nor its top executives were named in the complaints, which allege that the managers "knowingly conspired with others" to transport, harbor and support undocumented workers for "commercial advantage or private financial gain." But the investigation isn't closed. Like any ICE operation today, one immigration official says, the objective is "to move up in the organization."

In 2005, the Department of Homeland Security announced that instead of imposing small fines for sloppy paperwork, its immigration-enforcement branch would flush out "egregious" employers and put them in jail. That demands proof and police work -- including undercover informants and secret recordings -- more common to drug busts than immigration audits.

• The Issue: Officials are targeting employers for their role in hiring undocumented workers.

• The Challenge: Nabbing offenders requires intensive law-enforcement efforts more common to drug busts.

• The Bottom Line: More cases are likely, as immigration officials take a more aggressive stance against undocumented workers.

Since ICE's creation in 2003, employer arrests have leapt from 25 in 2002 to 718 in 2006. Only last week, ICE arrested three executives of a Nevada-based janitorial service with national reach. But successful prosecutions have so far largely been limited to smaller labor contractors, restaurant owners, and a company putting up a fence on the Mexican border.

IFCO's parent, IFCO Systems NV, by contrast, has world-wide sales of nearly $650 million. Registered in Holland and managed out of Houston and Munich, it promotes itself as a smoothly run system, listing Target Corp., Cargill Inc. and Dell Inc. among many corporate customers. Repairing pallets -- the rough frames that carry goods from factory to warehouse -- is tough work. Up until last April, most IFCO pallet workers were Hispanic.

It was easy for ICE to swoop down on those working illegally. To accuse their bosses of a conspiracy, punishable by prison terms of up to 20 years, was a far greater task. The clues ICE collected, as disclosed in the complaints filed in federal court in Albany, resulted from a combination of lucky tips and accidents. The evidence was backed up by local police work, aggressive surveillance, and the unusual involvement of the Social Security Administration.

IFCO maintains that nothing points to illegal immigration as part of its formal business model. "We deeply regret that we had even a single ineligible worker on our payroll," the company said in a written statement. The company declined to comment further on the case.

The government claims that the immigration status of more than half of IFCO's 5,800 workers in the U.S. was suspect. It is unclear whether the U.S. Attorney in Albany, who is supervising the case, will bring charges against higher-level IFCO executives.

Still, the government's intrusive new style has petrified other companies that rely on foreign labor. "Everybody thinks these are show trials," says Amy Peck, an immigration lawyer in Colorado who represents corporate clients. "And at the same time, we're scared to death about what's going on."

The IFCO evidence, she and other lawyers acknowledge, appears to pull back the curtain of "plausible deniability" that effectively allows six million foreigners to work illegally in the U.S. To avoid discriminating, employers have argued for 20 years, they can't turn away candidates whose papers seem to be genuine. But at one upstate work site, the IFCO complaints allege, that was disingenuous.

The first hint came three months before César applied for a job, when the phone rang at the ICE office in Latham, 10 miles from here. The caller said he worked for IFCO, and said he saw some Spanish-speaking co-workers tearing up their W-2 tax forms. That made the immigration enforcers at ICE very curious: Why would anyone tear up a W-2?

The IFCO worker who phoned said that one of his bosses told him the men didn't need W-2s because they didn't file tax returns. "That's not something you hear every day," says Julie Myers, the DHS assistant secretary who heads ICE. Her agents decided IFCO was worth watching.

Toward the end of the month, a few IFCO workers were relaxing at the Governor's Inn, a motel near the pallet shop. "They like to drink," a Honduran named Reynaldo says now. "They went to the store to get more beer." (A forklift driver arrested in the raid, he has remained in the area and asked that his full name not be used.) As four men returned to the motel in a Chevrolet, the Guilderland police say, they crashed into a Subaru. Two young women were slightly hurt. The Chevy's driver jumped out and ran.

The police found the other three men in the motel. Mr. Belvin, the manager of IFCO's operation, arrived and went with his workers to the police station. All three, the police told Mr. Belvin, had admitted being in the country illegally. Mr. Belvin said that was untrue and that he had the documents to prove it. Mr. Belvin's lawyer didn't respond to phone messages seeking comment.

Then, in an unrelated incident in March, a woman called the police to say she had been attacked in a garage by a Hispanic man. An officer sent to the scene found no suspects. But he did interview six men at a nearby house in connection with the woman's complaint. The men all said they worked for IFCO. The police, recalling IFCO's connection to the earlier accident, notified ICE. Senior inspector John Tashjian said, "If there's any suspicion they're undocumented, we do that."

Responding, ICE agents found five men who didn't belong in the country and arrested them. In sworn statements, a Honduran said he didn't show any documents when IFCO hired him and a Salvadoran said he was told "that papers would be provided to him later."

"I have never heard of that being done in an immigration work-site enforcement action, never," says Paul Zulkie, an attorney who advises corporations on immigration policies and is also president of the American Immigration Law Foundation.

But ICE's orientation has changed. Many of its agents came out of the former Customs Service, which enforced import and export regulations. For them, getting evidence to prove that managers know full well that documents are fake means peeking behind the paperwork.

According to the complaints, ICE's informant had himself been arrested by the Border Patrol for entering the country illegally. After he assisted ICE in a human-smuggling case in Texas, the agency gave him temporary leave to remain in the U.S. -- plus a stipend -- in exchange for his cooperation to help with the IFCO investigation. In April, the complaints say, he introduced himself to some IFCO workers at a grocery.

The informant isn't cited by name in the complaint. But piecing together bits of information, former IFCO workers say they knew him as César, a Portuguese-speaking forklift driver.

The complaints detail how he ultimately got his fake green card and fake Social Security card directly from ICE. The name on the Social Security card wasn't the one he had given IFCO. Nor was the name on the green card. The picture, say the complaints, was of someone else. César showed the documents to Mr. Belvin's boss, James Rice.

Mr. Rice, then 35 years old, was a development manager who had come to open the Guilderland operation the previous October. But because it was a start-up, people close to the company say, its managers were having a hard time finding workers. Looking at the photo on the fake green card while César recorded him, Mr. Rice said, "It looks like you to me." Mr. Rice's lawyer had no comment.

Once hired, César did more at IFCO than drive a forklift. At Mr. Belvin's request and with assistance from ICE, the complaints say, he helped recruit more illegal workers. He got phony documents for five other new hires and he phoned an IFCO manager in Houston to ask about jobs here for two Mexicans who had crossed the border.

In July, César was promoted to foreman.

Already well along in its work, ICE opened a second line of inquiry into IFCO: It enlisted the Social Security Administration.

When numbers on tax returns don't match numbers on its books, Social Security tells employers by letter. A "no-match" can have many explanations, but to ICE it's a red flag of illegal immigration. Yet privacy law bans Social Security from showing ICE its data. Companies do volunteer for audits in return for shelter from raids, and they can check Social Security numbers of new hires themselves. IFCO didn't volunteer for such programs. But the sanctity of its records vanished the moment its recyclers were seen tearing up W-2s.

Destroying the forms was a violation that let Social Security in on the case. Through a subpoena of IFCO's payroll processor, says one official, its inspectors learned that 53% of IFCO's workers in 2005 had dud Social Security numbers. What's more, the complaints say, they discovered that in 2004 and 2005 IFCO received 13 letters in Houston informing it that "more than 1,000 social-security numbers" at "several" of its sites "did not match the records of the SSA."

IFCO didn't follow up on the letters. People familiar with IFCO's position say an employee set the letters aside unopened, failed to tell anybody about them, and then left the company for good.

In the fall of 2005, César traveled to an IFCO start-up in Westborough, Mass., the complaints recount. With Mike Ames, IFCO's site manager, he visited a bakery where Brazilian day-laborers gathered. After speaking in Portuguese with a woman there, César recorded an exchange with Mr. Ames, whose lawyer also didn't respond to requests for comment.

César said: "They don't have no documents, no papers, no permission to work in the United States."

Mr. Ames replied: "But, you know how to work the deal...I don't want it to end up where they can't be paid because of identity, ID, you know what I'm saying."

At least five Brazilians got jobs. Directed by Mr. Belvin and Mr. Rice, the complaints say, César drove three of them 150 miles to Guilderland "for training."

A few weeks later, Mr. Rice left IFCO. On Jan. 8, 2006, Mr. Belvin was fired. Neither departure, according to people familiar with the situation, had to do with immigration issues. Soon afterward, IFCO fired César. Officials won't say where he is now.

On the day of the IFCO raids last April, people following the case say, ICE agents interviewed dozens more managers around the country. The court granted ICE permission to search computers in Guilderland. And, according to the complaints, the federal Department of Labor also spoke to a former bookkeeper who claimed that piecework pallet repairmen were being systematically underpaid for overtime work.

Showing that IFCO broke wage rules could support a charge that it used illegally hired workers for commercial gain, say some legal experts. And connections among workers and managers at several sites could be used to argue -- as the government has in some other immigration cases -- that what ICE uncovered was no rogue operation.

IFCO denies the implication. "There was certainly no corporate strategy to hire undocumented workers or exploit any of our employees," the company said in a statement. Since the raids, it has added new payroll screeners and joined the Social Security verification system. Profits slumped in midyear, but having scoured its records, IFCO says its labor force is up to strength and is as legal as can be.

Of the workers rounded up in April, many have left the country or slipped underground. Reynaldo, the Honduran who drove a forklift for IFCO here, has stayed on in a frame house nearby. The arrest of his managers at IFCO was news to him.

"That really touches me," the 24-year-old said, sitting beside a messy bunk bed one evening as other men came and went. "These are people who offered us opportunities."

"They haven't committed a crime," said a Nicaraguan named Mario who sat next to him. He is 39, and fixed pallets at IFCO for 30 cents apiece. "At least," he added, "it's not a crime to me."

Growing Demand For English Lessons Outstrips Supply (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

MOUNT VERNON, N.Y. — Two weeks after she moved here from her native Brazil, Maria de Oliveira signed up for free English classes at a squat storefront in this working-class suburb, figuring that with an associate's degree and three years as an administrative assistant, she could find a good job in America so long as she spoke the language.

The woman who runs the classes at Mount Vernon's Workforce and Career Preparation Center added Ms. Oliveira's name to her pink binder, at the bottom of a 90-person waiting list that stretched across seven pages. That was in October. Ms. Oliveira, 26, finally got a seat in the class on Jan. 16.

"I keep wondering how much more I'd know if I hadn't had to wait so long," she said in Portuguese.

As immigrants increasingly settle away from large urban centers — New York's suburbs have had a net gain of 225,000 since 2000, compared with 44,000 in the city — many are waiting months or even years to get into government-financed English classes, which are often overcrowded and lack textbooks.

A survey last year by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials found that in 12 states, 60 percent of the free English programs had waiting lists, ranging from a few months in Colorado and Nevada to as long as two years in New Mexico and Massachusetts, where the statewide list has about 16,000 names.

The United States Department of Education counted 1.2 million adults enrolled in public English programs in 2005 — about 1 in 10 of the 10.3 million foreign-born residents 16 and older who speak English "less than very well," or not at all, according to census figures from the same year. Federal money for such classes is matched at varying rates from state to state, leaving an uneven patchwork of programs that advocates say nowhere meets the need.

"We have a lot of folks who need these services and who go unserved," said Claudia Merkel-Keller of the New Jersey Department of Labor and Workforce Development, noting that her state has waiting lists in every county, "from beginner all the way through proficient level." New Jersey, like New York and many other states, does not keep statewide figures on how many people are on waiting lists.

Luis Sanchez, 47, a Peruvian truck driver for a beer distributor in New Brunswick, has been in this country 10 years — and on the waiting list for English classes in Perth Amboy five months. "You live from day to day, waiting to get the call that you can come to class," Mr. Sanchez said in Spanish, explaining that he knew a little English but wanted to improve his writing skills so he could apply for better jobs. "I keep on waiting."

Mr. Sanchez is unlikely to get the call soon: Perth Amboy's Adult Education Center recently discovered that it was operating in the red and canceled 9 of its 11 evening classes in English as a second language, including all at beginner and intermediate levels. In Orange County, N.Y., where the immigrant population doubled in the past 16 years, the Board of Cooperative Education Services' adult education program has stopped advertising for fear its already overflowing beginner classes will be overwhelmed.

In Framingham, Mass., 20 miles west of Boston, hundreds of people used to spend the night in line to register for English as a second language, so the program now selects students by picking handwritten names from a big plastic box.

"With the lottery, everyone has the same chance," said Christine Taylor Tibor, director of Framingham's Adult E.S.L. Plus program. "Unfortunately, you might have to enter the lottery several times before you get in."

Census figures show that in the United States there were 32.6 million foreign-born residents 18 years or older in 2005, up about 18 percent from the 27.5 million counted in 2000 (and nearly twice the 17.1 million in 1990). Federal spending on adult education, about $580 million last year, has increased 23 percent since 2000 and more than tripled since 1990; some 45 percent of the money is devoted to English.

But financing varies widely across the states, which are required to allocate at least one quarter of what was provided by the federal government: Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Texas spent the minimum in 2003, according to the Education Department, while California and Connecticut each spent about seven times that.

In New York, the state Education Department added $76 million to the federal government's $43 million for the 2005 fiscal year. That year, according to a recent report by the Center for an Urban Future, a nonprofit research group based in Manhattan, there were about 86,500 people enrolled in government-sponsored adult programs for English as a second language, serving about 5 percent of the state's 1.6 million adults with limited English skills.

Last fall, Arizona voters approved an initiative banning illegal immigrants from benefiting from all state-financed programs, including English instruction; administrators of English-as-a-second-language classes in several other states said they do not check for documentation when registering students and thus do not know how many of them may be in the country illegally.

Advocates for more English classes say the state-federal financing split leaves an adult education system whose quality and reach vary widely from place to place — and is lacking most everywhere. Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, where the immigrant population has tripled since 1990, largely because of an influx of Mexicans, sponsored a bill last year that would have given legal immigrants $500 vouchers to pay for English classes since so many of the free ones were full.

"Most education policy is the prerogative of state and local governments, but I would argue that the prerogative to help people learn our common language is a federal responsibility," said Senator Alexander, a Republican who was education secretary under the first President George Bush. "If we make it easier for people to learn English, they will learn it. I think that ought to be a priority of our government, and I don't think it has been."

The government-financed classes are most often run by school districts or worker training centers and generally require only a registration fee of perhaps $10. Libraries, churches and community centers often also provide free or inexpensive classes, like the English Language Institute at Westchester Community College in Valhalla, N.Y., which offers nine levels of instruction for $76 to $247 per three-month session. Then there are private programs like the one at Pace University in Pleasantville, N.Y., which costs $790 for two classes a week for 14 weeks.

With immigrants accounting for half of the growth in the nation's labor force from 1990 and 2000, and expected to make up all of the growth in the two decades to come, "the issue of English proficiency has become an issue of economic development," said Tara Colton, the author of the Center for an Urban Future report. Indeed, some business owners, frustrated at the lack of low-cost classes, have begun teaching immigrants English at work.

At Skyline Furniture Manufacturing Inc. in Thornton, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, about half of the company's 60 employees have learned English at the factory over the past five years, under a state program in which the government pays to bring teachers to work sites if companies pay workers for the hours in class.

"It makes sense to us because our workers can do their jobs better, and it makes sense to them because they can advance in their jobs," said Cinthia Nowakowski, the plant's manager, adding that three of the company's eight foremen were promoted after completing the program. "Besides, it's convenient. The guys don't have to worry about having to arrange transportation to get to school or getting there and finding that there's no room in the class."

In Newburgh, N.Y., an Orange County town where one in five of the 29,000 residents are immigrants, Blanca Saravia has amassed an impressive portfolio of odd jobs since arriving from Honduras in 2004: gas station attendant, office janitor, cook's helper, and, for the last 14 months, packager at a local nail-polish factory. Speaking in her native Spanish, Ms. Saravia said that she has been able to get by with co-workers' translating, but that "when the boss gives orders, I don't understand."

So earlier this month, Ms. Saravia joined 30 others in a cramped classroom learning to conjugate the verb "to be" as part of the adult English program in Orange County, where the immigrant population doubled in the last decade — and the number of free English classes has jumped to 26 from 2 in 1995.

"If I tell her, 'We're full, come back in a couple of months,' chances are she'll get discouraged and never come back," said Ramón Santos, who runs the Newburgh program.

Carl DeJura, director of adult basic education at Brookdale Community College in Long Branch, N.J., said he has lately crammed as many as 40 students into a class — "double what it should be."

"If you have to cut back on textbooks, supplies and materials to serve the people who need it," he said, "that's what you do."

In Mount Vernon, Haitian, Chinese, Somali, Arab, Mexican and Brazilian students flock to the beginner class each morning at 8:30 before heading out to work or to look for work. Ahmed Al Saidi, 49, who works at a gas station and moved from Yemen in 1994, said in halting English that he wants to learn the language "for better work and to talk to people when I go to the store."

Ms. Oliveira, the immigrant from Brazil, said she still knows too little English to venture into the marketplace; her husband, who is American born and supports the couple financially, encouraged her to enroll in the classes, held five mornings a week.

"I hope that when I'm speaking a little better, I'll be able to find a job where I can use the English I learned here and the skills I have from back home," she said in Portuguese. "When I was on the waiting list, there were times I thought this time would never come."

Cashing In On Immigrants (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SAN DIEGO — Critics are still fuming over Bank of America's plan to offer credit cards to people without Social Security numbers or credit histories, characteristics common to illegal immigrants.

CNN's Lou Dobbs called it "idiotic." Roy Beck of Numbers USA, a proponent of immigration controls, accused Bank of America of "unpatriotic greed." Callers on talk radio have suggested the company change its name to "Bank of Mexico." Syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin argued that the company is defying federal immigration law by "aiding and abetting illegal activity." Funny thing. I've had credit cards for more than 20 years, and I don't remember feeling aided and abetted. Preyed upon, maybe.

This circus is not what Javier Palomarez expected. The advertising veteran has spent nearly 20 years helping Fortune 500 companies tap the Hispanic market. In 2002, he was working for Bank of America as senior vice president of marketing when he proposed the idea. It's perfectly legal and logical.

The bank was already experimenting with its SafeSend program, which allows immigrants who open a checking account in the United States to transfer money to a bank in Mexico where it can be retrieved by a third party. Bank of America also offers mortgages for immigrants. Palomarez argued that credit cards were the next step. Not everyone in the company was sold, however, which could explain why it took several years to bring the idea to fruition. Some bank executives feared that illegal immigrants were bad credit risks. "That was the debate," Palomarez told me recently in an interview. "And additionally, the idea was, you know, it's still too close to 9/11."

Not this again. Let's not confuse terrorists with immigrants. Here's a tip on how to keep the two groups straight: One wants to do us harm; the other wants to do our cooking, gardening and child care.

The distinction escapes Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., an anti-immigrant demagogue. Tancredo fears Bank of America might unwittingly give credit to a terrorist. Get real. According to Palomarez, credit limits for illegal immigrants would be about $500. The 9/11 hijackers ran through tens of thousands of dollars in planning the attacks.

I wish critics would give the scare tactics a rest and come clean about what really bugs them: The fear that Americans are getting comfortable with illegal immigration and the concern that initiatives like this will take the steam out of enforcement efforts by making immigrants seem less threatening.

As for this being a giveaway, Palomarez says it was never any such thing. "There is a ton of money to be made," he said. Consider the interest rate. "Just imagine the worst there are," Palomarez said. "Twenty-one percent and up." Immigrants will pay it, he said, because they're grateful to have the card and to build up credit histories.

That's exactly where Bank of America landed — on an interest rate that can top 21%, which is higher than most people pay. As for the claim that illegal immigrants don't pay their bills, Palomarez disagrees. "These people went through a lot of trouble and expense and risk to get here," he said. "They didn't come here to mess it up."

But getting a credit card into the hands of a Latino is only half the battle. You still have to get him to use it. "We were raised that, you know what, if you can't buy it (with) cash, you can't afford it," he said. "That whole mentality hasn't left us yet as a culture."

So how does Bank of America hope to get illegal immigrants hooked on credit? We had millions of dollars worth of campaigns in place dedicated solely to the guy who got the card and hasn't used it," Palomarez said. "Mailers congratulating him on receiving his Bank of America credit card and reminding him of the benefits that the card afforded him, blah, blah, blah. … We knew what buttons to push."

How would they know? "If you've got a guy's debit card, or even his checking account, and you get activity on it, you have such robust data," he said, "because you are in his wallet."

Palomarez is no longer with Bank of America, but he still wants to be in your wallet. Now based in Dallas, he aims to get in there again with his latest venture — a pre-paid debit card, which he and his associates hope will revolutionize how Hispanics (particularly immigrants) handle remittances, purchases and ATM withdrawals. Other companies are doing the same.

It's an interesting idea. But it's not like immigrants are clamoring for debit cards, any more than they're demanding credit cards. That's the whole point. This controversy should dispel the myth that illegal immigrants come here with outstretched palms.

Credit cards aren't freebies, and it isn't immigrants who demand them. These things come along because someone wants to cash in. As with bilingual education and beer sales, this isn't something that is being done for illegal immigrants; it's something that is being done to illegal immigrants. It's such an obvious point that you'd have to be blind not to see it. Of course, fear and nativism have been known to cause a lack of vision in people.

Game With No Winner (NYT)

It's almost enough to make us nostalgic for streaking and sitting on flagpoles. College students from Michigan to Florida have found a new way to get attention, offend others and make a right-wing statement all at once. It's a game with a name that says it all: "Catch the Illegal Immigrant."

The game is a variation on hide and seek: one player poses as the immigrant, and everyone else tries to find that person. There's a prize, usually $200 or less, which is not much, but enough to celebrate the cheap exploitation of a fellow human.

"Catch the Immigrant" is the brainchild of an intern with the College Republican National Committee, who lost her post after coming up with this and other campus recruitment gimmicks. Another game, called "Fun With Guns," invited young Republicans to fire BB guns or paint balls at cardboard cutouts of Democratic leaders. Republican Party leaders have tried to distance themselves from the games, but seem to have done little to stop them.

The right-wing organizers of the immigrant games — particularly Young Americans for Freedom and Young Republicans — have declared piously that they're just trying to spark debate. At that, they have succeeded. Protesters defending immigration and human dignity have outnumbered the game's players at the University of Michigan, Michigan State, Pennsylvania State and other campuses, including, most recently, at New York University.

The reaction from schools has been mostly tepid. Administrators are in a tough spot, trying to balance free speech with offensive behavior. More speech is the answer, including voices of authority pointing out the nastiness of this game as well as the inherent cruelty of hunting people for sport.

"Catch the Immigrant" also reflects a larger misunderstanding of the immigration issue. The more than 11 million illegal immigrants cannot be caught. Even if they could be, rounding them up and deporting them would be disastrous, economically and socially. Educators should teach the game players about the real world.

Minuteman Founder Wants Reins Back (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Jim Gilchrist, the Orange County accountant who gained national recognition as the co-founder of a citizen border patrol group, will ask a judge this afternoon to issue a restraining order in order to regain control of the Minuteman Project.

Earlier this month, Gilchrist was removed by his board of directors, which accused the charismatic anti-illegal-immigrant figure of abusing his power. Minuteman Project officials said they will detail their allegations at a press conference later this afternoon.

The rift, Gilchrist said, "could very well bring an end to the entire Minuteman Project. There are groups around the country with the name, but we are the most well known and the most powerful."

Gilchrist said he did nothing wrong. His opponents, he said, are motivated by "a greed for power and a false perception of an endless stream of money."

He said he plans to continue his work, which began in 2005 with a citizen border patrol that gained widespread media attention and a criticism from President Bush, who called them "vigilantes."

Robert Vasquez — a former county commissioner in Idaho who, in his elected position, sued companies that hired illegal workers — said top conservative leaders turned against Gilchrist. Among them is Barbara Coe, who heads California Coalition for Immigration Reform and co-authored Proposition 187, the ballot measure that sought to deny undocumented immigrants certain public benefits.

"Sometimes a position becomes bigger than the man," Vasquez said. "It's unfortunate that it has reached this point."

Gilchrist opponents filed a complaint against their former leader with the Internal Revenue Service, alleging that he did not obtain nonprofit status for the Minuteman organization and improperly used a discount postal rate to solicit donations.

Gilchrist said a direct mail organization was responsible to secure the nonprofit status and if it hadn't, it didn't amount to a criminal error on his part.

Board members voted to replace Gilchrist with Marvin Stewart, an African American minister. Gilchrist said the board members have no voting power and serve in an advisory capacity.

Semi-Truths (WSJ)

It's nice the U.S. government is finally getting around to meeting its obligations under a trade pact with Mexico ratified a mere 14 years ago. But even that is too fast for some protectionists.

Under the North American Free Trade Agreement, the U.S. was required to lift a ban on Mexican trucks traveling more than 25 miles inside the border. The deadline for doing so was 2000, yet seven years later the ban remains in place. Hence, when Mexican trucks reach the mileage limit, they must off-load and transfer the goods to American trucks, which carry them to their ultimate destination. You can understand why the Teamsters who represent American drivers favor this arrangement, however inefficient, but U.S. consumers pick up the tab.

Last week, the Bush Administration announced a plan to lift the mileage restriction, and unions and their supporters in Congress are predictably crying foul. Rather than acknowledging their protectionist agenda, opponents are raising bogus concerns linked to the supposedly poor "safety" record of Mexican rigs. Teamster President James Hoffa told reporters the Administration is "playing a game of Russian roulette on America's highways." Democratic Senator Patty Murray of Washington says she'll hold hearings.

If these arguments sound familiar, it's because Mr. Hoffa also used them in 2001, when the Bush Administration first tried to lift the mileage restriction to comply with Nafta. Oregon Representative Peter DeFazio warned that there would be "blood on the highway." And David Obey of Wisconsin intoned that "Nafta is a trade pact. It's not a suicide pact."

That hyperbole is just as phony now. It's common practice, both here and south of the border, to use older vehicles to travel short distances. And there's no evidence that Mexican long-haul trucks and drivers are more dangerous than their U.S. counterparts. The latest data show the safety records of the U.S. and Mexico are comparable.

According to the Transportation Department, 32% of Mexican trucks were pulled from the road for safety violations in 2001. Last year that number fell to 21%. Meanwhile, 21% of U.S. trucks failed safety inspections in 2001, versus 23% last year. Mexican drivers are less likely than their U.S. counterparts to be in violation of the law -- 1.2% in 2006, versus 7% for U.S. truckers.

A prohibition on Mexican trucks traveling more than a few miles into the U.S. has resulted in more congestion and pollution at the border. It also means that more investment is going toward shipping items from Point A to Point B than is necessary. Lifting the ban and giving these vehicles full access to the U.S. will streamline the process and reduce costs.

Mexican businesses have no incentive to send rickety trucks north of the border only to break down before reaching their destination. And behaving as if they do -- in order to mask an antitrade agenda -- is no way to treat a neighbor.

AP, February 27, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY An Orem accountant who bilked the government out of millions in taxes from money he garnered through phony investment schemes has been sentenced to five years in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice said Monday.

Lanny R. White was also ordered by U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart to pay $5 million in restitution and spend three years on supervised probation following his release.

White was indicted in 2003 along with 10 others for promoting and selling a fraudulent trust scheme through six phony investment companies between 1993 and 2004. More than 300 clients were told that placing their assets into the trusts would reduce tax liabilities.

All of the 11 indicted – among them four attorneys, one accountant and a former IRS agent – have pleaded guilty to felony charges including wire and mail fraud.

In a plea agreement White said his actions led to the filing of more than 2,000 false and fraudulent income tax and trust tax returns. White also said he knowingly placed clients money in unsound investments that would never pay returns.

The loss to the government is estimated between $7 million and $10 million.

Appraisers' Valuations For Tax Filings Come Under Microscope With New Law (WSJ)

By Arden Dale

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

It may soon become trickier to get an item appraised for tax purposes.

The Pension Protection Act, passed in August, puts appraisers in the sights of the Internal Revenue Service by saying they can be penalized for valuations the agency later decides are off the mark.

The move marks a big change because taxpayers, not appraisers, historically have borne the brunt of a wrong valuation. One result: The cost of getting something appraised may well rise.

Appraisals are used for a number of purposes in tax filings. For instance, noncash assets donated to charity are often appraised so the donor can claim the value as a deduction on his income-tax return and lower his tax bill.

Examples might be an individual who donates to charity a share in a private company that is expected to go public later, or a business that gives a conservation easement to a local government by agreeing not to develop its real estate but to maintain the property for conservation purposes instead.

Now, the PPA has introduced penalties on appraisers, but they aren't alone in facing the music. Accountants, brokers, estate executors and others may also be slapped because of the broad brush with which it was written.

The rule is beginning to have a chilling effect on appraisers because it raises a host of questions, including which kind of tax -- gift and estate tax, income tax, or both -- is affected, and who may be hit by penalties.

The American Bar Association Section of Real Property, Probate and Trust Law have urged the IRS to clear up a number of uncertainties in the rule, which is included in Internal Revenue Code Section 6695A.

The IRS is reviewing these and other comments on the matter and plans to publish regulations later to spell out details of the law, according to an IRS spokesman.

"I've heard indirectly that some appraisers are holding back in terms of doing income- and estate-tax appraisals, or that they're limiting the scope of appraisals," says William Forsberg, a partner at Parsinen Kaplan Rosberg + Gotlieb P.A. in Minneapolis, and co-author of the ABA group comments.

Code Section 6695A simply refers to "any person" as being subject to the penalties. It's not clear whether the rule could extend beyond an appraiser to include, say, an attorney hired by the appraiser to opine on whether an entity is a limited partnership, for example.

"It's the uncertainty as to the exposure that's so troubling," says Hugh Drake, an attorney at Brown, Hay & Stephens LLP in Springfield, Ill. "Appraisers often have to rely on underlying opinions...where does liability begin and end?"

'Living Souls' Admit To Tax Evasion In Plea Deal (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 27, 2007

After months in jail, Sevier millionaire couple drops exempt defense

Maybe it was newfound enlightenment.

Or, it might have been a jail cell that did it.

Whatever the cause, a Sevier County couple who made millions in real estate ventures but insisted they were "living souls" and not U.S. citizens subject to income tax laws dropped their tax protestation convictions Monday and picked up tax evasion convictions instead.

Arnold Ray Schmid and his wife, Kathleen Schmid, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to charges that they refused to file income tax returns on money made from their highly profitable cabin rental and property development businesses for at least three years.

In a plea deal brokered between defense attorneys Richard Gaines and Ralph Harwell and federal prosecutor Jay Nanavati, the Schmids are admitting to a negotiated figure of $53,780 as the tax liability owed the government. The actual figure is likely much higher, according to court records.

The deal also will cut the potential prison terms both faced from years to months. As Gaines noted during Monday's hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan, the couple may already have served, if not the entirety of their respective sentences, then the bulk of them.

It's not as if they didn't earn that pretrial jail time, however. The couple had been allowed free on bond - despite repeated courtroom antics and protests and missed hearings - after their July 2005 arrests on federal tax evasion charges.

But they fled, hiding out for months in the Midwest before the U.S. Marshals Service rounded them up after a probe led by veteran fugitive hunter Deputy U.S. Marshal Becky Gambill.

In the couple's car, marshals found signs that the pair's courtroom antics and strange court filings in which they called themselves "living souls" and contended the government had no dominion over them may have been tactics to avoid prosecution, according to an earlier motion filed by Nanavati.

"In their car were handwritten notes in the defendants' handwriting that read, among things, 'pros and cons of leaving country or just stay in country but move around' (and) 'will they be watching airports?' (and) 'any problems in Venezuela government, are Americans well accepted' (and) 'whenever judge speaks to you pretend that he is speaking Chinese' and 'how do you get money out of the country,' " Nanavati wrote.

It was, ironically, tax deadline day - April 15, 2006 - when the pair were returned to Knoxville and ordered jailed pending Monday's trial. They had been behind bars ever since.

On Monday, however, Jordan agreed to release them despite their earlier flight. Gaines' contention that the two are senior citizens with health problems who already have spent 10 months in jail was a factor, the judge said. Nanavati, a Washington, D.C.-based U.S. Department of Justice tax evasion prosecution specialist, did not resist the move.

"I am going to require electronic monitoring," Jordan said. "I am going to increase your bond. I assure you, if you run again, this court will have no mercy on you."

It's not clear why the government struck a deal in the case. Last Thursday, however, Jordan dealt the prosecution team a blow when he barred them from using the Schmids' notes at trial or making any mention to jurors of the pair's flight to avoid prosecution.

They face sentencing May 24.

IRS To The Rescue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

It's not often that the Internal Revenue Service plays the hero, but these days it's a regular Clark Kent for American expatriates. The agency has issued another round of tax relief for U.S. citizens working abroad hit by Congress's double-taxation laws.

Friday's Notice 2007-25 strikes a blow against a provision in last year's omnibus tax bill that cut tax exemptions on housing for Americans working overseas and substantially raised taxes on compensation above $82,500. The move came courtesy of Republican Senator Chuck Grassley, who apparently thinks Americans abroad are living the high life. Congress claims the tax will raise $2.1 billion for Uncle Sam over the next decade. But that doesn't factor in companies that will cut back on U.S. employees in favor of less expensive locals or third-country hires.

The IRS mitigated some of the damage in October, bumping up tax exemptions on housing in more than 100 specified cities. In the latest notice, Americans working in China and India will see the biggest benefit; special exemptions were instituted for Mumbai and Beijing residents, and several cities already on the IRS's list saw their deductions adjusted upward. A clutch of suburban London towns were also added, presumably because the local American Chamber of Commerce kicked up a fuss. But why is the IRS trying to work out which Yanks live in, say, London versus Surrey?

The U.S. is the only developed nation to tax its citizens abroad. Now China has picked up on Mr. Grassley's grand idea. From March 31, all mainland citizens working abroad will be taxed on their world-wide income. That might give some comfort to U.S. protectionists worried about China's labor competitiveness, even though mainland employees aren't so far a huge force abroad. But as America is now discovering, punitive taxation is an export that comes with a high price.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Governors To Back Tax Reforms (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, February 27, 2007

President Bush encouraged governors Monday to support his call for changing the tax code to help more people buy private health care insurance, but did not address their pleas to increase funding for a health care program that insures millions of children of the working poor.

Still, governors said they heard words of at least partial compromise from the administration on a budget dispute that dominated private discussions among governors Sunday.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the larger challenge of the uninsured. All governors rely on the State Children's Health Insurance Program, intended to aid uninsured working families.

Bush, welcoming the governors after they met privately with several administration officials, did not offer any comments about the children's health program, talking rather about his larger proposals.

"I'm looking forward to working with Congress on health care. I firmly believe ... that states are often times the best place to reform systems and work on programs that meet needs," he said.

But Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt "made it clear that the administration will work with Congress as far as" short-term shortfalls, said North Dakota Gov. John Hoeven, a Republican. Governors say 14 states could run out of cash before October. In Georgia, it could happen as soon as March.

The governors want two things:

_Enough money to keep the program afloat through October. That is estimated at $745 million.

_Changes to Bush's budget. Analysts say his spending plan would shortchange the health program even if the number of people served did not grow. The long-term shortfall is put at $10 billion to $15 billion over the next five years.

Gov. Jon Corzine, a New Jersey Democrat, warned that the administration's budget promised illusory savings. "You end up paying for this in other ways — uncompensated care, emergency rooms," Corzine said. "This is pay me now or pay me later."

Corzine said he still wanted more clarity from administration officials on support for the short-term funding, but said Leavitt had offered words of compromise.

But the long-term issues over the program remained in dispute, governors said.

The program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

DOJ_NMG_0137214

More than a dozen states have expanded SCHIP, with consent of the federal government, to cover adults in those families. The program now insures an estimated 639,000 adults among its 6 million.

Many governors said the administration's efforts to scale back the program would undermine state efforts to craft universal health care plans. Many of these have started with a target of insuring all children.

California, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania have developed some of the most ambitious proposals to try to get to universal health care coverage. Most states have just tried to strengthen their health care system to cover more people.

At their private session Sunday, governors said there was bipartisan support for help on the immediate needs and a long-term commitment to the current program.

Leavitt said Sunday that there is enough money among states to cover short-term shortfalls, if states with surpluses would share with those with deficits, an idea that has little support among governors. Bush wants SCHIP to remain focused on poor children, not all children and not adults, Leavitt said.

Gov. Ed Rendell, D-Pa., said he was confident that a compromise on the money can be found. He said the administration has been helpful to his efforts to expand coverage and approved a waiver that would let the state cover 180,000 more children. "I want to give the administration high praise," he said.

But most were worried. In Rhode Island, GOP Gov. Don Carcieri said aggressive enrollment efforts had boosted their combined Medicaid and SCHIP program so that 94 percent of children were covered, at its height, before administrative hurdles and other problems caused some backsliding.

"We built all that up," Carcieri said. "We don't want to pull the rug out."

Child Health Care Splits White House And States (NYT)

By Robert Pear

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Governors clashed with the White House on Monday over the future of the popular Children's Health Insurance Program, an issue that some members of both parties said was as important as money for the Iraq war.

In the session at the White House, when President Bush reported on progress of the war, governors pressed him to provide more money so they could guarantee health insurance for children. In response, administration officials said states should make better use of the money they already had.

Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, a Republican, said afterward, "Health care for children ought to be a priority, irrespective of anyone's views on the war."

Georgia will exhaust its allotment of federal money for the Children's Health Insurance Program within three months, Mr. Perdue said. Thirteen other states expect to run out by September, according to data released here at the winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

Governors said the Clinton and Bush administrations had encouraged them to expand children's coverage and had granted waivers allowing them to cover parents and even some childless adults.

Having successfully expanded the health insurance programs in their states, some governors now suggest that the Bush administration is pulling the safety net out from under many children.

In his budget this month, Mr. Bush said he wanted to return the program to its "original objective" of covering children with family incomes less than twice the poverty level. Budget documents note that 16 states cover children above that level and that "one state, New Jersey, covers children up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level."

A family of four is classified poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.

An influential member of Congress said Monday that he would not be taking up White House proposals to restrict eligibility and financing for the child health program.

"I have absolutely no intention of moving the president's proposals through our subcommittee," said the lawmaker, Representative Frank Pallone Jr., Democrat of New Jersey.

Mr. Pallone is chairman of the Health Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which has authority over the children's program.

DOJ_NMG_0137215

Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Monday that "Democrats in Congress understand the urgency" of the problem and would provide money to the 14 states that did not have enough to cover their current enrollment. Although Mr. Bush would reduce federal payments for adults and for children with family incomes above 200 percent of the poverty level, Mr. Pallone said states should have discretion to cover children above 200 percent of the poverty level and adults in some circumstances, too.

"In New Jersey, we made a decision to go up to 350 percent of the poverty level, because we have the highest cost of living in the country," Mr. Pallone said.

Likewise, he said, New Jersey found that covering adults increased the likelihood that their children would stay on the rolls.

"The hallmark of all this is flexibility," Mr. Pallone said. "A robust Children's Health Insurance Program is an important part of any effort to try to achieve universal coverage."

The federal government spends $5 billion a year on the program. Mr. Bush wants to continue that level, and he is seeking an "additional allotment" of $4.8 billion over the next five years.

States would need substantially more to continue their programs with current eligibility rules and benefits. New estimates from the Congressional Budget Office show that the states face shortfalls of $700 million this year and a total shortage of $13.4 billion from 2008 to 2012.

Gov. Jim Douglas of Vermont, a Republican, said the Bush proposals would jeopardize his state's phenomenal success in covering children. In Vermont, he said, fewer than 4 percent of the children are uninsured, and "we don't want to lose ground."

Bush administration officials emphasized that states received a fixed amount of federal money each year, and they said individual children did not have a legal entitlement to benefits. Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, said he would work with Congress to find "a short-term solution" for states exhausting their allotments this year. He said states could avoid shortfalls by managing their programs better.

In his experience as governor of Utah, Mr. Leavitt said, "when we were out of an allotment, we just discontinued enrolling people until we had room." Likewise, he said, states could cover more people if they provided less comprehensive benefits.

Gov. Ted Strickland of Ohio, a Democrat, said: "If we don't get the money we need, children will go without coverage."

"In the meeting with the president and Secretary Leavitt," Mr. Strickland said, "when questions were raised about children maybe having to be removed from the program or eligible children not being able to participate, we were told that that was basically a management problem."

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey, a Democrat, said that under the president's proposals "we will end up having fewer children covered." That prospect "was chilling to some of us," Mr. Corzine said, adding that states wanted to avoid "rationing health care to our most vulnerable and our most needy."

Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, said Mr. Bush's budget request was "clearly insufficient" to continue coverage for the six million children enrolled in the program.

Many governors want to expand the program, which they see as a foundation for their efforts to expand coverage generally.

Mr. Rendell framed the issue as a choice, asking: "Should we be giving tax cuts to billionaires and millionaires or should we be giving health care to children? Should we make health care for children, at the very least, an entitlement?"

Domestic policy is in a straitjacket because of the cost of the war, the cost of tax cuts and the president's plan to balance the budget within five years, Mr. Rendell said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, a Republican, said federal aid was essential to his $12 billion plan for universal health coverage. Mr. Schwarzenegger said that in a private meeting he told the president, "We need the federal government's help." He did not say whether he got a commitment.

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Governors from both parties are opposing President Bush's budget for a health care program that insures millions of children of the working poor, warning that failure to meet its spending needs will inflate the already high number of uninsured.

The budget dispute dominated discussions among governors Sunday, who promised to bring the matter to Bush and his Cabinet officials at private meetings Monday.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the larger challenge of the uninsured. All governors rely on the State Children's Health Insurance Program, intended to aid uninsured working families.

"It's a matter of doing the right thing," said Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican. "It's non-partisan. It's bipartisan."

Gov. Jon Corzine, a New Jersey Democrat, warned that the administration's budget promised illusory savings. "You end up paying for this in other ways — uncompensated care, emergency rooms," Corzine said. "This is pay me now or pay me later."

Georgia and New Jersey are two of 14 states that are expected to run out of money for the program before the next budget year begins in October; in Georgia, it could happen as soon as March.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said he had met privately with governors, and would keep talking. But he offered little hope that the administration would accept governors' demands.

Bush welcomed the governors to a formal dinner at the White House Sunday night and said he looked forward to talking with governors about health care, along with homeland security and immigration. "I believe if we work together we can do a lot of good things," he said.

The program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

More than a dozen states have expanded SCHIP, with consent of the federal government, to cover adults in those families. The program now insures an estimated 639,000 adults among its 6 million.

Bush Seeks Governors' Support For Health Plan (USAT)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

President Bush met with the nation's governors to encourage their support for his proposal to change the tax laws to help people buy private health insurance. He did not address their pleas for more money for a program that insures millions of children of the working poor.

DOJ_NMG_0137217

The governors say Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 doesn't provide enough money for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

"You end up paying for this in other ways: uncompensated care, emergency rooms," said New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, a Democrat.

Bush wants to encourage more Americans to buy health insurance by offering tax deductions that would be financed by a new tax on employer-provided health insurance. Families would get a standard tax deduction of $15,000 a year; individuals would get $7,500. The value of employer-provided health benefits exceeding the deduction would be taxed as income.

Former House aide guilty in bribery probe

William Heaton, 28, admitted accepting favors from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff or his associates and then, in return, helping their clients. No date was set for sentencing.

Ney, R-Ohio, was sentenced in January to 2½ years in prison for trading political favors for campaign donations and personal gifts.

Journalists honor Frederick Douglass

Frederick Douglass, a runaway slave who became the first black reporter in the Capitol press galleries, was remembered Monday as a pioneering journalist who championed equal rights.

The committee of reporters that oversees the Capitol's media areas dedicated a plaque and portrait to Douglass, who was a member of the congressional press galleries from 1870-74.

Douglass came to Washington in the 1870s after he was asked to lead the New National Era, which chronicled the progress of blacks throughout the country. He later bought the newspaper after it ran into money trouble, but the enterprise collapsed in 1874 after a post-Civil War financial crisis wiped out many businesses in the city.

Bush Vows To Fight Democrats On War Funds (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he would take on congressional Democrats who hope to hamstring his use of war funds.

"I'm looking forward to a healthy debate. I'm also looking forward to defending, strongly defending the budgets we send up to Congress," Mr. Bush said during a morning White House speech to the National Governors Association, which is holding its annual meeting this week in the District.

The president said he wants to "make sure those troops who are in harm's way have the resources and that we have the flexibility necessary to ... execute the plan we've laid out."

Mr. Bush later spoke at the Republican Governors Association gala, which raised $10.4 million for the group, telling a crowd of several hundred at the National Building Museum last night that "failure in Iraq is unacceptable."

"Soon the United States Congress will have to make a decision that will have real consequences -- whether or not to fund the troops we have sent into harm's way," Mr. Bush said.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, Kansas Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, will appear today with Senate Democrats to criticize "an escalation policy that is stretching the National Guard to the limit."

House Democratic leaders have said they plan to restrain the president's use of war funds by attaching restrictions to appropriations bills, starting with the supplemental-funding bill next month.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, announced his plan to bar funding for Mr. Bush's Iraq troop surge, unless the military meets certain requirements on training and equipment that Mr. Murtha said it could not.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, have indicated that they favor Mr. Murtha's plan to the more drastic approach of cutting off funding all together.

Republicans have labeled the Murtha plan a "slow-bleed strategy" and have said it will deprive U.S. troops of needed reinforcements and funding.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, yesterday called on Mrs. Pelosi to reject Mr. Murtha's plan.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, have indicated that they favor repealing the 2002 authorization of force and writing one that would withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by spring 2008 and would limit remaining troops to noncombat missions. Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan are expected to announce the details of their plan today.

However, Republicans have said that doing so would be "micromanaging" the war, and the White House has argued that the 2002 authorization still applies to the current conflict.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that many doubt the need for a continued U.S. presence in Iraq, during his morning speech to both Democratic and Republican governors.

"Obviously, there's concerns about the decisions I have made regarding Iraq, and I understand that," Mr. Bush said. "But you've just got to understand ... if we leave Iraq before the job is done, the enemy will follow us here."

O'Malley: Governors' Concerns Not Addressed (BSUN)

By David Nitkin

The Baltimore Sun, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON // Gov. Martin O'Malley sat tight-lipped through a White House meeting with President Bush Monday and later criticized the president, saying he spent more time defending the administration's Iraq policy than addressing concerns about health care and immigration raised by the nation's governors.

O'Malley, who has been attending his first meeting of the National Governors Association since being elected governor, participated in two hours of morning meetings with Bush Cabinet officials, followed by a half-hour session with the president. Only the association's chairwoman, Gov. Janet Napolitano, an Arizona Democrat; and the vice chairman, Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican from Minnesota, questioned Bush directly.

"President Bush answered each of them, and went back to vamping for about 15 or 20 minutes as to why he is exactly right in what he is doing with the decisions he has made to get us into Iraq and to escalate the war," O'Malley said. "What is the word we use now? Surge?"

O'Malley, a Democrat and former Baltimore mayor, criticized the Republican administration before becoming governor last month.

During remarks at a fundraiser for Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry in 2004, O'Malley drew rebukes after he said, "As mayor of the city, I was very, very worried about al-Qaida and still am. But I'm even more worried about the actions and inactions of the Bush administration."

In February 2005, O'Malley said Bush's budget was an attack on U.S. cities similar to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

O'Malley did thank the White House, however, for allowing him to take his daughter, Grace, to a state dinner Sunday night. His wife, Katie Curran O'Malley, did not attend.

The governors meeting, which ends today, has focused on education, immigration and, in particular, health care. A program that combines federal and state money to provide health insurance for children will expire this year, and governors want the program extended. Napolitano, Pawlenty and others sent the president a letter Monday requesting also that more money be available for states that will overspend their allotments this year.

Bush has proposed reducing the scope of the program so that it concentrates on only the neediest children -- those in families earning two times the federal poverty level. In Maryland, O'Malley is pushing for legislation that goes in the opposite direction, covering children in families that earn four times the poverty level.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday that the president's health care plan gives states money from a different source -- a proposal called Affordable Choices -- to continue covering wealthier children. "We believe in flexibility, too," Snow said.

But many health care analysts say the president's budget plan would remove children from the health insurance program because it contains insufficient funds.

The topic came up at the White House, but "they seem pretty rigid, and they seem pretty inflexible," O'Malley said.

In addition to defending his decisions on Iraq, Bush talked about immigration, the No Child Left Behind education law and alternative fuels.

Analysis: Health Reform Unites, Divides (UPI)

By Olga Pierce

United Press International, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 (UPI) -- Nine out of 10 Americans want healthcare reform, but they are divided over how much, what kind, and who they trust to do it, a new UPI/Zogby poll says.

As campaign season begins to pick up steam, an equal percentage of respondents, 45 percent, said they supported major reform and minor reform. They were similarly split between wanting market-based and government-based solutions.

Less than one-third said they trust President Bush to handle healthcare issues, but the Democratic Congress, at 45 percent, did not have the trust of a majority of voters either. One in five of those surveyed said they do not trust either of them.

What that means, many experts say, is that successful reform proposals will reach across the political spectrum to incorporate both government and private-sector reforms.

"People want change, they just don't agree about it," Harvard health policy professor Robert Blendon told United Press International.

"The momentum for reform is not enough to make something happen," he said. "There has to be a hybrid proposal and political leadership.

The poll's results support that theory: 56 percent of those surveyed said they support a plan enacted in Massachusetts and a similar proposal in California that require individuals, the government and employers to all chip in to cover the uninsured.

While the public will not support purely government-funded reforms, Blendon said, they are also not enthused about Bush's plans to lower costs through tax reforms and greater consumer responsibility. That is because they are concerned about the "pocketbook issue" of being able to afford insurance, not the broader social problem of rising overall healthcare costs.

"Consumers are saying, 'Help me pay for healthcare,' not, 'Give me a plan with a $2,000 deductible to hold down healthcare costs,'" Blendon added. People see Bush's proposal as a "smaller vision in a world that's about to have a larger debate. Republicans are likely in 2008 to talk more broadly than just the president's plan."

The division between those who prefer government-based and market-based plans is not new, said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a healthcare consumer advocacy group.

What is new is the willingness to compromise, he told UPI, as evidenced by unlikely coalitions of labor unions, employer groups, insurance companies and healthcare provider associations to cover the uninsured.

"People have found virtue in a second-favorite approach rather than nothing. Before, every group came in with a top-priority proposal, and if it wasn't possible, they walked away from the table."

The poll data also obscure an area of remarkable consensus, he said, around making sure all children have health insurance -- an issue Congress will have to address this year when the State Children's Health Insurance Program comes up for reauthorization.

That new spirit of compromise, however, may not make it into the next election, Pollack said.

"During the campaign season is not the time when you get thoughtful compromise. You try to attract and motivate different constituents.

"But concern about healthcare has been catapulted to the top of the agenda. Any thoughtful candidate who wins will have to do something that involves a mix of approaches to get reform through Congress."

The public's range of opinion, combined with the upcoming election season, could also open up an opportunity for voters to learn more about the various plans on the table, James T. Kahn, professor of health policy at the University of California, San Francisco, told UPI.

"The new crew of politicians have an option to look at everything on the table and see what works best. This is a chance to act on the flexibility the public is giving them," Kahn said.

"There is an educational process even in the politically charged election season. The public wants to know whatever choice there is will make them do as well or better."

The downside of election season is that some groups may try to sway the public away from the center, he said. "These policies are hard to understand, and political groups may try to influence the public one way or the other."

Bush Launches Fundraising Campaign (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 27, 2007

Returning to campaign mode, President Bush on Monday began his fundraising drive to help Republicans regain the power they lost less than four months ago.

"My political agenda is this: more Republican governors, take back control of the House and the Senate and make sure we keep the White House in 2008," Bush told cheering donors at a private reception for the Republican Governors Association.

The annual event raised a record $10.4 million for GOP gubernatorial candidates.

Bush said Republicans belong to "the party of ideas" and predicted voters would come back if they see results. "That's how we got the majority, and that's what it's going to take to get the majority back — standing on principle," Bush said.

Voters last November put Democrats in control of the House and Senate, weakening Bush's ability to push through legislation. The 2006 election also saw Republican governors lose the majority of governorships they had held since 1994.

Bush, despite sagging popularity, still raised more than $193 million at about 90 events in the last election season. His final fundraising chapter as president continues Friday with an event in Kentucky for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

In his 25-minute speech at the cavernous National Building Museum, Bush energetically defended his agenda. "I'm proud of our foreign policy," Bush said. "And for the next two years, I will conduct it with all my soul, with all my might, because I believe it's in the best interests of the United States of America."

The president again warned Congress not to try to cut off funding for troops in Iraq or limit his military options.

The House has already passed a nonbinding measure to oppose Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq, although Senate Republicans recently thwarted two Democratic attempts to pass such a resolution in that chamber.

"Our men and women in uniform risk their lives to carry out our plan to support this new democracy and to secure Baghdad," Bush said. "And wherever members may stand on my decision, we have a solemn responsibility to give our troops the resources and the flexibility they need to prevail."

Republican governors have mostly been supportive of Bush, who was once part of their ranks. But some have acknowledged concern about the war's impact. And most have joined with Democrats to complain about potential Bush budget cuts on Medicaid, education and homeland security, as well as a reliance on the National Guard.

Lawmakers To Scrutinize Walter Reed (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Several House and Senate committees will begin oversight hearings into how Walter Reed Army Medical Center subjected wounded soldiers and Marines to bureaucratic indifference and allowed them to live in squalor.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a leading critic of the Iraq war, has scheduled a closed hearing on Friday and Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), an Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee chairman, announced yesterday that he intended to conduct a field hearing to Walter Reed next Monday.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has planned a hearing for the following day and the House Armed Services Committee is also planning an oversight hearing.

The Washington Post reported earlier this month on the deplorable conditions at Walter Reed. For example, a soldier accepted a Purple Heart in his gym clothes because the Army did not replace his torn uniform; soldiers have had to prove that they fought in Iraq; and some wounded soldiers have lived in substandard housing.

"It probably didn't occur to my colleagues that you should do a physical inspection of the building," Tierney said, adding that he has requested documents and government reports and plans to interview social workers, families, administrators and troops to understand "how these things came to be, why didn't they know earlier."

The hearings could foreshadow Democratic tactics as they craft a budget resolution and political message to keep President Bush on the defensive for his conduct of the war in Iraq and, more specifically, over a $2 billion proposed cut to veterans' healthcare. Democrats will also make the point that pre- and post-war planning has been inadequate.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll found that Americans trust Democrats by a 54-34 percent margin to handle the Iraq war. Democrats have slipped seven points in the past month, while the number of Americans who have no confidence in either party shot up five points.

"This reflects a culture of disregard, almost contempt for the men and women in the military. My view is that the same lack of planning in the run-up to the war is being repeated," said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.), who called for hearings shortly after the news reports appeared.

"Congress is going to jump all over this … Whoever is responsible for this debacle at Building 18 — their heads should roll," Welch said, referring to a deteriorating Army-owned residence that housed wounded soldiers.

Welch was among the first group of lawmakers to call for hearings last week when he sent a letter to Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.).

Tierney took the initiative and told Waxman in a letter yesterday that he intended to hold a hearing on March 5 at Walter Reed.

"This is an investigative first hearing so that we can eventually unwind this thing so that systemic changes can be made," Tierney said.

An e-mail and phone call to Walter Reed's public affairs office were not returned. A spokeswoman for Murtha said he would conduct a press conference later this week, but for now he was not speaking to reporters.

Rep. Harry Mitchell (D-Ariz.), who is scheduled to visit wounded soldiers from Arizona at Walter Reed on Friday, proposed holding a joint hearing with House Armed Services Oversight subcommittee Chairman Marty Meehan (D-Mass.).

Mitchell and Meehan spoke after Meehan returned from a six-day visit to Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait and Brussels, Belgium. But the full committee had decided to conduct a hearing, said an aide to Meehan.

The big question for lawmakers is how to get answers about why so many Army leaders were unaware of the conditions at the hospital.

For Welch, the Iraq war has hit home hard: Vermont has the highest per-capita death toll of any state, in part because it has one of the highest enlistment rates in the National Guard.

He visited a Veterans Affairs clinic yesterday in Colchester, Vt., and found the conditions were clean and the services adequate. Welch said that most of the complaints he has heard have been minor ones.

A Firsthand Report On The Wounds Of War (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 26 -- At the moment of impact, when the roadside bomb sent shrapnel and rocks hurtling into his face, Bob Woodruff says, "I saw my body floating below me, kind of a whiteness."

"Am I alive?" the ABC anchor asked the crew accompanying him in the Iraqi tank 13 months ago.

He was, but just barely.

When Woodruff awoke from a 36-day coma, he couldn't remember his brothers' names, couldn't even remember that he had twin 6-year-old daughters. The top of the right side of his head was missing, after surgeons were forced to remove part of his skull.

By contrast, the man who met reporters here Monday was upbeat, lucid and funny, if still unable to fully comprehend what happened. "In so many ways it's a miracle," Woodruff said.

He was, like any journalist, determined to tell his story. But in an hour-long special that airs Tuesday night at 10, Woodruff does more than that. He visits with Iraq veterans who also suffered traumatic brain injuries, documents their painfully slow progress and accuses the Pentagon of withholding information about how widespread these debilitating wounds have become.

Woodruff's reporting packs an emotional punch because he is, quite simply, a man who cheated death. Never before had an anchor for an American broadcast network been injured in war. Woodruff instantly became a symbol of the dangers that journalists face in Iraq, and is trying to use his higher profile to illuminate the plight of soldiers who struggle with these injuries far from the spotlight.

When he talks to these men, when he calls them "brother," when he hugs their loved ones, the bond is unmistakable.

Woodruff, 45, is launching a multimedia campaign that includes appearances Tuesday with Oprah Winfrey and on "Good Morning America," and the release of a book ("In an Instant") written with his wife, Lee, about their ordeal.

Lee Woodruff is the emotional heart of the television special as she recalls, in a narrative punctuated by home video, talking to doctors about her husband's condition. "I remember asking if he was going to be blind or deaf, and they didn't know," she says.

Each day, she says, she tried to "calibrate how much hope I was going to have that day." Before Bob came out of the coma, she worried that he would not recognize her. "Will he still love me?" Lee recalls asking a doctor.

After a screening of the program Monday, Bob Woodruff said: "Every time I see my wife crying, it kills me a little bit."

In January 2006, Woodruff, a lawyer who had switched to journalism in hopes of becoming a foreign correspondent, had just begun as co-anchor, with Elizabeth Vargas, of ABC's "World News." The plan was for them to alternate on the road.

"Bob was on top of the world," Jon Banner, executive producer of "World News," says on the program. "He was riding this wave."

When Woodruff arrived in Baghdad for his seventh visit since 2002, he and three crew members embedded themselves with an Iraqi unit to examine whether the country's soldiers were ready to assume more of the burden from the U.S. military.

Woodruff was taping part of his report Jan. 29, standing in the turret of a tank, when an improvised explosive device, or IED, went off. He and cameraman Doug Vogt, who was less seriously injured, were airlifted to a field hospital in Balad. Woodruff was in surgery 37 minutes after the explosion.

A CT scan of Woodruff's skull taken two days later showed rocks and debris lodged in his face and neck. One half-dollar-size rock narrowly missed severing a key artery. The explosion damaged the part of the brain that controls speech.

Woodruff continued his recuperation at Bethesda Naval Medical Center. In the documentary, he begins to cry when he returns to the hospital months later to thank the staff, and his wife shows him the bed where he was confined.

Woodruff is seen with his four children, struggling in the early months of his recovery to relearn everyday words. Looking at flash cards, he cannot remember what a hammer is called until prompted with the letter H. He struggles, with the children's help, to pronounce "belt buckle." At first he could not lift his left arm.

When physicians gave Lee a pessimistic prognosis, she recalled saying: "You don't know my Bob. He's a fighter."

His progress, which stunned his doctors, contrasts sharply with that of the other brain-damaged veterans who struggle to speak when Woodruff interviews them and their families. Some of that footage is hard to watch.

The ABC program says the veterans receive good care at the Veterans Administration's regional medical centers but that local VA hospitals are often ill-prepared to deal with traumatic brain injuries. The patients have, in the bureaucratic language of an inspector general's report, "sub-optimal access to care." One young man, who had been making progress at a larger VA facility, is seen losing some speech and motor skills as a paperwork snafu blocks his admission to a hospital back home.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson tells Woodruff that his agency is devoting considerable resources to brain-injured patients. But the program charges that military officials are withholding information on the extent of such injuries among Iraq veterans, and that many soldiers also suffer from "invisible" brain injuries that go undiagnosed for long periods. A veterans' advocate accuses the Pentagon of issuing "gag orders" on discussing traumatic brain injuries, and Woodruff reports that the department declined to release some information for "operational security reasons."

Woodruff, for his part, still fumbles occasionally for the right word. At Monday's press briefing, he said he had "news" when he meant "knowledge," then stopped and corrected himself.

Woodruff said he did not regret having gone to Iraq, but that he would "have to be an idiot" not to think about what he could have done differently.

Asked if he would return to Baghdad, Woodruff refused to rule it out, but ABC News President David Westin did it for him. Given Woodruff's brain injury, Westin said, "it would be the height of recklessness. . . . It would be insane." Westin praised Woodruff's "resilience and strength of character."

Woodruff's facial scars are no longer visible; doctors glued a synthetic piece of skull where the missing piece had been. He plays tennis, swims and skis -- limited by blindness in the upper-right corner of both eyes -- but his wife has barred him from basketball and soccer.

While he may try to return to anchoring one day, Woodruff said, "I love reporting, and that is plenty for me." He plans to keep focusing on the problems of veterans.

"Will I get back to 100 percent? Probably not," Woodruff said. "But if I get in the 90s, that's pretty good."

'I'm Lucky,' ABC's Bob Woodruff Says (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK — Spend some time talking to ABC's Bob Woodruff, and it's nearly impossible to tell that he was almost been killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq on Jan. 29, 2006, and sustained such severe brain trauma that it required removing part of his skull.

"I'm lucky," Woodruff told reporters Monday in his first interview since he was wounded. "This turned out a lot better than it could have."

His face, some scars aside, looks about the same as it did when he co-anchored World News Tonight for just 27 days, until the 28th nearly cost him his life as he rode atop a tank in Taji, north of Baghdad.

Woodruff says he still has difficulty remembering certain words, but as he fields questions, his mind — he's a lawyer — seems as sharp as ever. That prompts questions of whether he'll ever anchor World News Tonight again.

ABC News president David Westin doesn't rule it out. "Every time there has been a juncture in Bob's progress, he has exceeded it. I think we would be really foolish to underestimate Bob. I think we should assume the best."

But Westin says he will not send Woodruff back to Iraq because Woodruff would be more vulnerable, having already suffered severe trauma. "It would be the height of recklessness."

Woodruff says he's optimistic about his future. "When I woke up, I couldn't remember a single state in this country. I couldn't remember my brothers' names, and I couldn't remember my two youngest daughters — not just their names but their existence.

"You can see the change from then to now is significant, but there's still more to do," says Woodruff, who has gone from five to six days a week of therapy down to one. "Will I get to 100%? Probably unlikely, but maybe if I get to somewhere in the 90s, that would be pretty damn good."

Such are the wonders of modern trauma-treatment techniques as practiced by U.S. military doctors on Woodruff and his cameraman, Doug Vogt, after they were severely injured while reporting on American efforts to hand over military responsibilities to the Iraqis.

But many others — from soldiers who also have suffered severe head traumas from bullets and bombs in Iraq to their families now coping with those injuries — have not been so lucky.

In an emotional ABC special tonight, To Iraq and Back (10 ET/PT), Woodruff reports on what happened to him, on his recovery and on the severe care crisis facing thousands of injured soldiers who have suffered brain injuries and are now under the care of the U.S. government.

"It was very important to me for the story to be about others who had gone through the same thing," Woodruff says. This type of severe head injury "happens to Marines and soldiers every day, but a lot of times it won't get covered (by the media) because no one is there to see it happen."

Woodruff, 45, says he plans to continue covering the story in future ABC News specials. He's not worried about remaining objective on an issue close to his heart.

"It's impossible to remain objective on many stories, but I've always reported what I thought was truthful, no matter how I got the story," he says. "A lot of questions need to be asked about what is going on with the treatment of soldiers who come back injured."

One Man's Survival Story Becomes A Rallying Cry (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

It was many weeks before ABC's Bob Woodruff realized how lucky he was to survive a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq in January 2006. It took months for him to understand how lucky he was to recover as fully as he did.

Few do. And that is one of the more sobering lessons of "To Iraq and Back," Mr. Woodruff's account of his ordeal on ABC tonight. Many veterans with similar traumatic brain injuries may never fully regain their ability to speak, walk or pick up a glass of water.

"I've seen probably less than five that have actually been able to walk back into the I.C.U. and thank us for what we did," Alison Bischoff, one of the nurses who treated Mr. Woodruff at the Bethesda Naval Hospital in Maryland, says in this documentary. "So, to me, he's a miracle."

Mr. Woodruff, who makes a point of saying he was privileged to receive the "best civilian and military care in the world," wants viewers to know that veterans with traumatic brain injuries who rely solely on Veterans Affairs medical centers do not always receive the same quality of care.

"To Iraq and Back" is remarkably compelling, mostly because the documentary, while moving, is not just a heart-wrenching portrait of one man's courageous struggle. Mr. Woodruff and his wife, Lee, have published a book about their experience, "In an Instant: A Family's Journey of Love and Healing," and will soon be telling their inspiring tale to Diane Sawyer, Oprah Winfrey and others.

On this ABC News special, Mr. Woodruff tells his story with candor and restraint, then turns the focus to the men and women who return badly wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan and do not heal as thoroughly.

Mr. Woodruff was named co-anchor of "World News Tonight" less than a month before he went to Iraq. His injury was a huge story and a milestone in the public's perception of the war; it was already all too obvious that soldiers, American and Iraqi, were wounded and killed by roadside bombs and ambushes every day. But the explosion that injured Mr. Woodruff and, to a lesser extent, Doug Vogt, a cameraman, dramatically brought home how vulnerable all Americans, even visiting anchors, are over there.

Like celebrities who battle cancer, H.I.V. or Parkinson's disease, Mr. Woodruff decided to put his fame and experience to public use. And like so many people fueled by a sense of mission, he seeks government accountability.

The film notes that the Department of Defense puts the number of men and women wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan at about 23,000, while the Department of Veterans Affairs has recorded treating more than 200,000 veterans of those two wars. Paul Sullivan, the director of programs at the advocacy group Veterans for America, says, "What you have are two sets of books."

Mr. Woodruff politely asks the secretary of veterans affairs, R. James Nicholson, to explain the discrepancy. Citing department reports that list 73,000 mental disorders, 61,000 diseases of the nervous system and others, Mr. Woodruff says, "These are huge numbers beyond the 23,000."

Mr. Nicholson, a Vietnam veteran and a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, replies, "A lot of them come in for, for dental problems."

Mr. Woodruff illustrates quite graphically that some veterans are sent home to recuperate in smaller cities that do not have veterans' hospitals equipped to handle the growing number of those returning with severe traumatic injuries. He interviews a young soldier who is slowly but steadily recovering at a state-of-the-art veterans' polytrauma rehabilitation center in Tampa, Fla., then checks in on him weeks later in his hometown in Texas, where he has noticeably regressed.

Mr. Woodruff's own recovery took time, hard work and the best medical care Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York City could provide.

The earliest images of Mr. Woodruff on a hospital bed, filmed with a home video camera by family members, are alarming: he lies in the intensive care unit at Bethesda with the left side of his skull bashed in like a dented car. Even after the doctors send him home in a helmet, Mr. Woodruff has trouble identifying a pair of scissors or recalling the word Iraq. He says he still has trouble retrieving words and remembering names. He has almost no memory of the explosion itself.

On even the most serious network news programs, a correspondent's conversations with wounded veterans or disaster victims are almost always hard to watch; the interviewer's cloying displays of compassion grate. Mr. Woodruff speaks to wounded soldiers not as a visiting celebrity but as a peer and, perhaps most important, one whose mere appearance lends hope.

When asked by Mr. Woodruff how he is doing, Sgt. William Glass, a 23-year-old from Eugene, Ore., who suffered a traumatic brain injury during his second deployment in Iraq, replies, "Pretty well." Actually, he looks terrible: his face is as swollen and his head as squashed as Mr. Woodruff's were a year earlier.

Mr. Woodruff asks the soldier if he remembers what happened to him in Iraq, but Sergeant Glass is staring at Mr. Woodruff's smooth cheek and unscarred brow. "You look great," he says wonderingly.

It's impossible not to hope that Sergeant Glass will also be as lucky. "To Iraq and Back" makes it clear that the odds are against him — and that the government should do more to improve them.

Vietnam Pilot Honored After Deferring To Wingman (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Forty-one years after repeatedly leading a two-helicopter team into a region of Vietnam dubbed the "Valley of Death," retired Army helicopter pilot Bruce Crandall received the Medal of Honor on Monday at a White House ceremony.

Crandall, 74, might have been eligible to receive the award — the nation's highest military medal — years earlier. But he withdrew his name from consideration in the 1990s because he worried his quest for the medal might take precedence over that of his wingman and friend, Ed Freeman.

"If only one of them were to receive the Medal of Honor, he wanted it to be his wingman," President Bush said in the East Room before placing the blue-ribboned medal around Crandall's neck. "Today the story comes to its rightful conclusion: Bruce Crandall receives the honor he always deserved."

The two have been friends since basic training. On Nov. 14, 1965, they teamed up during a vicious battle later memorialized in a book and the Mel Gibson film We Were Soldiers.

On that day, about 450 American troops had landed in a remote area of Vietnam near the Cambodian border. They were unaware that their landing in the Ia Drang Valley was amid a major sanctuary for the North Vietnamese Army.

The Americans were surrounded by about 2,000 North Vietnamese soldiers and came under intense attack. Crandall and Freeman flew the injured out to a base and returned with troops and ammunition. They kept making trips back and forth even though they were being shot at by enemy fighters, sometimes only 30 yards away.

They flew through a cloud of smoke and a wave of bullets, Bush said. Ground commanders ordered a halt to the airlifts because of the danger, but Crandall kept going, and Freeman joined him.

"We knew that if we didn't do it our guys would go down," Crandall said in an interview last week.

The two men made 22 trips over 14 hours. Crandall switched helicopters three times after the aircraft were shot up.

The two men pulled more than 70 Americans out of the battle zone. The battalion lost 79 men, but the North Vietnamese were overcome.

"For the soldiers rescued, for the men who came home, for the children they had and the lives they made, America is in debt to Bruce Crandall," Bush said. "It's a debt our nation can never really fully repay, but today we recognize it as best as we're able."

An unarmed helicopter pilot who flew through a hail of bullets to rescue 70 wounded Americans in one of the fiercest battles of the Vietnam War was awarded the Medal of Honor, 41 years later. The pilot, Lt. Col. Bruce Crandall, 74, received the nation's highest military honor for his valor in repeatedly flying into enemy fire to bring in ammunition and supplies and evacuate the wounded. His actions in la Drang Valley were depicted in the 2002 movie "We Were Soldiers," adapted from the book "We Were Soldiers Once ... And Young." President Bush, in a White House ceremony, said Colonel Crandall had to fly three different helicopters over the course of the mission.

Business And Labor Square Off On Bills (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Business and labor lobbies square off this week over a House measure that would make it easier for workers to form unions, which have struggled for years with declining membership.

The Democratic-dominated House is expected to pass the Employee Free Choice Act on Thursday — a legislative victory for labor in a body that business interests dominated during the 12-year Republican reign.

But House Democrats and their labor allies face the same problem House Republicans and their big-business friends faced: the Senate filibuster. As a result, the bill has much tougher chances in the Senate than House. The administration is another obstacle. President Bush has indicated he will veto the bill if it arrives on his desk.

Despite these factors, business interests are still nervous as they face the new political reality on Capitol Hill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Manufacturers Association and other business groups have formed a new coalition to oppose the measure.

"The concern is widespread in the business community," said Jade West, a lobbyist for the National Association of Wholesalers-Distributors, one of the business groups lobbying against the bill. West described it as a "monumental shift" in how unions are organized.

With 234 cosponsors, the measure is expected to pass in the House. But business groups are trying to keep the margin of victory relatively small to build momentum for the real battle in the Senate. West describes herself as "relatively comfortable, not overconfident" that the legislation's supporters will not find the 60 votes needed to deny a filibuster.

The lobbying strategy of big business has focused in particular on the measure's provision that negates the need for a "secret ballot" for workers to register anonymously their position on whether to unionize.

Such a provision may sound undemocratic. But labor groups argue that businesses exploit the secret ballot to delay and frustrate organizing. In addition, employers can mount expensive campaigns before the day of the vote, and they have more access to workers than labor leaders often do.

Under the House bill, a union would be certified if a majority of workers openly sign union cards. That can happen now, but the employer has the right to either accept the cards outright or require that workers vote again in a secret ballot.

Another bone of contention is a provision that would introduce a third-party arbiter to manage the collective-bargaining process if business and labor have not reached compromise after 120 days of negotiation.

Labor groups argue that foot-dragging by employers can delay an agreement for years. But West said the third-party arbiter would have too much power. For example, it could introduce new rules that neither the union nor the employer had contemplated, West said.

The bill would also increase the financial penalties if employers try to intimidate workers from joining a union. Labor groups say such penalties are a key piece of the bill: "There are numerous examples of workers [who are] denied a fair right to organize," said Stephanie Mueller, a spokeswomen for the Service Employees International Union.

Fewer and fewer workers are members of a union these days. In 2006, 12 percent of employed wage and salary workers were unionized, down from 12.5 percent the year before, according the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The actual number of union workers fell by 326,000 to 15.4 million in 2006. In 1983, more than 20 percent of workers were union members.

If business interests lose the union vote, they may score a win with another measure in the House. On Wednesday, the body will take up a measure to update the rules governing the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. (CFIUS), which was obscure until a company called Dubai Ports World made a bid last year to oversee American ports.

That sparked a push to toughen federal reviews of deals involving foreign investments as well as dozens of press conferences and media appearances featuring outraged lawmakers. In the end, though, the 109th Congress was unable to deliver a bill. Congress will try again this year, and business interests hope this time it will succeed.

CFIUS is charged with reviewing foreign investment deals with national-security implications. While the pending bill has the potential to make reviews more stringent — for example, by requiring an additional 45-day review if the purchaser is owned or controlled by a foreign government — business believes the bill will reduce the political sensitivity that surrounds foreign investment.

"It's a good product," said Todd Malan, the president and CEO of the Organization for International Investment.

Last year, the GOP-governed House agreed. It passed a similar measure on suspension (that is, with no amendments), with nary a "no" vote. This year, it is expected to come to the floor under an open rule. Accordingly, there is some concern on K Street that members like Reps. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) or John Murtha (D-Pa.) could add amendments to alter the measure significantly. But most believe this is unlikely, even though negotiations were continuing at press time.

The measure now "threads the needle," Malan said, when it comes to encouraging foreign investment while balancing national-security concerns.

In this case, business interests fear rather than welcome the role that the Senate could play. The Senate took up its CFIUS bill shortly after the Dubai issue broke last year and passed a tougher measure than the House. Several key Democrats told The Hill two weeks ago they favored their original bill.

Labor Votes To Intrude On War, 9/11 Debates (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Just because everyone on Capitol Hill will be talking about, thinking about and posturing over Iraq this week doesn't mean that Members of Congress can't multitask — and if all goes well for the Democratic majorities in both chambers, they'll be able to take their jabs at President Bush over the Iraq War and pass a few measures designed to boost union membership, too.

While the maneuvering for the perfect rebuke of the president's Iraq policy continues in the House and Senate, both chambers are expecting major battles over organized labor this week.

And Republicans are planning a fierce push-back on bills they say would hamper homeland security, restrict democracy and lead to the harassment and coercion of average workers.

"The theme is clearly going to be the Democrat 'payback' for union support," said Ryan Loskarn, spokesman for the Senate Republican Conference.

The House plans to vote Thursday on a bill to relax union organizing rules — allowing a union to form if a majority of workers sign cards authorizing it, rather than the current practice of holding federally supervised, secret-ballot votes.

Democrats say corporations for years have used intimidation to prevent unions from even getting a vote, and that the bill would level the playing field for workers.

But with the backing of the business community's lobbying juggernaut on K Street, House Republicans say they may not be able to prevent the Employee Free Choice Act from passing that chamber this week, but that their public relations offensive will set the stage for its ultimate demise in the Senate.

"House Democrats have the votes to pass the Employee Free Choice Act, but Republicans will win the debate," said one House Republican leadership aide.

Chief among the Republicans' talking points on the bill is that the measure would "kill private voting rights altogether" and that "card checks" could allow union organizers to unfairly pressure workers to join, said the House GOP leadership aide.

Republicans also point to a 2001 letter that some House Democrats sent to Mexican officials as proof that supporters of the bill are "shockingly hypocritical."

The letter, signed by House Education and Labor Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.), stated, "We feel that the secret ballot is absolutely necessary in order to ensure workers are not intimidated into voting for a union they may otherwise not choose."

But Democrats say the "bipartisan bill is part of Democrats' efforts to ensure that all Americans have a fair shot at the American dream, including a good job and fair wages," according to Stacey Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Bernards also noted that the measure has 233 co-sponsors, seven of whom are Republicans.

Still, the bill faces major obstacles in the Senate, where Republicans already are planning to lay down their markers this week on a much less sweeping bill allowing airport screeners to unionize.

Ostensibly, the Senate will be debating a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, but Republicans are agitated by a provision, added in committee, that would allow employees at the Transportation Security Agency to join a union.

"Much of the Republican effort will be to oppose that," said one knowledgeable Senate GOP aide.

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) will lead the Senate GOP effort against the provision, with Republicans arguing that allowing airport security screeners to join unions could imperil national security if employees were to walk off the job or stage "sick outs" over failed salary negotiations.

"The rationale for unionizing security employees is difficult to discern — but the American people will recognize that it has zero to do with improving security and everything to do with rewarding Democrat donors," said Loskarn.

The push-back on the Democratic side is likely to come from none other than Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.). Though Lieberman has been at loggerheads with his fellow Democrats over Iraq — he supports the war, they don't — he actually offered the TSA proposal to the 9/11 bill in committee earlier this month.

Democrats contend that TSA workers should be able to have collective bargaining rights along with other Department of Homeland Security employees, such as customs and border control agents.

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans may also offer an amendment to the 9/11 bill that would legalize the president's now-defunct warrantless wiretapping program. After federal courts ruled it unconstitutional, the Bush administration agreed to submit its requests to spy on Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

A Shield Against Corporate Bullying (WP)

By Lance Compa

A proposal to let American workers decide in peace and quiet about whether to join a union has provoked a torrent of crocodile tears from corporate executives. The Employee Free Choice Act, which the House is due to vote on this week, would permit an employee to choose union representation by signing a membership card. If a majority of workers in a defined "bargaining unit" opted for it, employers would have to bargain in good faith with the workers' union.

Business spokesmen shout that the act deprives workers of their right to an election held by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). But what companies really prize is management's power to exploit the election procedure to mount aggressive, one-sided attacks on workers' freedom of association.

Why the sudden concern for democracy in a culture of otherwise unilateral employer dominion? We don't hear companies calling for secret-ballot votes on management decisions or CEO stock options, or to elect worker representatives to boards of directors. Bosses' democratic impulses appear only when workers want to exercise their right to organize.

Current labor law puts employers in control of what should be employees' concern. Even when by a big majority workers join a union to bargain collectively, employers can force a vote run by the NLRB. During the weeks it takes to set up the election, management can launch a devastating campaign to thwart workers' choice. Employers say they are just telling employees the downsides of organizing. But they go way beyond that point, hauling workers into mandatory meetings and threatening to shutter the workplace or to permanently replace workers who exercise the right to strike.

Imagine a campaign for president where legally just one candidate can spend an unlimited amount of money for TV advertisements and the other candidate can only pass out flyers at highway intersections. Imagine a campaign for Congress in which every employer in the country can force its employees into a mandatory meeting to tell them: "If you vote for the candidate of Party A, I'll have to close the business; vote for Party B if you want to keep your job." Imagine a campaign for governor where every employer in the state singles out and fires employees who support the candidate whom management opposes.

These examples parallel the reality of union election campaigns under current law. Employers have unlimited access to harangue workers against organizing, while union representatives are relegated to passing out flyers to workers speeding out of parking lots and asking time-stressed employees to attend evening or weekend meetings. Employers have unlimited power to hold captive-audience meetings where they can legally "predict" workplace closure, as long as they don't illegally "threaten" it (a Supreme Court decision created the distinction, though many understandably have trouble differentiating between the two). And though it's illegal, employers routinely fire worker activists to frighten others into submission, knowing it will take years for reinstatement orders to take effect.

A card-based system for choosing union representation is already allowed under current law. Many fair-minded employers use it. But most nullify it, forcing workers into the NLRB election process. These managements say they need an opportunity to offer their version of union "facts," but their presentations are often threat-filled diatribes.

Nothing in the proposed legislation prevents employers from presenting their views -- including their diatribes. Actually, employers are entitled to mount union-avoidance campaigns starting on Day One of a worker's employment. Their campaign is the wages and benefits they pay and the way they treat employees. If workers turn to union representation, it should be their business, not the company's.

Workers should be able to organize without fear-mongering by bosses or, by the same token, pressure from union organizers. This is how the card-based system already works; safeguards against undue pressure from any side are built in. It includes rapid arbitration to resolve any disputes, compared with years of dragged-out NLRB proceedings and federal court appeals.

Many companies have agreed to a card-based system. They find that when workers choose bargaining, a more peaceful, productive negotiating-table dynamic results than in the case of negotiations that follow an NLRB election war. Congress should build such positive labor relations into the architecture of our labor laws by passing the Employee Free Choice Act.

An Assault On Corporate Speech (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Good for Adrienne Eaton of Rutgers University's Labor Studies & Employment Relations Department. Her forthright description of a central issue in the debate about the Employee Free Choice Act, which she supports, clarifies why that legislation is symptomatic of a disagreeable tendency in today's politics.

Labor unions hope this exquisitely mistitled act, which the House of Representatives probably will pass this week, will compensate for their dwindling persuasiveness as they try to persuade workers to join. It would allow unions to organize workplaces without workers voting for unionization in elections with secret ballots. Instead, unions could use the "card check" system: Once a majority of a company's employees signs a card expressing consent, the union is automatically certified as the bargaining agent for all the workers.

Unions say the card-check system is needed to protect workers from anti-union pressure by employers before secret-ballot elections. Such supposed pressure is one of organized labor's alibis for declining membership.

There are, however, ample protections against employer pressures that really are abusive. Tellingly, the act would forbid employers from trying to influence -- pressure? -- employees by improving their lot: It would fine employers that, to reduce the incentive to unionize, give workers "unilateral" -- not negotiated -- improvements in compensation or working conditions during attempts at unionization. Clearly, the act aims less to help workers than to herd them as dues-payers into unions.

Under the card-check system, unions are able to, in effect, select the voters they want. It strips all workers of privacy and exposes them, one at a time, to the face-to-face pressure of union organizers who distribute and collect the cards. The Supreme Court has said that the card-check system is "admittedly inferior to the election process."

Repealing a right -- to secret ballots -- long considered fundamental to democratic culture would be a radical act. But labor is desperate. The card-check shortcut to unionization comes before Congress after last month's announcement that union membership declined, yet again, in 2006, by 326,000.

The percentage of employees in unions fell from 12.5 to 12, down from 20.1 percent in 1983 and 35 percent in the 1950s. The growth area of organized labor is among public-sector employees, 36.2 percent of whom are unionized, compared with just 7.4 percent of private-sector employees.

Today's workforce is marvelously flexible. People entering the labor market at age 18 will have, on average, 10 employers by the time they are 38. Such mobile workers often do not see what value union membership would add to their lives.

What unions are trying to sell is decreasingly attractive to potential members, so unions are doing what declining businesses often do: They are seeking government protection, in the form of a law to insulate them from the rigors of competition. They want government to allow them to, in effect, silence the employers' side of debates about the merits of unionization.

This is where Professor Easton -- again, she favors the Employee Free Choice Act -- is pertinent. Avoiding the sort of circumlocutions that Washington policymakers often use to conceal their thoughts, she said this to the New York Sun: "Because employers wield so much power, it's hard to figure out what kinds of lines to draw about employer speech."

The Employee Free Choice Act would short-circuit the process of persuading workers through a public debate between unions and employers, the winner of which would be determined by workers casting secret ballots. Welcome to the political culture that the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law is shaping. That law, which regulates the quantity, timing and content of political speech, is making it increasingly acceptable for interest groups to attempt to advance their social agendas by limiting their adversaries' speech.

Senate Democrats might not find 60 votes to bring this Orwellian legislation -- "free choice," indeed -- to a vote. But if it does reach the president's desk, he will veto it. He should have vetoed McCain-Feingold. Its speech restrictions -- applauded as virtuous by the (exempt) media -- have legitimized talk about "drawing lines" to circumscribe the speech rights of entire categories of Americans, in this case employers.

Much recent academic writing about the First Amendment, and much of the jurisprudence about it, has "balanced" speech rights against other social goods and has valued speech rights primarily as instrumental for other social goods. So there are, alas, ample precedents for this legislative attempt to truncate employers' speech rights.

Still, herewith a modest proposal: Any member of Congress who was elected by a secret ballot should oppose the Employee Free Choice Act.

Budget Strain (WSJ)

By David Malpass

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

The U.S. tax outlook is unraveling fast. An increasing number of existing tax rates are temporary, and to keep them from rising automatically, Congress and the president will have to agree on new hard-to-pass laws.

Unfortunately, Washington's inclination is to add additional taxes to pay for the theoretical "cost" of keeping tax rates at their current level. As more of the tax system falls into this trap -- adding permanent new taxes annually in order to keep other tax rates from going up -- it will soon create a strong enough tax bias to slow growth. By 2010, the magnitude of the tax increases needed simply to maintain current rates will amount to over $400 billion per year, a looming economic train wreck.

The logic is strong for new tax-writing procedures to stop the upward tax ratchet. The budget is moving rapidly toward balance due to the flood of tax payments from private sector jobs and profits. The growth and asset price gains from current tax rates are readily apparent, and foreign countries are cutting tax rates to gain competitiveness.

Even so, the odds have shifted heavily toward annual tax hikes. Under the guise of budget neutrality, President Bush now seems likely to sign two tax increases in 2007 and another in 2008, each presented by Congress -- deceptively -- as a tax cut. This sets the precedent for similar treatment and much bigger tax hikes in the next administration, whether Republican or Democrat, as it confronts the scheduled 2011 tax increases on income, dividends and capital gains.

Budget bean-counters measure tax hikes from a baseline that assumes tax rates are going up. Thus, merely extending the existing rates is called a tax cut and gets headlines as such -- even though the extension just maintains the status quo.

Permanent new taxes are then attached to the so-called cuts and labeled "offsets," a technical term for a tax hike. But these new taxes often get little attention. Adding to the size of the offsets, the growth benefits of maintaining current rates (and the harm from letting the rates rise) are arbitrarily excluded from the congressional scoring process.

The net effect of the current system is a strong upward ratchet in tax rates and tax complexity. Even many anti-tax Republicans seem to have acquiesced. Budget baselines build in repeated tax increases, as if those are normal, and assume that economic growth, stock prices and home prices are unaffected by higher tax rates. A more pro-growth Congress could pay for maintaining existing tax rates, if it thought that was necessary, by restraining the budget's built-in spending increases. But this choice seldom, if ever, materializes.

The first 2007 tax increase is attached to the minimum wage bill. To garner Republican votes, Congress is likely to continue existing provisions, which allow small businesses to expense some purchases rather than depreciate them over time. It will be trumpeted as a tax cut, but is mostly just the extension of current tax treatment.

By itself, this provision is a good idea, fostering small business investments and counteracting some of the job losses from the higher minimum wage. However, the proposed legislation pairs the small business provision with tax increases in other areas. The result will be higher tax rates and payments in 2007 than 2006 -- but it will be called a tax cut.

The congressional Joint Committee on Taxation makes clear the artifice in its scoring of the Senate and House bills. It labels one section "Provisions that Raise Revenues," amounting to $8 billion in the Senate bill and $1.4 billion in the House bill. But JCT is careful not to label the other section a tax cut, instead calling it "Small Business Provisions."

The second likely 2007 tax hike involves the alternative minimum tax, AMT. Each year, it needs to be patched -- by increasing the amount of income excluded from the tax -- so that the number of people charged the AMT penalty doesn't escalate. Congress typically treats the patch as a tax cut even though it doesn't reduce anyone's taxes. But in the same bill, Congress will probably add permanent new taxes amounting to as much as $50 billion as an "offset."

Unless the president or Congress calls a halt, even larger tax increases will be needed in 2008 to offset the AMT's expansion. The upward trend is large enough that the AMT-related tax increases alone may begin to undermine U.S. competitiveness and growth even before Congress and a new administration confront the much bigger 2011 tax increases.

Sen. Grassley has called for repealing the AMT for individuals without adding other taxes. In the unlikely event this un-Washington approach wins the day, it would be a pro-growth coup for U.S. competitiveness -- breaking the upward tax ratchet, significantly simplifying the tax code, leaving more money in the private sector to encourage work and innovation, disappointing the lobbyists whose livelihood depends on annual expansions of the tax code, and, most importantly, setting a pro-growth precedent for future tax legislation.

Sen. Grassley is probably asking too much of a system designed to add taxes, not repeal them. At the root of the problem, Congress's tax-writing procedures are based on the static scoring assumption that higher tax rates don't slow growth or taxable income. It's as if the taxes come from thin air rather than from people's paychecks and profits.

One pro-growth step Congress could take this year, short of repealing the AMT, would be to acknowledge that economic growth will be faster with the AMT patch than without it. The added tax receipts from patch-dependent economic growth could be used to offset some or most of the revenue loss attributed to the patch, reducing the offsets and limiting the upward tax ratchet. By Washington standards, this would be revolutionary.

The tax hikes making their way through Congress in 2007 and 2008 could well be large enough to reduce the attractiveness of investment in the U.S. relative to fast-growing, tax-cutting economies abroad. More worrisome, the procedures being used point to more onerous tax hikes in the next administration, enough to stop the expansion. If the likely 2007 AMT process -- adding new taxes to extend current rates -- is applied to the 2010 expirations, it would be the biggest tax increase in history. The irony is that the upward tax bias has become more entrenched at a time when the fiscal deficit is nearing balance in substantial part due to current tax rates.

Washington's 2007 decisions on the AMT patch are especially important because they will influence the market's thinking on the 2010 expiration of the 2003 tax cuts. If it looks like the 2003 tax rates, critical to economic growth and asset price appreciation, will expire in 2011 or will be maintained through offsets, this will point to recession.

Tax changes should add to economic growth and employment and simplify the code, factors not given much weight in the current tax-writing procedures. Congress and the president should break the upward tax ratchet, starting with the AMT. A pro-growth, pro-jobs approach would permanently index AMT for inflation without adding new taxes.

Even better, repeal the AMT -- neither political party likes it -- acknowledging that the economy will do better without it. The surprise repeal of an ineffective tax would make clear to global investors that the U.S. plans to avoid the economic train wreck facing its tax code.

Fight Over Fiscal Discipline Begins With Bush's Budget (RC)

By Ernest Istook

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

There's a two-front battle between Congress and President Bush. While they feud over who will direct policy in Iraq, an inch-by-inch slugfest continues over who will control the domestic policy turf.

"It's the spending, stupid!" was as big a message as Iraq last fall. Bush's proposed budget is pivotal, despite efforts to demean it as irrelevant.

With one simple pronouncement the president showed that he "gets it" even if others don't: He embraced the too-long-abandoned goal of balancing the budget without raising taxes.

It's been an orphaned issue for many years in Washington, D.C.; 1996 saw the last Congressional vote on a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. Yet that was the top item in the "Contract with America" before the Republican majority shifted to less-ambitious objectives. Nor did Bush embrace it during his first six years in office. That opened the door for Democrats to campaign successfully on fiscal discipline.

Preservation of the Democrats' new majority may hinge on whether they will embrace balancing the budget without a tax hike — or even accept the goal of balance when spending on entitlements is set to skyrocket as baby boomers age. Bush knew that when he set the bar so high. And Republicans in Congress know they can now voice support for the goal without being in charge of the tough decisions.

Cynics rightfully note that the next president will inherit much of the heavy lifting. But that means every 2008 candidate for the White House must now address the issue.

Early indicators show an effort to bury the issue by attacking the tough decisions promoted by the Bush budget. Critics of spending controls rushed to the microphones more quickly than supporters did.

Bush's proposals to rein in Medicare and other government-paid health care were quickly condemned. Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) called them "an exercise in make-believe." Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) said it would hamper his "All Kids" program to provide government-paid health care for every child, regardless of income.

But Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) properly questioned why the federal government pays billions extra to states that give free health care to families with income three times the poverty level, while others draw the line at two times. Imagine the cost if states could abandon all income restrictions like Blagojevich wants.

States feel entitled to federal funds just as individuals do, even though 45 states reported in the fall that their budgets are meeting or exceeding their projections. Homeland security has joined health care and education as a way to justify a multitude of state requests. Federal funds now provide training and equipment to first responders "just in case" they face a cataclysm, yet the funds often will be used to address auto accidents and fires instead.

One example was voiced by Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas), who said it is "completely appalling that the [Bush] administration seems to be unwilling to act on rail and mass transit security until we are faced with another disaster."

Yet if it's a federal duty to provide security for large gatherings at rail stations or bus stops, then why not at every mall and sports arena? (This differs from aviation, where a hijacked and fuel-laden plane becomes a guided missile.)

The Bush budget spotlights tough choices like these, while Congress often avoids them as the price of achieving a majority vote. But the elections weren't just about Iraq. Democrats claim they also were about "underfunded" priorities, but more voters seem to understand that overfunded priorities were a bigger problem.

If Democrats want to claim the low-spending high ground along with Bush, they must avoid gobbledygook and speak with equal clarity. They should state their spending goal clearly, without carefully crafted modifiers or qualifiers. And if their goal is to balance the budget by raising taxes, they should say so.

Republicans should follow the same advice of clear-speaking. The GOP challenge is less over what to say but whether it will be believed, since voters decided they lacked fiscal discipline in recent years. But embracing the president's goal is a necessary first step to regaining trust.

Former Rep. Ernest Istook (R-Okla.) is a visiting fellow at The Heritage Foundation.

Women's Health Office Funds Cut (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

When is $4 million really $2.8 million?

One answer is "When you're a woman," as the Labor Department has repeatedly found that women earn about 75 cents for every dollar that men earn for the same work.

But this week's answer is "When you are the Office of Women's Health" within the Food and Drug Administration. That office, which was at the center of a politically damaging storm over the emergency contraceptive "Plan B," just had more than one-quarter of this year's $4 million operating budget quietly removed, insiders say.

The office funds research on male-female biological differences to ensure that women receive the most appropriate drug doses and treatments. It also produces heavily requested health information about menopause, pregnancy, birth control, osteoporosis and other topics.

The administration had requested -- and Congress had budgeted -- $4 million for the office in fiscal 2007, just as they have for several years running.

Last week, however, word came down that the FDA intends to withhold $1.2 million of that, apparently for use elsewhere in the agency. Because the remaining $2.8 million has already been spent or allocated for salaries and started projects, the office must effectively halt further operations for the rest of the year, according to a high-level agency official with knowledge of the budget plan, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the official is not authorized to speak publicly.

FDA spokesman Robert Ali said in an e-mail that, as a matter of policy, the agency does not discuss its spending plan until Congress has had a chance to review it and comment. However, he added, "the spending plan for the agency is to allow our operating components to spend at least at their 06 level" -- in other words, the full $4 million.

But FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza quickly corrected that statement in a follow-up e-mail, saying the spending plan for the agency is "INTENDED" to allow spending of at least the 2006 level, acknowledging that the spending plan is not ironclad.

Women's health advocates inside and outside the agency suspect they are witnessing, at least in part, a long-anticipated payback for the trouble the office stirred during the prolonged debate over nonprescription sales of Plan B. Taking a position that chafed the administration's conservative base, the office had stood up for scientific research that had backed the safety and appropriateness of such sales.

In 2005, the office's then-director, Susan Wood, resigned in protest over the issue, a major embarrassment to the agency. A compromise was finally reached last August that allowed over-the-counter sales of the drug to people at least 18 years old.

Martha R. Nolan, a vice president at the Society for Women's Health Research, a Washington advocacy group, said that big budget bites in Washington are often the beginning of the end and that she worries that this is retribution for the Plan B controversy.

"We fear this is the first step toward eliminating the Office of Women's Health," Nolan said. "We must not allow this office to be eliminated or reduced to an empty shell that has no program funding."

The office was created in 1994 amid growing evidence that some sex-based differences in biology warranted special regulatory attention -- and a recognition that other offices within the FDA did not have the time, money or expertise to focus on women's special needs.

More than 200 research articles based on studies funded by the office have appeared in scientific journals since 1994, and the office's fact sheets and other publications have generated record-breaking responses in recent years.

FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach is to appear today before the Senate appropriations subcommittee to discuss the agency's 2008 budget. Tomorrow, he will have a repeat performance before the House.

GSA Chief Seeks Probe Of Inspector General's Office (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 27, 2007

A private attorney working for the head of the General Services Administration has asked a presidential ethics committee to investigate the agency's inspector general office to see whether employees there leaked sensitive information.

Michael Nardotti, a lawyer with the Washington law firm Patton Boggs who is representing GSA Administrator Lurita Doan, wrote in a Jan. 31 letter obtained by Government Executive that "confidential and protected GSA IG investigative information and documents were leaked to outside sources," compromising the IG investigative process and "extraordinarily" harming Doan.

Doan has been the subject of an IG investigation since she allegedly attempted to award a no-bid contract to a friend's firm in July 2006. While the contract was never issued, the agency's IG opened a review about one month later. According to the letter, senior IG investigators said on Jan. 9 that the probe would continue for at least another five weeks.

"The leak of confidential and protected file information in the midst of an ongoing investigation constitutes a clear and gross abuse of authority," Nardotti's letter stated.

He argued that there "may be a connected pattern of leaks of confidential information from the GSA IG's office that are deliberately designed to cause reputational harm to Ms. Doan." The damage is such that it cannot be undone, Nardotti stated.

Nardotti sent the letter to James Burrus, chairman of the integrity committee within the President's Council on Integrity, a group made up of presidentially appointed inspectors general. Burrus is also assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division.

Burrus said the integrity committee has yet to meet to decide whether to pursue an investigation.

The request for an investigation is another development in an ongoing battle between the head of the GSA, the government's procurement and property management agency, and officials at GSA's audit branch.

In December, a spokesman for the IG said a recommendation from Doan that the office perform only half of its proposed fiscal 2007 audits was "an extraordinary effort to reduce serious scrutiny of the agency." The two sides also have disagreed over the IG office's budget.

The IG office did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

A Feb. 2 letter from Kevin Messner, associate administrator of GSA's Office of Congressional and Intergovernmental Affairs, to House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., stated that the IG investigation of the administrator remains open and that Doan's actions have been mischaracterized.

A spokeswoman for Waxman said the committee has received other documents from GSA relating to the issue and is reviewing them.

In a statement, a GSA spokeswoman said that under the rules of professional responsibility, government attorneys may not represent agency officials in their personal capacities unless specifically detailed pursuant to special authority. Accordingly,

Doan has assumed personal financial responsibility for private counsel, the spokeswoman said. She said that commenting on PCIE matters would be inappropriate.

The FBI's Burrus said it is not uncommon for senior government officials to obtain their own legal counsel in matters that could affect them personally.

Doan also has personally obtained the services of Mark Corallo, founder and principal managing member of Corallo Media Strategies LLC, an Alexandria, Va., crisis communications media services firm.

Pelosi Falls Short On Election Promises (POL)

By Daniel W. Reilly And Jim VandeHei

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is discovering the cold truth about governing with a slim majority: It's much easier to promise behavioral change for Congress than to deliver it.

Pelosi vowed that five-day workweeks would be a hallmark of a harder-working Democratic majority. So far, the House has logged only one. Lawmakers plan to clock three days this week.

The speaker has denied Republicans a vote on their proposals during congressional debates -- a tactic she previously declared oppressive and promised to end. Pelosi has opened the floor to a Republican alternative just once.

Pelosi set a high standard for herself when she pledged to make this "the most ethical Congress in history" -- a boast that was the political equivalent of leading with her chin. And some critics have been happy to hit it.

She is drawing fire for putting Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who had $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, on the Homeland Security Committee. And The Washington Post reported during the weekend that she is helping chairmen raise money from donors with business before their committees.

Pelosi can count several big changes designed to curb abuses that plagued the Republican majority before it was dethroned in last fall's elections, including new limits on gifts from lobbyists. But her debut has not quieted skeptics who see her and the new majority failing to make the clean break with the deeply ingrained congressional culture.

"She has done exactly what she said she would do," said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly.

For example, he noted, while the House is not always in session five days a weeks, many committees are working throughout the week. Pelosi promised an ambitious start to the new Congress, he said, and she had determined the best way to proceed was by limiting debate.

"In the future," Daly said, "we will do business in the regular order."

Pelosi seems to be following a familiar pattern. Twelve years ago, Speaker Newt Gingrich promised to reform the House and govern by principles of fairness and transparency. But, for leaders of both parties, the reality of ruling with a narrow majority translates into tight controls over floor debate, cozy relations with lobbyists and accommodating the needs of lawmakers (who hate working long weeks).

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a congressional watchdog organization, said Jefferson's reelection put the new speaker in a bind.

"Pelosi had to put him somewhere," said Sloan, who has also worked as minority counsel for the House Judiciary Committee for then-ranking member John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.). "But I am troubled by the fact ... that (Jefferson) is the kind of guy who could not pass a security clearance test and yet now he has access to top-secret government info."

Sloan also took issue with Democrats' use of committee chairs for fundraising efforts, a tactic Republicans often abused in the last Congress.

"Given the scandals of last Congress, particularly involving (disgraced former lobbyist Jack) Abramoff, it doesn't look good," Sloan said. "It is very hard for people to understand the difference between what's legal and what's illegal."

Republicans are cutting Pelosi less slack than that. Eager to brand her a hypocrite, GOP strategists are closely tracking what they call a growing list of "broken promises" and are encouraging their members to attack her for them.

"She promised the most open and honest Congress in history and by any objective score, (Democrats) have fallen short," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.).

Pressed on whether voters will care about procedural complaints, such as lack of floor votes for GOP proposals, Putnam said: "I think voters do care if you shut down the process to the point people cannot even offer an alternative, and you are stifling debate …You don't want to be constantly complaining about the process, but bottom line, they are abusing it."

Some Democratic lawmakers privately warn that Pelosi could blow a rare opportunity to change voters' perception of the party and Congress if she reverts to old Republican ways.

In a recent newspaper commentary, former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana expressed concern "that the new Democratic majority in the House, which certainly understands the sting of unfair treatment, has on occasion yielded to the temptation of its newfound power to shut down Republican participation."

So far, the GOP has been shut out of virtually every big debate. The most recent example was the House fight over the war in Iraq, in which Democrats broke their promise to allow the GOP a vote on its nonbinding resolution supporting the troops.

Pelosi sympathizers said Republican critics are laying it on a bit thick.

"Oh, cry me a river," said former Democratic Rep. Tony Coelho. "For six years they ran a system that was autocratic, that didn't give the minority a shot at offering anything and now are saying 'mistreatment' …They never even let the Democrats have a voice."

Still, Pelosi's experience with the recent Iraq debate illustrates her challenge. She calculated that it would be harder to build bipartisan support for a Democratic resolution condemning the administration's troop "surge" if the debate were muddied by a generic, support-the-troops vote. In essence, she determined it was riskier, in the short term, to keep her pledge than to break it.

There is a practical reason for this approach, too. Alternatives are ripe for mischief. The minority party often puts together legislation designed to either embarrass or divide the other side.

That means there is almost always a temptation to backtrack on pledges of reform. Gingrich and his self-proclaimed "revolutionaries" roared to power in 1994 with promises to undo the feather-nesting and strong-arm tactics that had come to mark the Democratic reign -- then discovered that what they once deemed outrageous seemed more defensible once their party was in charge.

In light of this history, say some congressional scholars, Pelosi soon will be facing a choice.

"If we don't start seeing some opportunities for Republicans to offer real amendments on floor and to see some effort at collaboration that is genuine," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution, "then she and Democrats will properly be subject to criticism."

For Hoyer, A Life Of Quiet Victories, Redefined Purpose (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

His father abandoned him. His stepfather was an alcoholic. By his sophomore year at the University of Maryland, Steny Hoyer was short of cash, getting D's and drifting.

Then one spring day in 1959, a Pontiac convertible cruised past him on campus, carrying a familiar figure. Hoyer followed it to the student center. Spellbound, he listened as Sen. John F. Kennedy appealed to young people to get involved in government.

"It was just like that," Hoyer says, snapping his fingers as he sits in his U.S. Capitol office. "Just like that." The next week, he switched his major from public relations to politics. He started getting A's and went on to law school.

"You know the rest," he says.

The rest is this: At 27, Hoyer became a state senator. At 35, president of the Maryland Senate. At 41, a U.S. congressman. And, last month, he captured the second-most powerful post in the U.S. House of Representatives: majority leader.

At 67, Hoyer seems the very image of the Washington political insider, with his starched white shirts and patrician cap of silver hair. He is known as a pragmatist, skilled at navigating the legislative maze and wooing K Street lobbyists. A workaholic who makes the trains run on time.

Yet there is another side: The man who quietly fought for Soviet Bloc dissidents. The husband of a teacher devoted to the poor. The idealist who keeps a bust of Kennedy in his office.

The one-time pol from Prince George's County now stands at a historic juncture, as he tries to steer the resurgent Democrats' agenda through Congress. With a record as a moderate consensus-builder, he could be key to keeping the party together and coaxing Republicans to cross the aisle.

"I aspired throughout my life to make a difference in the things I cared about," says Hoyer, his brown-and-white springer spaniel at his feet. And to make a difference, you "try to be in a position where you can effectively advocate for what you believe is best."

Hoyer rarely talks about his childhood. When the new Democratic-controlled House was sworn in, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) threw a four-day extravaganza highlighting her roots in Baltimore's Little Italy. Hoyer held a quiet reception in his office.

Steny Hamilton Hoyer was born in Manhattan, the only child of a Danish immigrant and a high school dropout whose family fortune collapsed in the Depression. He is named for his father, Steen.

"He was a very arrogant, opinionated person," Hoyer says. "What I remember was not particularly happy."

The young Hoyer bounced around. At 4, to Texas, when his dad got a job with the military. At 6, to Massachusetts, for prep school. At 9, back to New York, when the money ran out and the father took off.

"I think I saw my father maybe two or three days in the next 20 years," Hoyer says. But the memory of that prickly, apathetic man would haunt him.

"He didn't want to be like his father," says the congressman's daughter Anne Hoyer. "That's what really drove him -- to be not just good, but strive to be the best you possibly could be."

By the time Steny Hoyer was 16, his mother had married an Air Force sergeant and the family settled near Andrews Air Force Base. His stepfather's alcoholism roiled the home. But, entering Suitland High School, the outgoing youth found the two interests that would define his life.

He got involved in politics, running unsuccessfully for vice president of the student government. And he started dating Judy Pickett, a warm, energetic schoolmate who was class secretary.

Judy's home became like his own. Her mother bought him new shoes, cooked for him when his stepfather was on a bender. Judy was at his side through the rocky start in college and the Kennedy epiphany.

She married him at 21, becoming, Hoyer says, "an example and guide."Success, Then Failure

Fresh out of Georgetown's law school in 1966, Hoyer launched his campaign for state Senate from Prince George's. He was an underdog, a liberal reformer in a county still heavily white and rural. But he had an army of volunteers: classmates, friends from the statewide Young Democrats, interns from the U.S. Senate, where he worked part time.

"It was a youth corps onslaught," laughs Hoyer.

When Hoyer arrived in Annapolis, "he was a ball of energy," recalls Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.), then a state representative. But the young reformer quickly befriended the older senators. "Rather than fight the establishment, he really co-opted it," Cardin says.

Hoyer pushed for better treatment of rape victims and funds for lower-income schools. His wife was a strong influence.

But he became better known for his hard-nosed grasp of politics. He and his allies replaced the Prince George's Democratic machine with an organization called the Breakfast Club. Over coffee and Danish, they met with party factions to plot strategy, pick candidates and dole out judgeships and other posts.

Hoyer's life was a whirl of dinners, negotiations, debates in the marble-columned Senate. But in 1972, the past came knocking. His father showed up, by then a 70-year-old drifter in threadbare clothes, suffering from lung cancer.

"I felt a responsibility because he was my father," says Hoyer. "But I was certainly not enthusiastic."

Hoyer's own life went from success to success. In 1975, he became the youngest Senate president in Maryland history. His political organization was the most powerful in the state. He and Judy bought a three-bedroom home in a subdivision called

Friendly, near Clinton, and were blessed with three daughters. In 1978, the "golden boy" of Maryland politics ran for lieutenant governor, the latest move in a career exploding like a bottle rocket, higher, higher . . .

And then he lost.

He and gubernatorial candidate Blair Lee III, the political insiders, were upset in the primary by a reform ticket led by Harry R. Hughes.

For two years, Hoyer practiced law. Then the local congresswoman, Gladys Noon Spellman (D), suffered cardiac arrest, and her seat was vacated. Hoyer reactivated his formidable political network.

"I remember the day he called me to say, 'I'm running for Congress,' " says Peter F. O'Malley, a close ally. "The joy was back in his voice."Working the System

Hoyer won the congressional race and quickly ingratiated himself with the Democratic leadership in the House, working overtime to round up votes and fundraise. He landed on committees such as Appropriations and played the levers of power like a maestro.

Hoyer was so successful at steering funds to projects such as Metro and NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center that they became known as "Steny dollars."

Not everyone was a fan. The nonpartisan Citizens Against Government Waste eventually gave him a 12 percent career score -- "hostile." A Hoyer spokeswoman says voters have shown time and again that they appreciate "the federal investment he secures."

Then there were the whispers in Congress: that Hoyer was too ambitious, too slick. After rising in the House hierarchy, he lost a race for whip -- the No. 3 job in the party leadership -- to the lower-key David E. Bonior (Mich.) in 1991.

As Hoyer fought the political battles, Judy was his sounding board. She accompanied him to the political dinners, flashing her warm smile. But her heart was in Prince George's, where she oversaw early-childhood education, including programs for disadvantaged kids. As the years went by, she wearied of politics.

"She thought it was in some ways superficial," Hoyer says. "She was really into substance."

Yet she always supported her husband's goals: civil rights, helping the less fortunate.

In 1985, Hoyer joined the congressional Helsinki Commission, which monitored human rights in the Soviet bloc. With little publicity, he flew red-eyes to Eastern Europe and Russia for the next eight years, visiting dissidents, lobbying officials to release political prisoners.

It was a chance, Hoyer says, to help "people who otherwise were powerless."

He spoke out for such causes as gays in the armed forces, even after his district was redrawn to include Southern Maryland, the home of two military bases, as well as parts of Prince George's and Anne Arundel counties.

One day, Hoyer and his wife were at an event, when a coffee cup suddenly flew from Judy's hand. "It scared her greatly," Hoyer would later tell a crowd. It was epilepsy.

Hoyer shepherded the Americans With Disabilities Act through the House, broadening rights for epileptics and others.After Tragedy, Change

After losing their 40-year grip on the House in 1994, Democrats turned to Hoyer to help with a comeback effort. He hopscotched across the country, recruiting candidates, focusing laserlike on Election Day: Nov. 5, 1996.

The bombshell came in October. Judy had stomach cancer. Four months later, she was dead at 57.

Hoyer plunged into grief.

"You really do reflect back on all the things you did, all the travel I did overseas, all the time that was not spent with Judy and the family," he says.

"He's got all this energy; he's working 12, 16 hours a day -- that was what life was to him," says his daughter Stefany Hemmer. "My mother's death sort of jerked him into reality and said . . . there's something else out there other than Congress."

But Hoyer couldn't quit. "I sort of threw myself into work more," he says.

And the next step was the race for minority whip, against a formidable opponent: Pelosi. In 1999, they began a grueling, two-year battle. Hoyer cast himself as the pro-defense, pro-trade moderate. Pelosi promised to give the party a new face -- its first female whip.

Pelosi won.

And yet Hoyer realized the defeat wasn't as devastating as it might have been. "In comparison with losing a loved one, that loss is not nearly comparable."

Something was changing. Friends felt he'd become a better listener. His eldest daughter, Susan Taylor, says her father was "a little more interested in the human relation, not just the global relation." Hoyer began establishing "Judy Centers," fulfilling his wife's dream of creating one-stop facilities to offer poor families health, literacy and other services. Maryland now has 24 centers.

Hoyer finally rose to minority whip in 2002, when Pelosi moved up. But the "angst of ambition," he says, was easing.

"I suppose the fear of failure was not nearly as great," he says.

And then came the November 2006 earthquake that ousted the Republicans. Hoyer was the favorite to become majority leader. But Pelosi suddenly threw her support to Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.).

This time, Hoyer won.

All those nights on the road paid off, for Hoyer and the party. In the 2006 campaign alone, Hoyer helped raise $8 million for Democrats and traveled to 33 states.

"I feel a sense of accomplishment," Hoyer says. But reaching the top meant something different than it once had.Stage Presence

One recent Friday, Hoyer visited the Riderwood retirement community in Silver Spring. He strolled the stage with a microphone like a talk-show host, calling out to friends. The white-haired residents rose, clapping and cheering.

Hoyer turned somber when he spoke of the Democrats' plans to pass laws on homeland security, energy, the minimum wage. He emphasized that Pelosi sets the policy. "My job is to implement it."

Occasionally, he weaved in his own story. How he and Judy bought that first house in Friendly for $28,000. How he just became a great-grandfather.

These days, he told the crowd, "I live alone, with a wonderful woman named Charlotte."

She's a 15-year-old springer spaniel, he explained to laughter.

Though she's in failing health, he takes her everywhere. She was Judy's dog.

Accusations Of Agency Error In Disaster Loans (NYT)

By Ron Nixon And Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Last September, the Small Business Administration, which provides most long-term rebuilding aid to disaster victims, accelerated its lending to homeowners and businesses in the Gulf Coast, responding to criticism that it had been slow to respond to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita of 2005.

But now federal investigators are looking into accusations that in speeding up its work, the agency made thousands of loans without following its own rules to avoid fraud. Current and former employees of the agency have told investigators that agency workers failed to secure proper proof that borrowers owned the houses they were supposed to rebuild or had the required insurance.

Caroline Pankove, who worked as a lawyer for the disaster-loan program at the agency from June through December of last year, complained to the agency's managers and its inspector general that employees were improperly pressured to approve loans quickly.

Loan policies were applied inconsistently, Ms. Pankove said, and disaster victims' paperwork was often misplaced or mailed out with errors.

"The rush to disburse loans put everyone at risk: the taxpayer, the agency and especially the borrowers," Ms. Pankove said in an interview. "The people that we needed to serve the most were the ones getting hurt the most."

Her complaints were echoed by Brian Cook, who worked at the agency as a paralegal last year, and by others who spoke on the condition that their names not be used because they were still employed by the agency at the disaster loan office in Fort Worth.

A spokesman for the agency's inspector general confirmed that his office was looking into the accusations but said he could not comment on a continuing investigation.

Agency officials said that they were taking the complaints seriously, but that the problems described by Ms. Pankove and others were isolated, not systemic.

"We never pushed for disbursement to be made without the proper documentation," said Steven C. Preston, who promised to reform the troubled disaster loan program when he was appointed administrator of the agency last summer.

The agency was trying to empower managers to make case-by-case judgments about loan documentation, Mr. Preston said, adding, "We can't have a cookie-cutter approach."

Mr. Preston also disputed the possibility that efforts to speed the process had opened the door to abuse. "Of course we want to get the disbursements out faster," he said, "but it's very dangerous to assume that this would lead to fraud and losses to the taxpayer."

When Mr. Preston took over the agency in July, he inherited a huge backlog of loan applications, which had grown to 94,000 by September, according to the agency. Since then, 51,000 people have received all the loan money they qualified for, 19,000 have gotten some, and 24,000 have canceled their applications.

The agency has made more than $5 billion in hurricane-related disaster loans, more than half of them since Mr. Preston took over, said Sean Rushton, the assistant administrator for communications.

One way the agency reduced its backlog was by rewarding the employees who got money into the hands of the largest number of borrowers. E-mail messages obtained by The New York Times promised cash bonuses and overtime to the most productive workers, even though at least one supervisor acknowledged that this emphasis made people uncomfortable.

"I will be honest," a supervisor, Michael V. Cremer, wrote in an e-mail message in October. "Disbursements = cash awards & overtime opportunity. I don't like it, you don't like it... but it is what it is." The message continued, "Work with your people to make these numbers look good."

Mr. Cremer did not respond to voice mail messages left at his agency office in Texas.

Leaders of the House and Senate committees overseeing the agency said they were concerned about the accusations of improper lending.

"I'm worried that there may have been too much of a focus on quotas over quality of service for disaster victims," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, said in a statement.

"And if that's true, it's unacceptable," Mr. Kerry said. "If in a rush to get paperwork off their desks the S.B.A. shifted the burden to borrowers who have lost everything to Katrina, that's not a policy, that's an abdication of responsibility."

Despite the agency's new emphasis on speeding the lending process, disaster victims say they continue to experience problems. Donna Colosino, whose family owns a small company in Louisiana that sells power generation equipment, told the House Small Business Committee earlier this month that more than 20 loan officers had dealt with her case. And she said she sent the same documents to the agency more than a dozen times.

"Working with S.B.A. after a disaster is like having a second job," Ms. Colosino said. "I swear to you on my father's grave that this is the story. I am not an anomaly."

Hearing Urged On Guard Woes (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

The ranking Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee has called for a hearing to examine the Defense Department's "chronic deficiencies" in supporting homeland security and civil support missions by the National Guard.

The request by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia comes in the wake of two reports by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) saying that Defense has not adequately addressed Guard equipment and training requirements and that Army units charged with chemical and biological attack response are understaffed and underequipped.

"As we continue to ask more of the National Guard, it's our job to make sure they're adequately staffed, equipped and trained to perform their missions at home," Mr. Davis said in a letter to committee Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat.

"I'm asking for these hearings because it's abundantly clear they are not," he said. "First, we don't give them the training and equipment they need. Then we subject them to uncaring and uncoordinated care when they're wounded. Hearings on these issues should be a top priority for Congress."

Mr. Davis said one of the GAO reports noted that even though 12 of 15 "national planning scenarios" issued by the White House Homeland Security Council involve chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear or high-yield explosive response, the ability of Army chemical and biological units, especially National Guard and Reserve units, to concurrently perform both their original war-fighting chemical and biological defense mission and their homeland-defense mission is doubtful.

On Jan. 30, the GAO said that five years after the September 11 attacks, the Defense Department has not moved effectively to identify National Guard homeland-defense equipment and training requirements.

Mr. Davis said that the types and quantities of equipment the National Guard requires to perform domestic missions have not been identified in any systematic way and that the Defense Department has not acted on comments from state officials about growing strain on equipment and personnel.

On Feb. 20, a second GAO report said management actions were needed to "close the gap" between Army chemical unit preparedness and national priorities. The report, which focused on the readiness of Army units assigned to chemical and biological preparedness and response, said most are National Guard and Reserve units that are "woefully unprepared, understaffed and underequipped."

Mr. Davis sponsored the National Guard Empowerment Act of 2007 to allow the chief of the National Guard Bureau to establish common requirements and a budget that would allow the Guard to be equipped and trained for crucial homeland missions.

Honoring The Stars Of Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The Oscars are over. It's time to pick up the red carpet and move on to the Sammies.

Nominations for the 2007 Service to America Medals, presented annually to honor government employees for their achievements and commitment to federal service, are being accepted at the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

The deadline for submitting nominations, at http://www.servicetoamericamedals.org, is March 8. The medals, which are presented at a gala dinner, are accompanied by cash prizes -- from $3,000 to $10,000.

Unlike the stars of the silver screen, most federal employees work behind the scenes and rarely on camera. Previous medal winners include the Federal Trade Commission team that created the National Do Not Call Registry, a federal scientist leading the effort to prepare for a catastrophic flu pandemic, and an Internal Revenue Service employee responsible for the e-file system that speeds tax refunds.

Nicole Nelson-Jean of the Energy Department won the award in 2004, when she was 28, for leading a U.S. delegation to negotiate an agreement with Russian officials to help secure Russian nuclear weapons. She went on to serve as director of the Energy Department's Asia office in Tokyo and currently heads the department's North and South American threat-reduction office.

Winning the award, she said, renewed her appreciation for government service and has brought her opportunities to speak up for public service. "It is an unfortunate image of federal workers, or the civil service, that you get stuck in a job that is bureaucratic, and not fun, and that you don't meet interesting people," Nelson-Jean said. "That is so untrue. It is so not that."

The partnership was founded by businessman Samuel J. Heyman in 2001 to call attention to the importance of federal service and to help improve the way the government works. Max Stier serves as the partnership's president and chief executive.

The group recently received a $4 million grant from the Annenberg Foundation to finance two projects over the next four years.

Stier said the partnership will launch the Walter and Leonore Annenberg Federal Leadership Institute, and the Walter and Leonore Annenberg Public Service Speakers Bureau this year. The late Walter H. Annenberg was an ambassador to London, and Leonore Annenberg was the U.S. chief of protocol during the Reagan administration.

The leadership institute will focus on mid-level federal supervisors and help build their management skills, while the speakers bureau will send federal employees to college campuses to talk up government careers.

The 2007 winners of the Service to America Medals will be honored at a Washington gala in September. Campbell Brown, a NBC News anchor and correspondent, will be the master of ceremonies, the partnership said.Tempting Target

Federal retiree health benefits just keep showing up on budget-cutting tables.

A "Budget Options" report from the Congressional Budget Office, released over the weekend, includes a recommendation that would reduce the government's subsidy for retiree health-care costs. President Bush proposed a similar policy change in his fiscal 2008 budget, sent to Congress early this month.

The CBO and Bush administration proposals would reduce subsidies for premiums for retirees who had relatively short government careers. Federal retirees can now continue in the federal employee health program if they carried insurance during their last five years of service and are eligible to start collecting retirement benefits.

The CBO, in its report, said that basing retiree health benefits on length of service would "help bring federal benefits closer to those of private companies.

"Federal retirees' health benefits are significantly better than those offered by most large private firms, which have been aggressively paring or eliminating retirement benefits for newly hired workers," the report said.

For new retirees, the CBO proposed that the government's share of premium costs be cut by 2 percentage points for every year of service fewer than 20. The CBO said that about 14 percent of the nearly 85,000 retirees who continue in the federal health-care program each year have careers shorter than 20 years.

The proposal would create savings of about $770 million over 10 years, the CBO said.

The government currently picks up about 70 percent of the federal retiree premium, and the Bush proposal would require employees to have 10 years of government service to keep the subsidy. Under the Bush plan, the government would pay half of the subsidy for those with five years of service and would phase in higher contributions for those with service of more than five years but fewer than 10.

Although Congress is looking for ways to reduce federal spending, it seems unlikely that House and Senate Democrats and moderate Republicans would take up politically sensitive budget cuts that roll back promised benefits. A similar proposal in 2005 by a group of House conservatives, the Republican Study Committee, to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief and recovery, went nowhere.

No Worries: Banks Keeping Less Money In Reserve (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Banks might be putting too much faith in their borrowers.

As more consumers and companies start having difficulty paying their debts, the funds that banks set aside to cover soured loans stand at the lowest level since at least 1990.

The situation is causing consternation among regulators. And as credit quality begins to deteriorate from unusually strong levels, the issue also is causing jitters on Wall Street, where analysts predict the need to boost loan-loss reserves will cut into banking-industry profits this year.

Banks establish reserves for a portion of loan portfolios or big individual loans that they estimate could go unpaid. The reserves ensure that banks have enough capital to cover any losses from loans that go bad.

But each increase in those reserves results in a charge that cuts into banks' profits.

Typically, investors and regulators fret that banks overestimate these charges during good times so they will have a cookie-jar to dip into when times are rougher. Now, though, the worry is that banks haven't put aside enough money to cover bad loans because times have been so good and because they haven't wanted to damp profit growth.

In a December advisory, regulators reminded bank executives that they should use the leeway available to them in calculating reserves because "we do believe there is risk building in the system," says Kathryn Dick, deputy comptroller for credit and market risk at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which regulates banks.

That guidance "was a heads up, a shot across the bow, if you will, to the banks," said Lynn Turner, managing director of proxy advisory and accounting-research firm Glass Lewis & Co. and a former chief accountant with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The low reserve levels aren't triggering any concern about the financial soundness of the nation's banking system. Bank failures are quite rare. When regulators closed a small bank near Pittsburgh this month, it was the first bank failure since June 2004.

Still, the current level of loan-loss reserves is reigniting a longstanding debate among regulators about how banks calculate the amount of money to put aside for bad loans and the appropriate time to do so. The Financial Accounting Standards Board has recently started to consider whether banks should be required to disclose more information to investors about the way they calculate reserves.

Banks set aside an average of 1.09% of the total value of their loans at the end of last year, according to data from 518 publicly traded banks compiled by SNL Financial for The Wall Street Journal. That is a dip from 1.14% in 2005 and from 1.63% in 1992 and 1.48% in 1990. The SNL figures date to 1990.

"There is a growing concern about loan quality and it isn't reflected at all in the reserves," says Brian Shullaw, an associate director at SNL, a Charlottesville, Va., research firm that focuses on the financial-services industry.

According to SNL, the nation's three biggest banks had above-average reserves at the end of 2006: 1.32% at Citigroup Inc., 1.28% at Bank of America Corp. and 1.51% at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

Some large regional banks' reserves are well below average. Among them: SunTrust Bank Inc.'s 0.81%, First Horizon National Corp.'s 0.87% and Washington Mutual Inc.'s 0.60%, SNL says.

"Our reserve levels are reflective of our strong credit culture and what we believe to be the lower loss-risk profile of our loan portfolio," said a SunTrust spokesman.

Marlin Mosby, chief financial officer of First Horizon, said the bank's reserve level reflects the high percentage of its collateralized loans -- such as second mortgages -- which have a lower likelihood of default than other unsecured loans. He also noted that the bank increased its reserves in 2006 as the economy cooled somewhat.

Said a spokesman for Washington Mutual: "At year end, WaMu's reserve levels were appropriate considering that our loan portfolio primarily consisted of the highest-quality loans."

Investors will feel the pain if banks boost reserve levels.

Over the past few years, investors have benefited from the lower reserve levels because they helped boost profits. The banks say that they have been draining their reserves because few borrowers have defaulted on their loans. From 2004 to 2006, the nation's biggest banks received 37% of their earnings growth from reductions in their loan-loss reserves, according to a Feb. 12 Morgan Stanley report. Big regional banks got a bigger boost, with the freed-up reserves accounting for 52% of earnings growth, according to Betsy Graseck, a Morgan Stanley banking analyst.

A number of banks have drawn down their reserves for bad loans to "apparently unsustainably low levels," according to a recent report from the Center for Financial Research & Analysis, a Rockville, Md., accounting-research firm.

Indeed, banks are expected to soon start reversing course and building reserves amid growing expectations that the boom times are drawing to an end. Although loan defaults and charge-offs remain at historically low levels, bank executives predict that credit quality, which has weakened, will erode further this year.

Ms. Graseck, who is predicting that big-bank earnings will rise 5% this year, estimates that a 10% increase in reserves could reduce that earnings growth by four percentage points.

The trend comes at a time when bank profits are also expected to be hurt this year by short-term interest rates going higher than long-term ones -- the so-called inverted yield curve. Banks typically profit by borrowing short-term and lending long-term, so when the yield curve inverts, profit margins get squeezed.

"All of these banks are perfectly sound, but I do think a number of banks will miss earnings estimates based on rising loan provisioning," says Kevin St. Pierre, a banking analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co.

Historically, banks tend to see their provisions for bad loans increase when interest rates start to rise because higher rates cause problems for weaker borrowers and slow the economy. But that hasn't yet happened, even as the Federal Reserve has steadily raised rates to a current level of 5.25% from historic lows.

Whether and when banks should take additional provisions for loans that might not be repaid is a point of contention among bankers, regulators and accounting rule makers. Many bankers would like to set aside funds for possible bad loans in good times, forming a cushion for when things get tough. But that isn't permitted because such moves can be abused to manipulate earnings.

As a result, accounting rules generally don't allow banks to use provisions as "rainy-day funds." Instead, they require banks to take a provision when it is "probable" that a loan has gone bad. So, a bank can't establish a provision for, say, 2% of a loan portfolio just because that is the amount that typically tends to turn bad. Instead, it must assess an array of events that lead it to believe a loss is probable.

Greenspan, Even Out Of Fed, Still Steals The Stock Show (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Alan Greenspan isn't Federal Reserve chairman any more, but he still can move markets.

After Mr. Greenspan told a Hong Kong business conference, via satellite, that a recession is "possible" later this year, U.S. stocks slumped and bond yields declined, pushing bond prices higher.

The Greenspan news, together with a two-month closing high in oil futures, overshadowed investor excitement over the latest massive dump of private money into stocks: the planned $32 billion acquisition of Texas utility TXU by a group of investors.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, down for the fourth consecutive day after hitting four consecutive records, fell 15.22 points, or 0.12%, to 12632.26. It is up 1.4% this year, more than 150 points from the latest record finish of 12786.64 hit Feb. 20.

"Greenspan talking about a possible recession gave a little bit of an impetus to sell here," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at brokerage firm Ryan Beck in Florham Park, N.J.

Mr. Greenspan didn't predict a recession, but said he couldn't rule one out. Corporate profit margins "have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of" the business cycle, he said. That reinforced fears about the weak housing market and defaults in the subprime lending market.

The stock declines were modest, however, as investors await data due this week on home sales, inflation, economic growth and manufacturing.

Oil futures rose 25 cents to $61.39 a barrel, the fifth increase in six sessions. Traders blamed the latest winter storm, which could increase energy demand.

Treasury-bond yields fell on concerns that a soft economy would hold down demand for credit, driving market interest rates lower.

Concerns about the economy's direction also showed up the gold market, which is a refuge in times of worry. Gold futures hit a nine-month high in New York, rising $3.40 to $686.50 a troy ounce. Gold now is $33.30 from its 26-year closing high of $719.80, hit May 11, 2006.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.13%, or 1.82 points, to 1449.37, up 2.2% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.42%, or 10.58 points, to 2504.52, up 3.7% in 2007.

Excitement over the TXU deal did push the Dow Jones Utilities Average to another record, up 2.6% at 493.71. It has risen 8.1% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.40%, or 1.02 points, to 255.85.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,649 stocks rose and 1,658 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 12/32, pushing the yield down to 4.631%. The 30-year bond was up 25/32 to yield 4.733%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 120.57 yen, down from 121.09, while the euro rose to $1.3184 from $1.3166.

Gasoline Prices Continue Climbing (USAT)

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK — The average price of gasoline in the U.S. jumped 8.7 cents the past week to $2.383 a gallon for regular, the fourth consecutive weekly increase and the highest average price in five months, the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Monday.

The U.S. average is 12.9 cents more than it was a year ago.

Prices were up in all regions, EIA reported. Increases ranged from 6.3 cents per gallon in the Rocky Mountain area to 10.3 cents along the Gulf Coast.

Highest area average in the continental U.S. was $2.796 in California. Lowest — despite the big jump — was in the Gulf Coast: $2.234.

EIA doesn't break out Hawaii, where prices usually are highest. According to travel organization AAA, Hawaii's statewide average Monday was $2.859. Two of the state's metropolitan areas averaged more than $3.

EIA forecasts monthly averages won't break $2.50 this year, and discounts talk of a third consecutive year when the weekly U.S. average tops $3.

The last two years were extraordinary, says EIA analyst Mike Burdette. In 2005 "there was the hurricane (Rita); '06 was driven by (high) crude oil prices. This year we have crude oil staying at about $60 a barrel, down from peaks of $77."

Assuming no catastrophes, he says, "we don't see any reason to expect a run-up in crude oil prices this year."

The price of benchmark West Texas Intermediate, also called light, sweet crude oil, rose 25 cents a barrel in Monday trading, to $61.39 a barrel. That's the highest closing price since Dec. 22.

Snowy weather's implied increase in demand for heating oil was partly behind the jump.

Even if the price of oil were to suddenly drop, gasoline would continue to rise. Retailers say they're far from recovering the staggering increases in their wholesale costs.

"My laid-in cost right now is $2.26 (a gallon) and most of my stores are at $2.21 or $2.23," says Sam Turner, president of Calfee of Dalton in Dalton, Ga. He operates 129 Favorite Markets and Com-Pac convenience store gasoline stations in three states.

"It'd take us 10 days to catch up to the 17 cents (in increased wholesale cost) they gave us just last week. And that's if nothing changed. But we got another two cents tonight," he said late Monday.

Retailers are notified of new wholesale prices late in the afternoon. Some retailers raise prices immediately; others hold off temporarily.

Gasoline retailers say they can't raise prices as fast as their costs go up because they'd lose business to stations willing to sell for less. So they often lose money on fuel sales and recover it on coffee, snacks, newspapers and the like.

"I'm in the gasoline business for experience and the convenience store business for profits," Turner quipped.

A Lawyer's Speech Opens A New Venue In Ongoing Battle (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

When Texas plaintiffs' lawyer Anthony Buzbee gave a provocative address last year to maritime defense attorneys in Lake Las Vegas, Nev., he says he had no idea that an audience member about 20 feet away from him was taping the speech.

Now, in the ongoing battle between businesses and the lawyers who sue them, his words are coming back to haunt him as pro-industry lobbyists and Texas legislators use the speech to push for limits on where workers may file lawsuits if they're hurt at sea.

According to a transcript, Mr. Buzbee told the small gathering that he was particularly fond of Starr County, on the western edge of Texas' Rio Grande Valley. "That venue probably adds about seventy-five percent to the value of the case," he said. "You've got an injured Hispanic client, you've got a completely Hispanic jury, and you've got an Hispanic judge. All right. That's how it is."

In other parts of Texas, Mr. Buzbee went on, a plaintiff may have the burden of showing "here's what the company did wrong, all right? But when you're in Starr County, traditionally, you need to just show that the guy was working, and he was hurt. And that's the hurdle: Just prove that he wasn't hurt at Wal-Mart, buying something on his off time, and traditionally, you win those cases."

To his opponents, this was clear evidence of "venue shopping," a pervasive source of controversy in the legal world where one side seeks the friendliest locale to try a case. To Mr. Buzbee, he was just describing the advantages of a uniquely flexible provision in Texas law that allows plaintiffs in maritime cases the convenience of bringing suit in the county where they live. He was also making it clear to frequent courtroom opponents what he saw as the benefits of settling quickly rather than going to trial in places like Starr County.

In the past five years, thanks in part to Mr. Buzbee, there has been a surge in the Rio Grande Valley of lawsuits on behalf of seamen alleging injuries on dredging vessels from Florida to New Jersey to Bahrain. The predominantly Hispanic and relatively poor region in southern Texas has gained a national reputation for large jury verdicts. Mr. Buzbee says he has won several recent dredging verdicts in the Valley, ranging from $450,000 to about $1.4 million, and notes that he has settled many more for confidential amounts.

Congress and various states have passed laws limiting plaintiffs' flexibility to choose favored venues. But "personal-injury lawyers can still often shop cases as fast as their little legs will carry them," says Darren McKinney, a spokesman for the pro-business American Tort Reform Association.

A former marine who served in the Persian Gulf and later graduated second in his class from the University of Houston Law Center, the 38-year-old Mr. Buzbee specializes in personal-injury cases. Lawyers describe him as bright, aggressive and flamboyant -- he is a fan of cigars and vintage automobiles. "He's the kind of guy who wants his presence to be felt when he walks into a room," says James Watkins, a Galveston, Texas, lawyer who has defended cases against Mr. Buzbee.

Last May, Mr. Buzbee was invited to speak at the three-day seminar at the Ritz Carlton in Lake Las Vegas hosted by law firms that defend maritime cases, the people he usually squares off against in court -- a circumstance that's not unusual in the legal profession.

Mr. Buzbee says his comments in Nevada reflect the fact that "under maritime law, a plaintiff is supposed to win if he gets hurt at work." In conservative Texas locales, however, he says, plaintiffs often must meet a higher burden, even though it's not required by law. He says that juries in places like Starr County do a better job of following the law.

The immediate reaction to his speech was muted. But late last year, Mr. Buzbee says, he was in court in Galveston, where his firm is based, when a colleague told him that he had heard about his Nevada speech. Since then, Mr. Buzbee estimates, 35 to 40 lawyers and state legislators have called him, saying that they heard about the speech or had seen a transcript of it.

The pro-business Texans for Lawsuit Reform has been aggressive in circulating a transcript of his remarks. "Mr. Buzbee is describing why we have to fix the [venue] system," says Denis Calabrese, a spokesman for the group.

In civil matters, plaintiffs generally must file suit where an alleged wrong occurred or where a defendant is based. That is also generally the case in maritime matters, and there are complex rules for figuring out which venue is closest to the site of an accident at sea. Texas, though, has a uniquely flexible rule, allowing maritime plaintiffs to file suit in the county where they reside. Maritime companies that hire workers are thus exposed to lawsuits.

Maritime companies report a recent surge in Valley suits. Illinois-based Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. faced its first-ever Valley suit in 2002, but says that it has since been sued 33 times there. "We have been hiring Valley workers for 20 years," says David Simonelli, a company vice president who says he recently bought cowboy boots, because he is spending so much time there. "There is no logical reason for the explosion of suits."

Weeks Marine Inc., based in Cranford, N.J., was sued three times in the Valley prior to 2003, but says that it has since faced 17 suits there, the majority based on dredging incidents that occurred outside Texas, says Thomas Langan, a risk manager for the company. Filings increased, once "attorneys realized what a lucrative judicial hellhole exists down there," he says.

Mr. Buzbee counters that he has filed more Valley suits recently because more Valley workers are getting injured. He says he believes that budget crunches at dredging companies have caused them to be less safe.

On Feb. 16, Corbin Van Arsdale, a Republican legislator from Houston, introduced a bill that would amend state law so that only in rare cases is a plaintiff's county of residence an appropriate venue for maritime-injury suits. Plaintiffs' lawyers "like the Valley, because they get more frequent and larger verdicts," says Mr. Van Arsdale, who says he has heard about the Buzbee speech but hasn't seen a transcript.

Texas plaintiffs' lawyers argue that injured maritime plaintiffs will have a harder time vindicating their rights if they are forced to travel to the venue of an accident or to a defendant's home base. "Most of us want to try lawsuits where we live, as a matter of convenience," says John Stevenson, a Texas lawyer who has filed many dredging suits in the Valley. "In the Valley," he adds, "the juries and judges are professional."

Still, not all plaintiffs' lawyers are rallying behind Mr. Buzbee. Texas plaintiffs' lawyer Ronald Krist says he faults Mr. Buzbee for stirring the venue pot. "Lawyers are always looking for a more favorable venue, but to say in a public forum that notwithstanding the evidence, an Hispanic jury and judge will allow you to win undermines public confidence" in the system, he says. "Those are the sorts of things you shouldn't whisper to your wife in the middle of the night."

Mr. Buzbee, however, says he never expected his speech to reach the multitudes. As he approached the microphone at the Ritz Carlton last year, Mr. Buzbee recalls saying to an attorney who had helped organize the event: " 'This isn't going to be recorded, is it? You want me to speak candidly, don't you?' " Mr. Buzbee says the attorney assured him there would be no recordings.

Earlier this month, Mr. Buzbee filed suit in Galveston state court, alleging that Great Lakes Dredge & Dock's Mr. Simonelli, "surreptitiously recorded" the speech. Later, Mr. Buzbee claims, the Dredging Contractors of America, a D.C.-based nonprofit, disseminated a transcript of the speech "throughout the state of Texas." The suit asserts that Great Lakes and the Dredging Contractors violated anti-eavesdropping laws.

The Dredging Contractors of America declined to comment. Mr. Simonelli says he taped many sessions at the Nevada event. "I did not know of any agreement prohibiting the recording of any seminar," he says.

Paul Yetter, counsel to Great Lakes, shines a light back on Mr. Buzbee. "He has no one to blame but himself for saying those things."

Judge Rejects Cap On Awards In Ferry Crash (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

A federal judge yesterday rejected New York City's attempt to use an obscure 19th-century maritime law to cap its liability in the 2003 crash of a Staten Island ferry at $14 million.

The ruling exposes the city to tens of millions of dollars in potential damage awards to relatives of those killed and to scores of people injured when the ferry, the Andrew J. Barberi, crashed into a maintenance pier at the St. George Ferry Terminal on Staten Island.

The city had argued that the accident was covered by an 1851 act, aimed at encouraging investment in the shipbuilding industry, that limited a boat owner's liability to the value of the boat minus the repair costs — in this case $14.4 million. The judge ruled, however, that the 1851 law did not apply if the city's managers had been negligent, and he found that they had been.

The city has already paid $27.6 million to settle two-thirds of the 186 damage claims. Of the 11 people killed in the crash, the estates of only two have settled with the city, for $3 million and $450,000.

The amounts of many settlements were held down, lawyers for the plaintiffs said, by the city's argument that if it succeeded in capping the liability, the plaintiffs stood to win relatively little.

"The courthouse door is now open for all of the claimants to get just and proper compensation," said Anthony Bisignano III, a lawyer for 10 of the remaining 65 plaintiffs.

Mr. Bisignano said that in addition to the nine outstanding death claims, there were many claims from passengers with serious injuries, including amputations and paralysis.

The city said it would consider appealing.

Mr. Bisignano said that the 1851 act was the same one cited by the owners of the Titanic in an attempt to "limit the amount of damages to the value of a couple of dozen lifeboats."

On the afternoon of Oct. 15, 2003, the ferry slammed into a pier at top speed after the assistant captain operating it, Richard J. Smith, blacked out during the last half mile of the trip from Manhattan to Staten Island. The accident, one of the worst mass transit disasters in the city's history, ripped the side of the 3,300-ton boat open. People were crushed, mangled and decapitated.

A city rule requiring that two captains be in the pilot house in the front of the ferry while it is in motion was not followed. The captain, Michael J. Gansas, was on board at the time of the crash, but in the pilot house that faced Manhattan, not in the one that faced Staten Island, as he should have been.

The city had also argued that because its two-pilot rule was stricter than required by general negligence principles, the violation of the rule did not constitute negligence. In any case, the city said, individual crew members, not the city, were at fault.

But the judge, Edward R. Korman of United States District Court in Brooklyn, rejected those arguments. He wrote that by adopting the two-pilot rule, the city acknowledged a serious risk of accident if the pilot were incapacitated, and that knowledge of that risk required the city to remedy it.

And he found that it was the city's fault that the two-pilot rule was disregarded.

The city's former director of ferry operations, Patrick Ryan, who pleaded guilty to seaman's manslaughter in 2005, said then that he had not taken adequate steps to make sure that crews knew the two-pilot rule and to enforce it.

Judge Korman wrote, "The blame for this laxity lies squarely on the shoulders of the city."

Kathleen Healy, a mother of four whose husband, John Healy, 44, a lawyer, was killed, applauded the judge for holding the city accountable.

"It wasn't just one person passing out behind the wheel of a ferry," she said. "This was about an entire crew, an entire department, up to the commissioner of transportation."

Mr. Smith, the assistant captain, said he was suffering from extreme fatigue and was on painkillers when he passed out at the helm. He pleaded guilty in August 2004 to 11 counts of seaman's manslaughter. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison. Mr. Ryan was sentenced to a year and a day.

The city released a statement yesterday reiterating its position that Mr. Smith was entirely to blame for the accident, because he “took over the operation and navigation of the ferry when he was unfit to do so, and did not disclose that fact to anyone.”

Lloyd Joseph, a construction worker injured in the crash who has required three operations on his legs and now walks with a cane, said he hoped the city would not try to delay the day of reckoning any further.

He said he had pulled one of his two children out of college because he could not afford tuition without his wages.

“I’m very pleased today with the decision by the judge,” said Mr. Joseph, 65. “My whole bank account is exhausted.”

Schwarzenegger Urges End To Divisiveness In Washington (MCT)

By Clea Benson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sounding more like a motivational speaker than a politician, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday urged Democrats and Republicans in Washington to put aside their partisan differences and get to work for the good of the country.

The Republican governor told an audience at the National Press Club that Congress and the White House should follow the example of California, where Democrats and Republicans have worked together recently on environmental legislation and infrastructure issues.

Schwarzenegger urged President Bush and Congress to move toward the political center. He also said they should just try to be friendly.

"How come Democrats and Republicans out here don't schmooze with each other?" he asked.

The Austria-born governor is constitutionally barred from running for president. But that hasn't stopped him from claiming a piece of the national spotlight during a presidential campaign season. He's planning to give speeches nationwide this year, preaching an approach to politics that he calls "post-partisanship." And he's using a visit to Washington this week for the National Governors Association conference as a national platform.

"Post-partisanship," he said, "is the new concept of Republicans and Democrats giving birth to new ideas together."

Schwarzenegger also urged federal lawmakers to move toward the political center on the issue of illegal immigration, calling for enhanced security at the borders and a guest worker program.

"What about being realistic and just actually solving the problem?" he told the Press Club audience.

As a governor, Schwarzenegger has limited power over some of the issues he talks about, such as the war in Iraq. But his movie-star fame gives him a unique ability to draw attention. At a signing ceremony Monday for the Western Regional Climate Action Initiative - a regional agreement by California, Oregon, Washington, Arizona and New Mexico to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in their states - a huddle of media descended on Schwarzenegger. Meanwhile, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who's seeking the Democratic nomination for the presidency, waited in the background.

Schwarzenegger, citing his failed 2005 campaign to pass several Republican-leaning ballot initiatives, said he doesn't think he's perfect. "I contributed to the polarization," he said.

But he took a chiding tone with Washington lawmakers.

"All of this energy is being spent on bitterness; all of this energy is being spent on maneuvering," he said. "Imagine if that same energy were put into working together to build a consensus."

The key to his success, he said, was his focus on building relationships.

"In the courtyard of the state Capitol, I have a politically incorrect smoking tent," he said. "People come in, Democrats and Republicans, and they take off their jackets and they take off their ties, they smoke a stogie and they schmooze."

He had advice for everyone: Democrats should stop "running down" the president. Republicans, he said, should stop questioning the motives of Democrats who oppose the war in Iraq.

"To the president," he said, "I say get yourself a smoking tent."

Benson reports for the Sacramento Bee.

Arnold Pushes 'Centrist' Immigration Approach (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0137250

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger yesterday punctuated a three-day media blitz in the nation's capital -- one in which he said he is open to running for the U.S. Senate -- with a National Press Club speech on how his "post-partisan" approach can fix the immigration problem.

"It is time that we reintroduce the concept of the mainstream back into the American political life, and the place to start it is immigration," said Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, in town for the annual National Governors Association meeting, promoted his feel-good centrism on Sunday talk shows and in exclusive newspaper interviews over the weekend.

Then, at a lunchtime press club speech yesterday, minutes after leaving a meeting with President Bush in the Oval Office, Mr. Schwarzenegger said there is "a totally reasonable, centrist approach to the whole [immigration issue]."

The Austrian-born former film star said what Mr. Bush and many lawmakers have said: The U.S. should "secure our borders" and provide "a guest-worker program and [give] everyone citizenship who is already in the country and meet a certain criteria."

Mr. Bush reiterated his position on immigration yesterday, with an emphasis on securing the border, during a speech to nearly all the country's governors in the White House State Dining Room. Mr. Bush has previously said he supports a guest-worker program. Congress is set to take up the issue this spring.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal, while not original, is part of his carefully crafted message of "post-partisanship" that appears aimed at a national audience, and dependent on the stratospheric fame and name recognition of the Mr. Olympia bodybuilding champion and star of the "Terminator" film series.

The governor is also receiving national attention for a recently approved energy plan and is working on reforming California's health care policies.

Mr. Schwarzenegger might be laying the groundwork for a run at national office in the future, although he is disqualified from running for president because the Constitution limits the office to U.S.-born citizens.

In an interview with the Politico published online Saturday, Mr. Schwarzenegger indicated that he is open to running for the U.S. Senate or for mayor of Los Angeles, after his second term as governor expires in 2011.

Republican hopefuls for president in 2008 -- Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani -- have also courted Mr. Schwarzenegger, in the hopes that the action hero's appeal might help them win a state that traditionally tilts Democratic.

In his speech, Mr. Schwarzenegger dispatched advice to Democrats and Republicans in Congress and to Mr. Bush, on how to handle the current Iraq war debate.

"To the Democrats, I say stop running down the president, and just tell the people what you would do. And to the Republicans, I say stop questioning the motives of the Democrats on the war and accept their right to believe in what they want," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

Then, Mr. Schwarzenegger -- who has erected what he called a "politically incorrect smoking tent," where Democrats and Republicans "schmooze" together at the governor's mansion in Sacramento -- recommended that Mr. Bush follow his example.

"And to the president I say, get yourself a smoking tent," Mr. Schwarzenegger said to laughter in the packed ballroom.

White House spokesman Tony Snow did not respond to a request for comment on the likelihood of a White House smoking tent.

Democrats May Try To Curb 527s (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Senate Democrats are considering placing curbs on soft-money 527 groups amid evidence that they are beginning to lose the political advantage these largely unregulated funds have given them over Republicans.

This is a move Democrats had strenuously opposed during the last Congress, when they were believed to benefit from the lion's share of 527 money, but now there is evidence that more of the money from these groups, named for a clause in the tax code, is flowing to the GOP.

Meanwhile, the second-ranking Senate Democrat, Assistant Majority Leader Dick Durbin (Ill.), is planning to introduce legislation in the next few weeks that would provide public funding for congressional candidates who qualify. He will unveil his bill in mid-March alongside Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), who has introduced similar legislation in the last several Congresses.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has weighed in by announcing that she supports public funding of congressional races, an idea that has not received serious consideration since 1993. And influential Democratic chairmen such as Appropriations Chairman David Obey (Wis.) and Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (Mass.) also support it.

Senate Rules Committee Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) is expected to hold hearings on a broad array of potential campaign-finance reforms. She will look closely at the activities of 527 groups, which exploited a loophole in election law to raise more than $500 million in unregulated political funds in the last four years.

"I promised a group of people that we would do some hearings on it," said Feinstein. "We'll take a look at the 527, what it is today and where it appears to be going. I'd like to know exactly what 527s are doing. My exposure to them is necessarily limited, as it is for most members. It's when you have a 527 weighing in against you that you want to know where this money is coming from."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has also said he is open to supporting new regulations for 527 groups, which can raise unlimited amounts of money to spend on federal elections. Reid, however, said that proposed legislation must be viewed with other proposals, such as restrictions on non-profit advocacy groups that have ramped up their spending in national races.

"We have to look at all of it — it can't be the only one," Reid said of 527 reform. "As long as it's part of an overall package on campaign-finance reform."

Though Democrats are approaching 527s cautiously, that they are approaching it at all represents a policy shift.

"The whole dynamic on the 527 issue obviously has changed," said Meredith McGehee, the policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, who played a central advocacy role when Congress last passed landmark campaign reform in 2002.

While Democrats overwhelmingly supported the 2002 legislation, they have largely opposed efforts since then to curb 527s.

"The last time, those of us who supported efforts to deal with 527s got most of our support from the Republican side," said McGehee. "What we've heard subsequent to the election is that Democrats were rethinking where they were on 527s because they were not getting the bang for the buck they expected and it was an equal-opportunity problem. Some Democrats are beginning to question whether Republicans may be better off in the long term [unless the law is changed]."

In the 2006 election cycle, the Republican Governors Association (RGA) raised significantly more money than any 527 group, according to Political Money Line, a nonpartisan group that tracks political spending. The RGA raised $42 million, nearly $14 million more than the second-biggest group, the Democratic Governors Association. The fourth-richest 527 was the Republican State Leadership Committee, which pulled in $19 million.

The conservative Club for Growth, which raised $6.4 million, ranked 10th among 527s in the last cycle. The Economic Freedom Fund, which also advocates for lower taxes and less government regulation, raked in over $5 million.

Steve Weissman, the associate director for policy at the Campaign Finance Institute, another group tallying political spending, said that Republican gains are less dramatic when 527s that spend money for state elections are set aside.

He said that 527s concentrating on federal races gave more than twice as much to Democrats than Republicans in the last election cycle. But he said the disparity was even wider in the run-up to the 2004 election, when Democratic-allied groups outspent GOP-allied groups by a three-to-one ratio.

Advocates of reform such as Joan Claybrook, the president of Public Citizen, said there is pressure on Democratic leaders to act because many newly elected lawmakers had signed pledges to "clean up Congress," to reduce the influence of lobbyists, and to provide public financing to candidates who agree not to accept public contributions.

Publicly financed campaigns and 527 reform go hand in hand because groups that have the ability to spend millions in unregulated funds threaten to overwhelm candidates who vow to abide by clean election laws.

"I'm real happy about it," said Claybrook of Democrats' new willingness to review 527 reform. "They were resistant in the past. I'm really pleased that they're reconsidering that."

Claybrook said that many new members won election to Congress in November because "the public was disgusted with lobbyists controlling the process."

Howard Gantman, Feinstein's spokesman on the Rules Committee, said his boss would work with Durbin on public financing legislation and explore ways to reduce the costs of campaigning.

"We're going to be looking at a number of issues. The issue she is most focused on is high cost of TV advertising in federal campaigns," he said. "Sen. Feinstein believes the airwaves are public airwaves and there should be a way to get more information about candidates to the public."

Gantman said she would also look at reforming leadership political action committees, which lawmakers use to distribute funds to their colleagues, and reforming the presidential public financing system.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) has introduced legislation that would restructure presidential public financing for the 2012 election as well as legislation that would require that Senate candidates file electronic campaign finance reports, which are easier to review than paper forms.

States Work On Proposals To Make Voting Easier (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Proposals designed to make voting easier and ballots more secure are beginning to advance in several states.

The proposals range from allowing voters to register until Election Day to expanding the use of absentee ballots and early in-person voting. Several states and Congress also are promoting paper trails for electronic voting machines.

The trend follows several years in which states passed tighter restrictions, such as requiring photo identification and proof of citizenship. Opponents of those restrictions, some of which were blocked by court action, are behind the push to bring more voters to the polls.

"There will be some legislatures that will be more receptive to those ideas," says Doug Chapin of Electionline.org, a non-partisan news and research organization.

The trend toward making it easier to register and vote could help Democrats in 2008, particularly in battleground states that will decide who wins the White House. Minorities and the poor would benefit the most, and they tend to vote for Democrats, says Kimball Brace of Election Data Services, a political consulting firm.

Democrats won six more governor's offices and 10 more state legislative chambers in November. They hold 28 governor's offices and control 23 legislatures, compared with 15 legislatures run by Republicans. Power in the others is shared. Action in the states includes:

•Iowa. Would-be voters could register on Election Day under a bill pending before the Senate State Government Committee. Seven states have same-day registration laws. Democrats took over the state House of Representatives and Senate in November. "I think the Legislature has the votes to do it," new Democratic Secretary of State Michael Mauro says.

•Maryland. The House and Senate have approved putting a constitutional amendment before voters in 2008 that would make Maryland the 16th state to let voters cast ballots in person before Election Day. Differences between the bills remain to be worked out.

•Minnesota. A proposal to automatically register voters when they get driver's licenses is set to begin moving through the Legislature this week. Democrats won the House in November, giving them full control of the Legislature. "Citizens are looking for ways to have more accessibility," new Democratic Secretary of State Mark Ritchie says.

Several states, including Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho and Indiana, are beginning to act on legislation paving the way for more voting by mail. Oregon and most counties in Washington vote by mail.

In Congress, Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., wants paper trails on electronic voting machines to verify that all ballots are counted.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., wants to crack down on campaign fliers and phone calls intended to mislead voters.

Because Democrats control the House and Senate, those bills have a better chance of moving this year.

McCain Firm On Iraq War Despite Cost To Candidacy (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C. — The Sugar 'n' Spice Drive-in is so jammed with supporters and prospective supporters that Arizona Sen. John McCain climbs onto a chair next to the soda fountain to be heard.

"Obviously, I have to talk to you about the war in Iraq," he says somberly as the crowd quiets. "All of us — all of us — are frustrated. All of us are angry because of the mishandling of the war. All of us are saddened by the loss of our most precious asset, and that's American blood."

Even so, the costs of retreat would be higher, fueling chaos in Iraq and drawing terrorists to U.S. shores, he says. "I want us to have patience. I want us to succeed."

There's no doubt about that. At stake in Iraq is not only President Bush's legacy but also the 70-year-old McCain's last hope for the White House. In a crowded field of candidates, he is the only full-throated defender of the increase in U.S. troop levels and the war itself.

In a turn that's nearly Shakespearean, McCain — Bush's chief rival for the Republican nomination in 2000 and a critic since then on everything from tax cuts to torture — finds his fate inextricably tied to the fortunes of his onetime adversary and the increasingly unpopular war he is prosecuting.

McCain's unyielding stance on Iraq has bolstered him with Republican regulars but eroded his standing among the independents and crossover Democrats who boosted his presidential bid seven years ago. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday, one in four independents and two in three Democrats say they're much less likely to support him as a result.

Last fall, McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani were tied in the lineup of GOP hopefuls in the USA TODAY poll. Now Giuliani leads McCain 40%-24%.

McCain has "taken a very hard stand — that we need more troops — and that's not where the American people are," says James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University. "He's isolated over there in a position he can't really change easily, even if things go more poorly on the ground."

On other fronts, McCain has trimmed his sails in ways that suit his ambitions. The nation's most prominent political maverick is cultivating his party's conservative power centers, including some he derided the last time he ran.

He voted against Bush's tax cuts in 2001; now he promises to extend them. He called evangelical leaders Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson "agents of intolerance" in 2000; now he is reaching out to Falwell and other prominent conservative Christians. He declares that Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide, should be overturned — a different position than he took in a 1999 interview.

But on the issue that dominates the 2008 election — and with a determination that could be seen as steadfast or stubborn — McCain continues to argue that the invasion of Iraq was justified and the war there must be pursued.

"He's no fool; he knows this is not a popular position to take," says Robert Timberg, a McCain biographer and editor of Proceedings: The Magazine of the U.S. Naval Institute. "But when it comes to a matter of national defense, when it comes to being behind the troops — those are issues that ultimately have no meaning politically to him."

McCain's bloodlines aren't in politics, Timberg notes. He is the son and grandson of Navy admirals.

Orson Swindle, a Marine pilot shot down over North Vietnam in 1966, says the years he and McCain spent together in a POW camp forged a fierce resolve to avoid the mistakes that they believe damaged the United States then.

DOJ_NMG_0137254

"John above all others has that sense of history," Swindle says. "He knows we cannot afford to lose or be perceived as losing."

'I don't think about it'

McCain is on the Senate floor on a recent day, arguing for debate on his resolution supporting Bush's increase in troop levels in Iraq. His comments finished — there will be no debate today, or in the near future — he sits for a brief interview.

Will Iraq be the defining issue of the 2008 campaign?

"I don't know, because I don't know what the situation in Iraq will be when the campaign really cranks up," he replies. "If things got under control in Iraq, if we are showing success, I'm not sure that it will be the biggest issue."

What is the political impact of the war on his campaign?

"I don't think about it," he says. Period. Usually the most quotable of candidates, he seems determined to utter as few words as possible on the topic. He sits almost completely still and speaks so softly it's hard to hear what he's saying.

Even though he does want to be elected president?

"Sure, but not so badly that I would let it affect this issue," he says, then repeats a line he has used before: "I would rather lose an election than lose the war."

Still, when told that a USA TODAY poll shows his support among independents has declined, he seems to have considered the question. His campaign's surveys show his standing among independents "steady," he says. He adds he often has been a critic of Bush, "including the conduct of the war."

Does it seem ironic he's being nicked for being too loyal to Bush?

"It was Jack Kennedy that said life isn't fair," he says with a tight smile.

Life may seem particularly unfair to McCain these days. During a campaign stop in South Carolina, he tells an audience in Hilton Head that former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld "will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history." His critique isn't new. McCain began saying he had "no confidence" in Rumsfeld's leadership in 2004, after the Abu Ghraib prison scandal.

Even so, the comment triggers attacks from both sides. Within hours, the Democratic National Committee issues a news release headlined "Why Voters Don't Trust McCain," accusing him of trying to have it both ways on the war — supporting it while blaming Rumsfeld. The next day, Vice President Cheney curtly dismisses McCain as "wrong" and suggests the senator apologize.

Democratic contender John Edwards has dubbed Bush's increase in troop levels "the McCain doctrine," and the liberal group Move On.org has aired an anti-war TV ad in Iowa and New Hampshire — where the first presidential contests will be held — that shows McCain and Bush embracing.

"The McCain plan to escalate," the announcer calls it.

Since August 2003, five months after the invasion of Iraq was launched, McCain has been arguing that more U.S. troops were needed there. Bush dismissed his objections for more than three years but now has committed 21,500 additional U.S. troops.

Even if that move turns out to be too little, too late, McCain will find it difficult to distance himself from the calamity likely to follow, allies and opponents say.

"Substantively, there are big differences between what McCain has wanted to do in Iraq and what the Bush administration has done, but try explaining that kind of nuance to voters on the campaign trail," says Dan Schnur, a top aide to McCain in 2000 who hasn't endorsed a candidate this time. "It's a tough spot to be in."

McCain's chief strategist, John Weaver, sees a silver lining. Voters "are looking for people who are not poll-tested or driven by the prevailing winds but someone who will do the right thing," he says. The debate on Iraq "reinforces" the sense of principle and strength that voters appreciate in McCain.

"He's also been spelling out what kind of catastrophe that could follow in Iraq — and if there is failure in Iraq, there will be political consequences, too," for those who advocated pulling back, Weaver says. "Nobody is talking about that."

McCain is still popular among Americans but less so than he used to be, and the assessment that he would be the strongest Republican in a general election has faded a bit.

In the USA TODAY poll, independents by a healthy 56%-26% now say they have a favorable impression of McCain. Still, compared with February 2000, during his last presidential campaign, his favorable rating among those voters has dropped 11 percentage points and his unfavorable rating has doubled.

His leading rivals for the Republican nomination, Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, support the war and have endorsed the increase in troops. Neither was in Congress to vote to authorize the invasion, however, and neither is so clearly identified with the conflict. Both have left some wiggle room in their comments about it.

In announcing his campaign, Romney said the United States should continue to "seek stability" in Iraq "so long as there is a reasonable prospect of success." During a trip last month to New Hampshire, Giuliani said, "There are no sure things" and Americans should prepare for the possibility of failure.

Independents' flight

New Hampshire was the site of McCain's breakthrough victory during the 2000 campaign. He trounced Bush in the primary by 18 percentage points thanks to independent voters. Six in 10 unaffiliated voters — they can cast their ballot in either party's primary — voted in the GOP contest. Surveys at polling places indicated they backed McCain over Bush by 3-1.

Now, a statewide survey by the University of New Hampshire this month found seven in 10 independents plan to vote in the Democratic primary in 2008. McCain, who led the GOP field in six previous UNH polls the past 20 months, is neck-and-neck with Giuliani.

"A key component of the McCain base from 2000 is evaporating," says Dante Scala, a political scientist at Saint Anselm College in Manchester and author of Stormy Weather: The New Hampshire Primary and Presidential Politics. "Which means he's going to have to work on those core Republicans."

So McCain assiduously is courting economic and social conservatives, some of them skeptics who remember his jibes from before. The morning after his stop at the Sugar 'n' Spice, McCain hosts a reception at the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Orlando. Falwell is listed as a co-host.

That evening, McCain flies on a small charter down the Florida coast to Vero Beach, a stronghold of suburban Republicans. Nearly 2,000 people show up for two question-and-answer sessions. The issues they raise range from immigration to health care to trade.

And, of course, Iraq.

"I like that he's for the president and not knocking him" when it comes to the war, says Eleanor Harpring, 87, a Republican.

Her daughter, Lisa McLaughlin, 48, a lawyer and political independent, isn't sure she agrees with McCain, though. "I just have questions with the direction we're going with the war," she says. "I think it may be irretrievable."

On stage in Vero Beach, McCain is confident and teasing, showing the dash of the decorated Navy pilot he once was. At the drive-in in Spartanburg, he sports a brown leather bomber jacket. To some, he has hero status: People in the audience hold cellphones over their heads to snap a picture and push forward copies of his best-selling Faith of My Fathers to be autographed.

"I admire what he stood up for as a POW" during the Vietnam War and his support for the president on Iraq, says Frank Horton, 68, a retired Navy man who has driven from nearby Boiling Springs to see McCain. Still, Horton worries that the boost in troops won't work. If so, he cautions, "we're going to have to rethink the whole thing."

McCain is a candidate on a tightrope. The exuberant insurgent from 2000 who seemed ready to speak his mind regardless of the consequences has been replaced by a more calculating candidate who is seeking support from the party's base and defending a war where victory is far from assured.

"This is not Luke Skywalker here," says South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, a key supporter for both bids, referring to a joking allusion McCain often used to refer to himself in 2000. "This is a totally different campaign."

McCain Strategy Courts Middle (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

Sen. John McCain is playing both sides against the middle as he supports sending more than 21,500 additional troops to Iraq while trying to distance himself from President Bush by labeling the war a "train wreck."

But election analysts and pollsters say the new tack is costing him independent voters, once his strong suit.

As the Arizona Republican, long popular among the liberal media, seeks to secure religious and social conservatives by espousing a hard line against homosexual "marriage" and abortion, independents are abandoning him in droves, a trend election analysts say could be fatal to his 2008 presidential hopes.

"It's almost bipolar," said pollster John Zogby, who has done work for Mr. McCain in the past.

"He walks a very thin line here. What made John McCain so popular was the maverick, independent, anti-party establishment, war-hero status. He was popular among independents, Democrats, and not unpopular at all among Republicans. But in the process of redefining himself from the hawkish, pro-surge, hug-the-president McCain, the redefinition has un-defined him," Mr. Zogby said.

Courting both sides while seeking the middle can be dangerous, Mr. Zogby said.

"You risk alienating both sides, and a strong case can be made for winning from the center this year. McCain, though, is not just making small moves. His is much more like a huge pendulum swing, and thus far, it has not been helping him in the polls," he said.

Mr. McCain began this month moving hard to the right, declaring his opposition to same-sex "marriage" and saying that he favored the overturn of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that made abortion a constitutional right. Asked in Seattle on Friday whether he was simply seeking to curry favor with conservatives, Mr. McCain said frankly: "I'll probably get into trouble, but what's wrong with sucking up to everybody?"

"He had 49 percent of the independent voters in New Hampshire a year ago, but that has dropped ... to 29 percent now," said Mr. Bennett, who heads New Hampshire's leading polling company.

Mr. Bennett said Mr. McCain is employing a "calculated" move not uncommon in Republican campaigns -- lock down the conservative base, even at the expense of some independents, and then move back toward the middle in November, hoping to draw back some lost supporters.

"He's still able to get those independents back. The real trick is, how far to the right can he go without losing those independents forever? And that's an unknown, but he's shown in the past he knows where the line is and that he can navigate that successfully," he said.

Mr. McCain also stands out among Republican candidates in his continuing support for the Iraq war and as the leading Senate advocate for Mr. Bush's "surge" plan.

Thus, Democratic National Committee spokesman Luis Miranda said, Mr. McCain may have difficulty distancing himself from Mr. Bush on the war, which many Americans have come to see as a losing effort.

"He is trying to have it both ways by criticizing a war he always supported, while also trying to stick close to the president," the spokesman said.

But Charlie Black, a prominent adviser to Mr. Bush, said Mr. McCain can benefit by sticking to his core beliefs, which voters like.

"John McCain is taking a position that he thinks is right, and probably there's not much political strategy behind it. That said, it might help him in primaries, but it's a potential problem in the general election, really depending on what happens in Iraq in the next year and a half," he said.

Mr. McCain has been unequivocal in his support for the surge plan, telling voters in Iowa last week that the president's proposed solution is the only way the U.S. can salvage a win in Iraq.

"I've said all along I cannot be concerned and will not be concerned about whether it helps me or hurts me with anyone. It's an issue that transcends any political ambition I might have," he said in Des Moines.

A Gallup Poll released yesterday shows that his convictions may pay off. The president's approval rating among Republicans is 76 percent, despite the somewhat unpopular surge plan. Thus, taking a position against the president puts Republicans at odds with the base.

But he is also clearly concerned with his plummeting support among independents, and in recent days has delivered some stern criticism to the president and his administration.

Mr. McCain on Wednesday said in a joint appearance with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in Los Angeles that his objections started three years ago "when I saw that this train wreck was taking place, and that we needed more troops, and we needed a different strategy." During a South Carolina visit last week, he harshly criticized former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld as "one of the worst secretaries of defense in history."

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement -- that's the kindest word I can give you of Donald Rumsfeld -- of this war," Mr. McCain told a crowd of 800-plus supporters at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Although the senator risks losing hawkish conservatives, his criticism of Mr. Bush may make him more palatable to independents. Although he drew some Democratic support in his 2000 presidential bid, he does not risk losing them this time, Mr. Zogby said.

"In this atmosphere, if you're pro-surge, there's virtually no Democrats to get anyway," he said.

Warner Endorses Possible McCain '08 Bid (AP)

By Zinie Chen Sampson

AP, February 27, 2007

Republican Sen. John W. Warner, the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, on Monday endorsed Sen. John McCain for the Republican presidential nomination.

The five-term Virginia senator cited McCain's service in the Navy and his familiarity with military issues in a statement backing his longtime friend, who is expected to formally announce his candidacy next month.

"America's next president will be challenged by a range of diplomatic and security issues of unprecedented complexity largely due to growing, worldwide terrorist threats," Warner said in the statement, released by McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "Senator McCain's long experience with, and understanding of, our military coupled with his proven, unquestioned courage and leadership, provide him with the essential qualifications for our next president."

Warner, a former Navy secretary and until last month the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has agreed with McCain on a number of national security and defense issues, but differs with him on President Bush's Iraq war policy.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Vying for the support of a key Democratic constituency, presidential hopefuls Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama have signed on to speak at an annual civil rights commemoration in Selma, Ala., on Sunday at the same time and just a few doors down from each other.

State Democratic leaders and event organizers said they couldn't remember a time when two leading presidential candidates spoke at the Bridge Crossing Jubilee, held annually in honor of the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march.

"It's a first," said Tarana Burke, a spokeswoman for Selma's National Voting Rights Museum and Institute, which sponsors the event. "Both of them are directly affected by the voting rights movement, and we're glad they appreciate that enough to come and help us commemorate."

Clinton, a Democratic senator from New York, is scheduled to headline the 10 a.m. service at First Baptist Church and to represent her husband, former President Bill Clinton, at his induction into the museum's hall of fame, Burke said.

Obama, a Democratic senator from Illinois who is black, is slated to speak at a "Unity Breakfast" and deliver the event's keynote address at the 10 a.m. service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church.

Both churches were sites where organizers and marchers met in the historic protests that helped lead to greater ballot access across the South for blacks.

State Democratic leaders estimated 40 to 50 percent of Democratic primary voters in Alabama are black.

Organizers say several dozen members of Congress also plan to attend, along with former presidential candidates Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton. A spokesman for Clinton said the senator is still finalizing details of her visit.

The former Massachusetts governor said in a Web interview posted Monday that the night before a January fundraiser that raised $6.5 million for his campaign, he and his sons decided to race each other around the track at the high school near their Belmont, Mass., home.

"We were there at the dinner table and someone said, 'Hey, should we go have a 440(-yard) race at the high school?'" Romney told RealClearPolitics.com, a Chicago-based site that culls and posts an array of political news, commentary and polling. "Sure enough, we all went upstairs and found our respective jogging shorts, put on tennis shoes or running shoes, went over to the high school and had a 440 competition at the track."

While the 59-year-old Romney runs on a treadmill each day, he ended up losing to three of his five sons.

"I came in last," said the candidate. "I was thinking I could beat my son Ben but, boy, even though he's in medical school and has gotta be out of shape, he still beat me, darn it!"

Aides said Josh Romney finished first, Matt Romney second and Ben Romney third, with Mitt Romney fourth. Tagg Romney, the eldest son, and Craig Romney, the youngest, did not compete.

The senator from Illinois raised more than $450,000 at fundraisers in Cincinnati and Columbus on Monday before collecting even more at an appearance in suburban Cleveland. A message seeking the amount raised was left at Obama's campaign headquarters in Chicago.

"I'm going to be spending a lot of time in Ohio so that people are familiar with me, so that by the time I'm the Democratic nominee they don't feel like I'm just parachuting in but that they've heard me and had a chance to kick the tires and lift the hood," Obama told reporters after the event in Columbus.

In his three stops to the state's largest cities, Obama covered a wide range of topics, including ending the war in Iraq — which received the loudest cheer at the Cleveland-area rally — developing universal health care and improving early childhood education.

More than 1,700 people filled a community college gymnasium in Highland Hills with chants of "O-bama!" A large banner overhead read "Obama Rocks!"

Giuliani Keys On The Economy And Taxes (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, February 27, 2007

Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani addressed his Democratic past on Monday and offered one reason for his political conversion — taxes.

"I don't think anything separates us more right now between Republicans and Democrats than how we look at taxes," the former New York mayor said. "What we understand as Republicans is that, sure, the government is an important player in this, but we are essentially a private economy. What Democrats really believe ... is that it is essentially a government economy."

In the days of President Kennedy, Giuliani said, Democrats understood the concept of the private economy and cutting taxes. But, he said, Democrats have "kind of lost that."

"It's one of the reasons that I used to be a Democrat and I'm now a Republican," Giuliani said before quoting Winston Churchill as saying: "If you're not a liberal when you're 20, you have no heart, but if you're not a conservative by the time you're 40, you have no brain."

The line prompted laughter from Giuliani's audience, a few hundred people affiliated with the Hoover Institution, a public policy center.

As he seeks the Republican nomination, Giuliani faces the challenge of winning over conservatives who make up the GOP's base and view him skeptically because of his moderate views on social issues and his past allegiance to the Democratic Party. In 1994, Giuliani endorsed Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo over Republican challenger George Pataki.

Addressing his political about-face, Giuliani said he once was a Democrat, then spent five years as an independent before finding a home with the Republican Party.

"Ronald Reagan made only two changes. I was like Churchill, I made three," he quipped.

Turning serious, he said he struggled with his political identity while he was an independent.

"I would say to myself Democrats care about the poor and Republicans don't, and how can I join the party that doesn't care about the poor," Giuliani said. "I finally came to the conclusion that we care about the poor more."

Later, when questioned on whether he had the foreign policy credentials to be president, Giuliani sought to diffuse another potential stumbling block to the nomination.

"What makes you think that the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" Giuliani asked, as the crowd laughed and applauded.

Defending his record, he said he's traveled the world extensively since being out of office and grasped foreign policy issues while mayor in the 1990s.

"It's something that I think I know, I think I know as well as anybody else who's running for president, probably better than a lot," Giuliani said.

At an evening event in northern Virginia, the ex-mayor sought to buck up activists at a state Republican Party dinner a few months after the GOP sustained severe electoral losses at all levels of government.

"You learn more from defeat than you do from victory," Giuliani said. "Our party has to be and should be the party of the future."

Rudy Defends Foreign Policy Capacity (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon

Long Island Newsday, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Rudolph Giuliani Monday defended his lack of hands-on foreign policy experience, telling a conservative audience that his time in City Hall, private business travels and paid speeches abroad helped prepare him to confront overseas threats.

"What makes you think the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" Giuliani said. "It's something that I think I know ... as well as anybody else who's running for president, probably better than a lot."

Giuliani also did a test drive of a series of domestic campaign themes before the group -- saying he would cut taxes, expand school choice and reform entitlement programs -- in a bid to explain his political conversion from Democrat to Republican.

He told the members of the Hoover Institution think tank that he believes the Republican philosophy of helping people help themselves trumps what he called the Democrats' big-government approach to taxes, schools and health care.

"I would say to myself, 'Democrats care about the poor and Republicans don't, and how can I join the party that doesn't care about the poor?'" Giuliani said, recalling how he pondered his party switch in 1980. "I finally came to the conclusion that we care about the poor more."

The speech was during the first half of a Washington swing that has Giuliani courting conservative activists, many of whom have been cool toward his campaign over his moderate stances on social issues. He also addressed an $85-a-person Virginia Republican party fundraiser last night before heading to a New Jersey fundraiser Tuesday.

On Friday, Giuliani will return to Washington to address the Conservative Political Action Conference, one of the largest gatherings of conservative activists in the nation.

Giuliani leads Republicans in recent polls, mainly among voters who remember him from 9/11 and give him high marks. But several leading conservatives have been critical of Giuliani, so he tried to soften that opposition Monday, mainly by highlighting his conservative approach to governing.

On foreign affairs, he has little experience and even gave up a spot in the Iraq Study Group last year as he prepared to run for president. Also, his main opponent, Sen. John McCain, is a Vietnam veteran who made a name as a foreign-policy expert. McCain picked up the endorsement Monday of another leading Republican on foreign affairs, Virginia Sen. John Warner.

But Giuliani held out his experience running the nation's largest city as part of his foreign policy portfolio. He also told a questioner that he has taken more than 90 foreign trips for his company, Giuliani Partners, spoken in about 35 countries and met a variety of world leaders -- though he barely touched on the biggest foreign policy challenge facing the next president: Iraq.

Giuliani's Mouth Is Running, But His Meter Isn't (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Republican presidential candidate and former New York mayor was charging $100,000 per speech before he announced two weeks ago that he was quitting the motivational lecture circuit. Now he can look forward to a year or more of talks like he gave yesterday to the Hoover Institution in the Willard ballroom -- earning nothing but applause.

Instead, the Hoover fellows got all this free, and more! Giuliani threw in bonus thoughts on foreign policy, such as "We clearly won the Cold War" (that two-second snippet had a market value of $71.58), and "We've never been a perfect country, we're never going to be a perfect country, but we're a good country, so we don't like war" ($214.74 for this six-second gem).

On the other hand, the value-conscious consumer apparently will have to pay full freight if Giuliani is going to say something controversial. The candidate said not a peep about abortion or gay rights. He skipped any mention of Iraq until a questioner asked him.

Finally pressed on Iraq, his two-minute, 28-second answer (a $5,297.04 value) included mentions of immigration, Social Security and class-action lawsuits. "I ran a hospital system, the second- or third-largest in the country. . . . We were paying out $500 million in claims, and settling claims that we just had to settle for amounts of money I would never thought you should give, and I'm a lawyer. That's what I really know about, even more than foreign policy."

Had they been paying customers, the Hoover fellows, drinking Cakebread Chardonnay and Swanson Merlot at noon, may have asked for a small rebate when Giuliani, explaining his switch from Democrat to Republican, cited "Churchill's statement: If you're not a liberal when you're 20 you have no heart, but if you're not a conservative by the time you're 40 you have no brain."

"There is no record of anyone hearing Churchill say this," reports the Churchill Centre.

But this was not a hostile crowd. Though religious conservatives are suspicious about Giuliani, the market conservatives of the Hoover Institution are not. Hoover overseer Bill Simon introduced Giuliani as "hopefully the next president" and recalled his "grace under pressure" on Sept. 11, 2001.

Giuliani had the moves of an experienced motivational speaker. He used his roving microphone to step out on either side of the lectern in ever-lengthening strolls. And he had a few jokes prepared. "When I was a kid . . . snow was terrific," he said. "Then I became mayor of New York, and it's $1 million an inch." That went over well, so he followed with a second, third and fourth snow joke.

His first 30 minutes listed heavily toward platitude. "The founding principle of our party is freedom," he disclosed, further announcing that "our economy is not a government-dominated economy." He also discussed at length his experience with the New York City public schools ("I was very, very big on the Stat programs, ConStat programs, and HealthStat programs and JobsStat programs").

His brief foray into foreign affairs meticulously avoided Iraq. "We've got to say to the rest of the world, 'America doesn't like war, America is not a military country,' " he recommended.

Whatever Americans think about war, Giuliani clearly didn't want to talk about it. The first questioner tried to prod him by asking about those who have a "deep concern" about his lack of "experience in foreign affairs."

DOJ_NMG_0137261

"Uh, what makes you think the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" he quipped. He then spoke about his business travel. "I've made about 91, 92 foreign trips and I've spoken in 34, 35 different countries," he said. "So I know the world."

He also would have pulled in a cool $3.5 million if those speeches were at the motivational rate.

Giuliani listed some of the things he learned from his travels: "My view of it is the American president needs to be our leader in foreign policy." And: "Foreign policy is also very much a part of our economy now." Those insights, at the customary rate of $35.79 per second, were worth $178.95 and $107.37, respectively.

The next questioner wanted to know about the Iraq-war resolutions in Congress (this produced Giuliani's answer about the New York City hospital claims) and his view on judicial nominees. "I would select judges based on my view of the Constitution, which is that the separation of powers is an important part of our freedom," he said.

"One more question?" asked the host. Nobody volunteered.

"Who wants to ask it?" Giuliani pressed. Finally, a woman near the front stood up.

"Where in your priority list would incentive pay be under your presidency?" she asked.

"Incentive pay," said a relieved Giuliani, "is critical to almost every institution."

Even to Giuliani himself, apparently. If you want a motivational speech, you're going to have to pay him for it.

Some Fans Clamor For Gore Sequel, But He Says No (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Al Gore has had a heartwarming February: a big night at the Academy Awards, a Nobel Peace Prize nomination and former president Jimmy Carter's endorsement for the 2008 presidential campaign.

Even so, these dream assets for a politician and the added pressure they're bringing to enter the race are unlikely to sway Gore to jump in, Democrats who know the former vice president said Monday.

Gore, 58, played with the idea Sunday night, when An Inconvenient Truth, the documentary on climate change that he stars in, won Oscars for best documentary feature and best original song. In pre-planned clowning, Gore had begun to announce a political "intention" when the band cut him off.

Two members of Norway's Parliament nominated Gore for the Nobel Peace Prize Feb. 1 for bringing attention to global warming. Carter told ABC News' This Week Sunday that "if Al should decide to run — which I'm afraid he won't — I would support Al Gore."

Backstage and at post-Oscar parties, the 2000 Democratic presidential nominee repeated his longtime assertion that he is not "planning" to run again. Political players read Gore's statement as falling short of an ironclad pledge to stay out. "He's obviously left a little crack in the window or the door," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist and Gore's 2000 campaign press secretary.

"At no time did he say, 'I'm not running,' just three little words," said Monica Friedlander, spokeswoman for DraftGore.com, one of several grass-roots groups pushing for a Gore candidacy.

Friedlander said the Oscars would be "huge" in augmenting the 42,000 signatures the group has collected for a petition asking Gore to run. An additional 1,000 signatures came in Sunday, she said.

Allies of Gore said they take him at his word. "I would like him to run, but I haven't been very persuasive, either," said Elaine Kamarck, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and Gore's former policy adviser. She was one of a number of former supporters who met in Boston this month to consider how to jump-start a Gore campaign.

If Gore should decide to run, he'd be in a strong starting position. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll of Democratic voters taken Feb. 9-11, Gore trailed only Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Though Gore was criticized during the 2000 campaign for a stiff manner, "clearly he's far more comfortable with himself" now, said Anita Dunn, a Democratic campaign strategist who worked for Gore's opponent for the 2000 nomination, Bill Bradley.

The new accolades "will fuel further enthusiasm for him to enter the race" but won't influence Gore, said Carter Eskew, a former campaign adviser to Gore.

Gore remains involved on global warming, serves on Apple's board and is an adviser to Google. "He has a full plate," Eskew said.

Carter told ABC that Gore is resisting the calls to re-enter politics. "I don't think he will," Carter said. "I've put so much pressure on Al to run that he's almost gotten aggravated with me."

Eskew said Gore is feeling as fulfilled by the growing impact of his efforts on global warming as he ever did in politics. "Our biggest audience in the 2000 campaign was the 20 million who watched his convention acceptance speech," Eskew said. "Well, (Monday) night a billion people were watching, so you really can have an impact outside of the normal boundaries. He is smart enough to understand how to leverage that."

Ginny Terzano, a former spokeswoman for Gore and now a spokeswoman for Microsoft, says, "He's getting a great deal of personal satisfaction out of changing lives without some of the strings and constrictions that you have running for public office."

"The guy is enormously happy, " Lehane said. "For him, the decision is: 'Let's see, could I make a lot of money and be on stage in front of a billion people, or would I want to be spending the next two years in a Holiday Inn in Dubuque, Iowa?' "

Gore's Oscar Fuels Call For Late Run (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore's triumph at the Oscars is already stoking activists' pleas for him to make a dramatic late entry into the fractious presidential race, and some key strategists insist he could announce as late as September or October and still win the nomination.

"Honestly, this was the inaugural parade we all envisioned," said Donna Brazile, his former campaign manager. "Gore's political stock is hot right now. I don't know if I would cash in now with so many players still on stage. There's no reason to force him to declare tomorrow. "

Indeed, Brazile said the former vice president could wait as late as the time states begin requiring delegate slates and statements of candidacy, since he could raise money quickly and much of the campaigns' budgets are devoted to a long nominating process he would avoid. "This was one of those rare moments, similar to the civil rights movement, when you experience the ground shifting," she said. "Perhaps it's not a movement for a presidential run, but a moment for the debate to start for real change on how we live on planet earth."

Friends who talk regularly with Gore say that he believes what he tells the press – that he's not planning to run for president. Backstage on Sunday night, he repeated his mantra: "I do not have plans to become a candidate for office again." No draft movement is being authorized or encouraged, and there are no internal discussions of a campaign, the friends insist. But they say he has deliberately not closed the door. It just doesn't feel right to him and he's only 58.

So the crescendo will rise. Brazile, now the founder and managing director of Brazile and Associates, is neutral in the race but says she would work for Gore if he declared. She acknowledges that after the near miss of 2000, she was among those who said "hell, no" about a 2004 bid. But she feels very differently now.

"He could come in at the end of the day as a candidate who can truly unite his party as well as his country," Brazile said. "He can help repair our country's image abroad. He's someone who can go toe-to-toe with world leaders and doesn't need a crash course in diplomacy." She remembers back in the '80s when Gore was in Congress and used to often cite a quote from Gandhi, ""Be the change you want to see in the world." Brazile said: "I believe he has become that quote."

"An Inconvenient Truth" was based on Gore's traveling global warming show as he told audiences about what he calls a "planetary emergency." He threw himself into promoting the film, traveling to film festivals around the world and telling audiences he would take it "door-to-door" if necessary." The movie includes his stock laugh line: "I'm Al Gore. I used to be the next president of the United States of America."

Michael Feldman, who served in the Clinton-Gore White House for eight years and was a senior adviser and traveling chief of staff to the vice president, said the Oscar means that "more people are going to see the movie and more people are going to get information about the issue of global warming, which will help build the collective political will to get something done on the issue."

Feldman, a founding partner of the Glover Park Group, said Gore's stroll down the red carpet "must have seemed like a little bit of an out-of-body experience to him," but then much of the last year has been that way. "He still sees his job as trying to help create a better political climate for action on this issue," Feldman said.

Gore is the chair of the Alliance for Climate Protection, funded in part by proceeds he has donated from "An Inconvenient Truth." Others on the group's governing council include Theodore Roosevelt IV, Carol M. Browner, and Brent Scowcroft.

The former vice president will be in the spotlight again with three major events in the next five months:

--On March 21, he'll star at global-warming hearings in both the House and Senate, testifying before a committee he once served on. He will be the sole witness before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works. On the House side, he will testify at a Joint Subcommittee Hearing on Climate Change, held by the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality, and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment.

--A new book by Gore, "The Assault on Reason: How the Politics of Fear, Secrecy, and Blind Faith Subvert Wise Decision Making, Degrade Our Democracy, and Put Our Country and Our World in Peril," is due out in May.

--On July 7 (7.7.07), he will be among the luminaries heading a 24-hour "Save Our Selves" (SOS) concert marathon across all seven continents. The "Live Earth" concert will bring together more than 100 of the world's top musical acts and is designed to reach more than 2 billion people through attendance and broadcasts. SOS – The Campaign for a Climate in Crisis was founded by Kevin Wall, who won an Emmy as worldwide executive producer of the Live 8 concert marathon.

At 10:48 p.m. Sunday, when the nominees for "best documentary feature" were announced on the 79th annual Academy Awards broadcast on ABC, the clip from an "An Inconvenient Truth" showed professorial Gore intoning: "Global warming creates more evaporation off the oceans. It seeds the clouds. But it sucks moisture out of the soil."

After Davis Guggenheim, the director, was announced as the winner, the camera in the audience showed him gesturing madly for Gore and the rest of the team to walk up with him. As they walked to the stage, the announcer said: "Davis Guggenheim and the cast were scheduled to shoot in New Orleans the night before Hurricane Katrina hit – an event that brought the threat and the impact of global warming."

Reaching the microphone, Guggenheim said: "All of us who made this film – Laurie, Lawrence, Scott and Leslie – we did so because we were moved to act by this man." He gripped Gore's left arm and didn't let go. "All of us were inspired by his fight for 30 years to tell this truth to all of us," Guggenheim said, moving his arm into a hug. "Thank you, Al. We are so inspired, we share this with you." He thrust the Oscar at the former vice president, who stepped into the spotlight.

"Thank you," Gore said, clutching the gold statuette. "I want to thank Tipper and my family, thank the Academy, and everyone on this amazing team. My fellow Americans, (laughter and applause) people all over the world, we need to solve the climate crisis. It's not a political issue, it's a moral issue. We have everything we need to get started with the possible exception of the will to act. That's a renewable resource. Let's renew it." He raised the 8.5-pound, 13.5-inch-tall, 24-karat-gold-plated Oscar as if in a toast, and he and the director hugged.

A little over an hour earlier, Gore made a surprise appearance after being teased by the ABC announcer as a mysterious "distinguished guest." Gore and Leonardo DiCaprio announced a "Go Green" program showing the Oscar production was environmentally friendly, and DiCaprio teasingly asked Gore if he had a titanic announcement.

Gore, as deadpan as if he were a "Saturday Night Live" regular, responded: "I'm kind of surprised that the feeling's so welling up here -- actually, you've been very convincing. And even though I honestly had not planned on doing this, I, I guess with a billion people watching, it's as (theatrical pause) good a time as (sighs) any. So, my fellow Americans, (laughter as he pulls a vertically folded sheaf of papers from the breast pocket of his Ralph Lauren tux), I'm going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce – "

Then the orchestra burst in with the swelling music that's used to usher off long-winded winners. "— My intention —" Gore continued, then was drowned out and walked off arm in arm with DiCaprio, to laughter and applause.

Between the former vice president's onstage appearances, George Clooney, presenting the Oscar for best supporting actress, joked that he had been "drinking backstage" with Gore and added in mock confidence, "I don't think he's running for president." The telecast cut to Al and Tipper Gore, laughing uproariously in the audience.

Gore arrived on the Kodak Theater red carpet a few hours before show time, spoke to foreign broadcasters and waved big as he posed with Tipper Gore, their son Albert Gore III and one of their daughters, Karenna Gore Schiff. The former vice president had told The Washington Post for a Sunday front-page story headlined "Al Gore, Rock Star" that he's "old enough to know that a red carpet is just a rug."

In case you missed it, here's the how the Al and Leo Show went:

DiCaprio: So, Mr. Gore, we've, uh, got a big crowd out here tonight – an even bigger one at home. Is there, is there anything you might want to announce? (Laughter, applause, whoops and a shout from the crowd of , "Oh, yeah!")

Gore: I'm just here for the movies. I'm just here for the movies, Leo. And on this occasion, I'm here to thank all of the talented people in this great industry who've been part of the mission to inspire a successful response to the climate crisis. And thank you, Leo, for being such a great ally in this effort. (Applause.)

DiCaprio: Thank you. The American film industry has always taken its obligations to society very seriously and it's now stepping up once again. Tonight, we're proud to announce that for the first time in the history of the Oscars, this show has officially gone green. (Applause.)

Gore: Which means that environmentally intelligent practices have been integrated fully into every aspect of the planning and production of these Academy Awards. And you know what: It is not as hard as you might think. We have a long way to go. But all of us can do something in our own lives to make a difference.

DiCaprio: Check out www.Oscar.com to get ideas from the Academy and the National Resources Defense Council, the NRDC, about how you can do YOUR part. And now, although our time is almost up, I just want to say I'm very proud to be standing next to such an inspirational leader in the fight against global warming. You are a true champion for the cause, Mr. Gore. (Big applause.)

Gore: Well, thank you. (More applause.)

DiCaprio: Now are you sure, are you positive that all this hard work hasn't inspired you to make any other kind of MAJOR, major announcement to the world here tonight?

Gore: Well, I do appreciate that, Leo. And I'm kind of surprised that the feeling's so welling up here -- actually, you've been very convincing. And even though I honestly had not planned on doing this, I, I guess with a billion people watching, it's as (theatrical pause) good a time as (sighs) any. So, my fellow Americans, (laughter as he pulls a vertically folded sheaf of papers from the breast pocket of his tux), I'm going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce (music crashes in) my intention – . (Swelling music drowns him out and the two leave the stage to laughter and applause.)

Oscars Add Lustre To Idea Of Gore Candidacy (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

The clamour for an Al Gore 2008 presidential candidacy stepped up several decibels yesterday after the evening award of two Oscars to the former vice-president for An Inconvenient Truth, his film on global warming.

Appearing twice on stage - first with Leonardo DiCaprio, who portrayed the former vice-president as something close to a modern prophet, and second to accept jointly with Davis Guggenheim, the movie's director, the award for best documentary feature - Mr Gore was by a long way the most adulated celebrity of the evening.

As the most popular politician in Hollywood, who raised the biggest cheers at two different moments during the awards, Mr Gore put paid to his image as a robotic geek that helped sink his chances of victory against George W. Bush in 2000.

Mr Gore's transformation has been assisted by his readiness to use self-deprecating humour - most recently on Sunday night when he seemed to be embarking on a speech to announce his presidential candidacy, only to be cut short by the orchestra.

Environmental lobby groups say that Mr Gore's Oscar success was the best publicity boost they could have hoped for at a stage when Capitol Hill is for the first time deliberating radical action to impose mandatory reductions on US carbon emissions.

And Democratic party activists who favour a Gore candidacy say the Oscar success, combined with his recent nomination for the Nobel peace prize, would provide the perfect platform for a declaration of his candidacy. Opinion polls put Mr Gore third behind Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama but ahead of John Edwards and Bill Richardson among the Democratic hopefuls.

Senior Democrats say Mr Gore could be catapulted into a frontline position, particularly if he waited until September or October when the public is likely to have become saturated with the increasingly tense contest between Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton. Last year's Nobel peace prize was announced on 13 October.

"If you go to the west coast the big issue is not Iraq - as it is in Washington - but global warming," said Simon Rosenberg, the head of the New Democratic Network, in Washington. "The Oscar -ceremonies offered the spectacle of an exuberant repudiation of the Bush years. It is hard to think of a better platform for Mr Gore's public profile."

Mr Gore's extraordinary reinvention as a cultural icon is likely to be sustained by a series of prominent engagements in the next few months, including his app-earance as the sole witness next month in Senate and House of Representative committee hearings on global warming.

Dubbed by some as the "Goracle", Mr Gore is likely to attract national ratings when he testifies, say climate change lobbyists.

"If you look at where the American public stands on global warming there has been a tremendous shift in the last year which coincides with the popularity of Al Gore's movie," says Emily Frigdor at the Public Interest Research Group.

However, Capitol Hill staff members counsel against expectations of a drastic legislative shift in the near future, particularly given Mr Bush's aversion to any mandatory targets for carbon emission reductions. They point to the likelihood of more modest legislative measures, such as a bill that would require electricity providers to ensure that 20 per cent of power supply comes from renewable energy sources by 2020.

"It is going to be incredibly difficult to combine a bill that takes radical action on global warming with the goal of building a political majority on Capitol Hill," says Dave Hamilton, of the Sierra Club, the environmental organisation. "But events like Al Gore's Oscar success will make it progressively more achievable by building up public pressure."

Meanwhile, friends of Mr Gore are divided on whether he will declare his candidacy. Some rule it out and others say it is scheduled for the autumn. "He could out-finance everybody except Hillary without too much difficulty," said one.

Oscar Victory May Prove Inconvenient For Gore (WT)

By Jennifer Harper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

A gold statuette and a moment of goofiness have garnered Al Gore considerable public buzz after his big night at the Oscars. It's not necessarily presidential buzz, though.

An Academy Award for "An Inconvenient Truth" has further cemented Mr. Gore's name to a single issue: global warming. But Mr. Gore's fame could be fleeting because the issue does not resonate with most Americans.

"Winning an Oscar and making a joke in the pop culture arena will definitely raise his profile. Mr. Gore will get attention over the next few weeks as everyone repeats the question, 'Are you going to run?' " said Morgan E. Felchner, editor of Campaign & Elections magazine.

"But Gore is focusing solely on global warming, which is not topping public awareness polls," Ms. Felchner said. "The popularity bump will last a few weeks, then most likely fade away."

Indeed, global warming is not a "top-tier issue," a Pew Research survey of 1,708 adults found last month. The survey ranked global warming near the bottom in a 23-item list of policy priorities for the White House and Congress. Only 19 percent said they had "deep concern" about climate change.

Regardless of his new ebullience, Mr. Gore does not dominate favorability polls. He ranks fourth among Democrats behind Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina in a Pew survey of 1,509 adults released Friday. Only a quarter of Democrats agreed that Mr. Gore had "a good chance" of winning their vote.

A Harris poll of 3,423 adults released Feb. 14 also found Mr. Gore fourth behind the trio of senators. Such sentiment has some history.

"There are no signs that Gore's high-visibility focus on global warming has produced changes in his standing with the American public," a Gallup survey released in August concluded.

A previous change of image -- hip earth-toned clothes and a Rolling Stone magazine cover -- did not cement a win for Mr. Gore in 2000 either. But he has left a cultural mark, said Robert Thompson, director of the Bleier Center for Television and Popular Culture at Syracuse University. Mr. Gore could ride a "big wave" post-Oscar, he said.

"There's a larger lesson though," Mr. Thompson added. "Al Gore has shown other politicians that they can communicate to the public in ways beyond the traditional podium and microphone."

Meanwhile, "An Inconvenient Truth" made $45 million at the box office. The book sold 300,000 copies last year and 3,000 copies so far this year, according to Nielsen BookScan. The film was released to DVD in November. Yesterday, it was bested on Amazon.com's DVD sales charts by dramatic movies "The Secret," "The Departed," "Babel" and "Casino Royale."

Mr. Gore's efforts to bring his film to public-school systems has not entirely panned out. In December, the National Science Teachers Association declined offers to distribute it free to 50,000 classrooms. Frosty Hardison, a father of seven in Federal Way, Wash., began a campaign in January to ban the film in his local public school system.

"Al Gore's video has no place in my kids' public school classroom any more than condoms," Mr. Hardison said at the time.

Gore Shut The Door On '08. What If Someone Opens A Window? (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Back in February 2000, I was in Harlem riding alongside the man who now says, "I used to be the next president of the United States." He looked out the window and said: "This should be a great interview."

Al Gore and I were on our way to an editorial board meeting at the New York Amsterdam News, where I had hoped he would address plans to expand economic prosperity to black families. To my surprise, Gore walked in the room, greeted the editors and reporters, and proceeded to throw my talking points out the window. He wanted to discuss global warming instead.

For a while, I thought the vice president had lost his mind. How dare he discuss environmental issues with one of the nation's leading black newspapers? Black people, I reasoned, had far too many problems, such as lack of affordable housing and limited access to health care, jobs and education, to spend our precious time discussing an issue no one understood. But Gore saw things differently and proceeded without warning to draw a large circle on the blackboard and explain the dangers of global warming and how greenhouse gases were trapped in the atmosphere.

Well, I thought, there goes our endorsement. Former Sen. Bill Bradley (N.J.), who was still very much alive in the battle for the Democratic nomination, likely would get the highly sought-after backing. But, to my amazement, the paper endorsed Gore and I learned a valuable lesson about allowing a candidate to lay out his own agenda.

Gore's political stock is as high as I have seen it in the more than two decades that he's been on the national stage. With an Oscar-winning documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," that is the buzz of Hollywood and generating the kind of free media that is the envy of any current contender, Gore is sticking to his position that he has no intention to run for president. Perhaps I should just take his word and resume flirting with those who have made the decision to run. But something in my gut tells me that there's still a chance Gore will jump in right before the filing deadlines or as the slating of delegates begins — and win both the nomination and the presidency.

I like the way former President Jimmy Carter said it on ABC's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos": "My favorite Democrat, for a number of years now, has been Al Gore. If Al should decide to run — which I'm afraid he won't — I would support Al Gore." I am sure Gore is a little irritated at me and others who continue to drop his name at every opportunity, but it just doesn't feel right watching Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Joseph Biden (D-Del.), John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) run without someone of Gore's stature and leadership also in the race.

At a time when America's stock has dwindled throughout the world, Gore has earned the admiration and respect of many foreign leaders. After eight tumultuous and disheartening years of the current administration, our nation will need someone in the Oval Office who can pick up the phone and ask the international community to join with us in fighting the war on terror, global warming, the rapid spread of HIV/AIDS on the African continent and so many other ills that plague our planet. And here at home, Gore also could lead us back to fiscal responsibility and prosperity so that all families can make ends meet, not just the wealthiest 1 percent.

As one of my friends recently wrote to me in an e-mail: "Al Gore has become a rock star: Oscar and Nobel Peace Prize nominations, selling out 10,000 tickets in 10 minutes for a global warming slide show in bright red Idaho, foreign capitols taking his lead reversing policy related to climate change, mega-corporations like Wal-Mart and General Electric changing the way they do business simply because Al Gore has been so successful shining a light on the impending catastrophic consequences of global warming. The list goes on and on. Al Gore is on fire!"

No, he's actually liberated from the politics that once sunk his chances of becoming our commander in chief.

With so many other qualified people running, Gore's decision or lack thereof may hinge on whether there is an appetite for someone who isn't a "new face," who is ready to take America in a completely different direction and to transform the way we fight the war on terror.

I understand if Gore is unwilling to get back in the fray and distract himself from an international campaign on the threat of global warming. I understand if all he wants is to come to Capitol Hill on March 21 to put more pressure on Congress to act. And I understand if he decides to just wake up each day with his wife, Tipper, at his side and spend his free time with the grandchildren.

After serving his country in Vietnam, on Capitol Hill and in the White House, Gore has earned the right to do just about anything, including passing up a chance to become the next president of the United States.

I am sure Gore will continue to close the door on running in 2008, but what if someone opens a window? If the current contenders continue to pander and play the old politics of yesterday, the opportunity for a late entry may yet present itself on the road to the White House.

Donna Brazile, the campaign manager for Democratic presidential nominee Al Gore in 2000, runs her own grass-roots political consulting firm.

An Oscar For His Second Act (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Now, somebody ought to make a movie about Al Gore. I would call it "An Uncomplaining Life."

The movie would be about a man who did not quit, who came off the canvas after a painfully close election -- he won the popular vote, after all -- who accepted defeat graciously and tried to unite the nation, who returned to the consuming passion of his earlier days, the environment, and spoke endlessly on the topic, almost always for free, who starred in a documentary based on his speech and who Sunday night, before a billion or so people, won an Academy Award for his effort. This may or may not be a stepping stone to the presidency, but Gore gives us all a lesson on how to live one's life.

It's a joke, isn't it? I mean, it was Gore who was universally seen as the flawed man, uncomfortable in his own skin and, therefore, in this TV age, incapable of uniting the nation. He was caricatured by some of my colleagues as a serial exaggerator, a fibber, a pretender -- the guy who invented the Internet, who was the model for the novel (and movie) "Love Story," who applied one too many coats of passion to that kiss he delivered to his wife, Tipper, at the Democratic National Convention in 2000. There were so many reasons not to vote for him -- none, in retrospect, much good.

Now it is his jaunty, frat-boy opponent who cannot unite the country. Now it is the towel-snapper, the rancher who does not ride horses, the decider who decides wrongly and whose approval ratings are like the temperature of a dead man. Now it is George W. Bush that the nation does not trust or believe -- and this has and will cost us plenty. What if Bush is right about Iran? What if the Iranians are really helping to kill Americans in Iraq? Whatever you may think of the Iraq war, it is impermissible for anyone to kill Americans and yet it may be happening and may continue because the president is widely disbelieved. Gore could not have gotten us into this.

Gore would not have taken the United States to war in Iraq. He would have finished the job in Afghanistan -- it was al-Qaeda and its Taliban enablers who were responsible for the attacks on us on Sept. 11, 2001, not Saddam Hussein, no matter how vile he might have been. Gore would not have dealt with the Iranians and the North Koreans in such a juvenile fashion -- axis of evil, after all -- and all over the world, wherever you and I went, we would not detect such anger toward America. The last time I saw Gore was at a screening of his now-acclaimed movie, "An Inconvenient Truth." I wrote at the time that, on paper at least, he was the near-perfect Democratic presidential candidate -- right on the war, above all. This observation, hardly original with me, is being echoed elsewhere, and it would be impossible for Gore to ignore it. Jimmy Carter said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that he thought Gore ought to run and had told Gore so insistently. "He almost told me the last time I called, 'Don't call me anymore,' " Carter said. What Gore told me was something similar: "I think there are other ways to serve."

We'll see. After all, Gore -- the son of a senator himself -- was raised for the presidency. But for the moment at least, he is showing all the irritating signs of a man at peace with himself. He abandoned Washington for Nashville. He has made a bundle in his investments, and he has set out to show that there is life after a failed candidacy, a purposeful life in which a man can do some good. His movie and his speeches are -- to paraphrase what Clausewitz said about war -- a continuation of politics by other means. He cannot make war but he can still make a difference.

I know -- and so does Gore -- that all this will change if he enters the race. Maybe that ol' devil of uncertainty will come creeping out of his skin, and maybe he will become shrill, and maybe he will somehow throw his voice so that it seems to be coming from outside his body. But the woman I love tells me that life is a series of little lives, and no one has proved the truth of this better than Gore. With an Oscar in his fist and triumph on his face, Al Gore is a man you can tell your kid about. That, maybe, is even better than being president.

Gore To Bring Eco-friendly Message To UMBC (BSUN)

By Nia-Malika Henderson

The Baltimore Sun, February 27, 2007

Hoping to latch on to the buzz surrounding former Vice President Al Gore's double dose of Oscar, the Annapolis and Anne Arundel Chamber of Commerce said Monday that the Gore eco-friendly train will stop in Baltimore.

Gore, whose documentary, An Inconvenient Truth, took home Oscars on Sunday night for Best Documentary and Best Song, will give a 90-minute speech May 8 on the effects of global warming -- the topic that has turned him into a hip wonk.

"We snared him a good while ago and it just happened that he got the Nobel Peace Prize nomination and Oscar wins, so that was pretty cool," said Anne Joyner, who handles special projects for the Chamber of Commerce. "I just hope that he doesn't announce that he's going to run for president. We like the 'What if he does?'"

About 1,000 tickets, priced at $35, have been sold. The venue, University of Maryland, Baltimore County Retriever Activities Center, holds 4,000.

Portions of the film will be shown before to the speech, which will also include a question-and answer session.

Since losing his bid for president in 2000, Gore has devoted much of his attention to global warming, traveling the world with a PowerPoint presentation and urging audiences to become "carbon neutral." Coming across as professorial yet likable, Gore has risen to a level of prominence unknown to most former vice presidents.

He scored laughs during a Saturday Night Live appearance and has become a favorite in Hollywood circles. (Yes, that was Leonardo DiCaprio and George Clooney fawning over him at the Academy Awards. And yes, that was Hollywood's elite giving Gore a standing ovation.)

Joyner said Gore could get a similar reception in May.

"He puts great care in accepting an invitation and gives it some personal attention," she said. "And he's recognized that Marylanders are environmentally sensitive and focused, and his message will be well-received."

Clintons' Charity Not Listed On Senate Disclosure Forms (WP)

By John Solomon And Matthew Mosk

DOJ_NMG_0137269

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former president Bill Clinton have operated a family charity since 2001, but she failed to list it on annual Senate financial disclosure reports on five occasions.

The Ethics in Government Act requires members of Congress to disclose positions they hold with any outside entity, including nonprofit foundations. Hillary Clinton has served her family foundation as treasurer and secretary since it was established in December 2001, but none of her ethics reports since then have disclosed that fact.

The foundation has enabled the Clintons to write off more than $5 million from their taxable personal income since 2001, while dispensing $1.25 million in charitable contributions over that period.

Clinton's spokesman said her failure to report the existence of the family foundation and the senator's position as an officer was an oversight. Her office immediately amended her Senate ethics reports to add that information late yesterday after receiving inquiries from The Washington Post.

"The details of the Clintons' charitable family foundation and Senator Clinton's role in it have always been publicly available, but, in an oversight that leaders of both parties have made, it was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, which has been corrected," Hillary Clinton's press secretary, Philippe Reines, said yesterday.

Among the institutions receiving grants from the Clinton Family Foundation were Yale University, where both attended law school; groups named for deceased heads of state in Israel and Jordan; and a charity connected to the Arkansas businessman who helped Hillary Clinton make $100,000 on a commodities trade that stirred controversy a decade ago, Internal Revenue Service reports show.

Hillary Clinton's decision to amend her Senate disclosures comes after several other high-profile politicians came under scrutiny for omitting family foundations from their financial disclosure reports, including former Senate majority leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). They amended their disclosures, and neither was penalized.

Advisers to the Clintons said the family foundation amounted to only a fraction of their overall charitable efforts, which generate millions each year.

The charity is separate from the New York-based William J. Clinton Foundation, which has directed $10 billion in corporate money and resources toward slowing the global spread of AIDS, addressing climate change, and reducing hunger and poverty in developing countries.

The smaller family foundation lists as its address a post office box in Chappaqua, N.Y., where the Clintons live. Hillary Clinton is listed as secretary and treasurer, Bill Clinton as president and the couple's daughter, Chelsea, as a director. None takes any compensation.

The charity has been funded with money from lucrative book deals for both Clintons and from speechmaking by Bill Clinton since they left the White House in 2001. The foundation's tax filings are available on an Internet repository for IRS documents. The only time the Clintons mentioned the foundation on her ethics report was in 2002, in a footnote about their $800,000 donation that year, but it did not disclose as required her position or other information about the foundation. In subsequent years, they made no mention of it.

Between 2001 and 2005, the Clintons seeded the charity with $5.16 million of their money. The foundation's 2006 tax form is not due until later this year.

Tax records show the Clinton Family Foundation was created during Hillary Clinton's first year in the Senate, when the couple gave $800,000 to launch the organization in early December 2001. The charity distributed no funds that year. The next year, the Clintons made $170,000 in donations while adding $100,000 of their own funds.

The Clintons donated much larger amounts in recent years as legal bills from Bill Clinton's impeachment were paid off and their personal fortunes soared. At the end of 2005, the Clinton family foundation had nearly $4 million in cash assets.

Jay Carson, a spokesman for Bill Clinton, said all of the foundation's remaining money will eventually go to charities and other institutions. He said the Clintons' other charitable efforts include raising millions a year for other nonprofits and making donations of their own money. He said the Clintons helped raise nearly $11 million the past two years for other nonprofits.

"It is hard to beat the Clintons' devotion to charitable work, unless you founded Microsoft or are the chairman of Berkshire Hathaway," he said.

The retired chief of the IRS branch that oversees tax-exempt nonprofits said family-run foundations are commonly created by wealthy Americans, allowing them to earn tax breaks by donating to a charity whose future good works they can control. Such charities need only to give 5 percent of proceeds each year to maintain a tax exemption.

"There are certain tax advantages to having your own foundations and not having the money as part of your estate," said Milton Cerny. "They can take the tax deduction up front, as soon as they put the money into the foundation."

Private family foundations vary in amounts they give away each year. The Clintons have given away a quarter of their money. The family foundation of record producer David Geffen, by comparison, has been giving away most of what it takes in -- roughly $1 million a year -- leaving it with a balance of $400,000 at the end of 2005.

The Walton family, heirs to the Wal-Mart fortune, put $415 million in new money into its foundation in 2005. It gave $158 million to charitable causes, leaving the foundation with a $1.3 billion balance.

The Clinton foundation's donations range from $100,000 to the Asian tsunami relief fund in 2005 to causes in the former president's home state of Arkansas.

The Clintons have been generous to their alma maters, with donations going to Yale Law School, Georgetown University, Wellesley College and Oxford University, which Bill Clinton attended on a Rhodes Scholarship.

The foundation has also paid considerable attention to Arkansas, providing the bulk of the support for the Clinton Birthplace Foundation, which maintains the former president's boyhood home in Hope, Ark. They have donated $225,000 to the Little Rock Baptist church they attended, and to organizations devoted to the needs of children in the state.

One Arkansas recipient was the Diane Blair Foundation. Diane Blair is the late wife of James Blair, the businessman who helped Hillary Clinton with controversial commodities trades in the late 1970s that netted her about $100,000. There are two foundations in Diane Blair's name. One is a private family charity; the other funds a center for the study of Southern politics at the University of Arkansas.

The Clintons' tax form indicates the money went to the private charity, but James Blair said in an interview yesterday that the Clintons "miscoded" the entry. The check actually went to the university fund, he said.

"She was Hillary's closest friend," Blair said of his wife, who died in June 2000.

At least three beneficiaries were from the Middle East, where the former president worked to forge an elusive peace agreement during the 1990s. They include $50,000 to the King Hussein Foundation, named in honor of the late Jordanian king, who was a key player in Clinton peace talks; $50,000 to American Friends of Yitzhak Rabin, honoring the assassinated Israeli prime minister; and the American Friends of Peres Center, honoring former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres.

The Clintons also gave $50,000 to the Vital Voices Global Partnership, a group aimed at empowering women worldwide. Hillary Clinton is an honorary chair.

Such omissions deprive the public of the right to scrutinize their political leaders' financial dealings and identify possible conflicts of interest, the former chief of disclosure for the Federal Election Commission said.

Kent Cooper, who retired after two decades overseeing the FEC's public disclosure office, said congressional ethics committees have not enforced the ethics disclosure requirements forcefully. As a result, he said, candidates "know there is no great consequences, and so the habit has developed that people dismiss an omission as a clerical error, when in fact it is a crucial piece of the puzzle about a member's finances that is being hidden."

A Bundle Of Good Moves (WP)

SEN. HILLARY Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has decided that her presidential campaign will reveal the identities of its major fundraisers, after all. This is welcome news for the conduct of the 2008 race, during which big bundlers -- the well-connected fundraisers who can help collect $100,000, $200,000 or even $1 million in donations -- will be more important than ever.

With Ms. Clinton's change of heart, the top-tier contenders of both parties -- Democrats Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards, and Republicans John McCain, Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mitt Romney -- have agreed to identify their chief campaign underwriters. The Clinton campaign said she would release the names of her big bundlers at amounts such as $100,000 or $200,000. We trust that as those bundles swell in size -- the Clinton campaign has tasked its top fundraisers with bringing in $1 million or more -- the levels of disclosure will rise accordingly, for the Clinton campaign and its rivals. With more private money than ever being raised and spent, this information is critical to campaign finance disclosure.

But it makes no sense for such disclosure to be left to the whim or goodwill of individual campaigns; it should be required by law. The click of a mouse can summon a blizzard of campaign finance data. Yet the most critical information -- the identities of the true financiers of the campaigns and the amounts they have brought in -- remains obscure, available only if campaigns deign to provide it.

In 2008, it appears, most of them will. But it is a shaky campaign finance disclosure system that relies on the good sense of candidates. The law could easily be tweaked and tightened to require candidates to report the information they already possess.

Obama And The Illinois Political Machine (AP)

CHICAGO -- Democrat Barack Obama piled on the praise last month as he stood beside Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and embraced the mayor's bid for a sixth term.

"I don't think there's a city in America that has blossomed as much over the last couple of decades than Chicago, and a lot of that has to do with our mayor," Obama said, supporting Daley ahead of Tuesday's city election.

It was a switch from a year earlier, when the Illinois senator brushed off questions about endorsing Daley and said reported corruption at Chicago's City Hall gave him "huge pause."

What happened in the meantime? Obama decided to run for president.

The endorsement is one example of the sometimes complicated relationship between Obama -- who offers himself as an untainted, non-traditional alternative -- and Illinois' sometimes tarnished political establishment.

While Obama prides himself as an independent-minded Democrat, he's maintained relations with important parts of the establishment, from remnants of the legendary Chicago Democratic machine to the city's leading black politicians.

Yet as an outsider who came to the city as an adult, he doesn't owe his political fortunes to ward bosses and can claim distance from the political corruption for which the city is famous. He's ruffled feathers in the past by taking on incumbents or bucking his party's anointed candidate in a statewide race, but he has also mended fences and now has Illinois' most important politicians lined up to support his run for president.

"He understands ... about politics and how you make friends in politics," said Rep. Bobby Rush, who Obama unsuccessfully challenged in 2000 for his seat in Congress.

Rush said Daley, for one, can be helpful to Obama because of his national reputation. Daley's brother, William, who headed Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000, has already signed on as an Obama adviser.

Rush is also backing Obama's bid for the White House.

Growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia, Obama didn't come up through the ranks of traditional Chicago Democratic politics.

Obama writes in his book "The Audacity of Hope" that he got into his successful first race for the Illinois Senate at the encouragement of friends who thought his work as a civil rights lawyer and experience as a community organizer made him a good candidate.

That 1996 election put him in conflict with the incumbent, Alice Palmer. She planned to run for Congress and endorsed Obama as her successor. But when Palmer lost the congressional primary, Obama would not step aside so she could keep her state Senate seat.

Once he got to the state Senate, Obama was no radical. He became a political protege of current Senate President Emil Jones, a 35-year veteran of the legislature and one of the state's most influential black lawmakers.

Obama was in the Illinois Senate just a few years when he went after the congressional seat held by Rush.

In his book, Obama calls it an "ill-considered race," and he and another state senator who challenged Rush were trounced in the primary. Rush had the support of the powerful Cook County Board president and widespread support in his district.

Obama also was viewed as a long shot in his 2004 bid for the U.S. Senate. He decided to run even though most party leaders were backing the state comptroller, who was the son of a powerful Democratic leader. Other candidates included Mayor Daley's former chief of staff and a millionaire who had helped elect the Democratic governor. Obama's candidacy gained momentum when the millionaire businessman, who had once led in the polls, acknowledged striking his ex-wife and calling her names.

Once Obama's fortunes started rising with his starmaking address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and his Senate win, he found almost uniform support from Illinois Democrats.

Yet Obama still didn't always stick to the party line, most notably last year when he rejected the party-backed candidate for state treasurer to support a political newcomer, putting him at odds with the state Democratic chairman, Illinois House Speaker Michael Madigan of Chicago.

Over the summer, Madigan derisively referred to Obama as "the messiah" in a published report. But by early this year, Madigan was proposing moving up the state's 2008 primary from March 18 to Feb. 5 to give Obama more momentum early in the presidential race.

For his part, Obama has lined up with party leaders in some recent local races. He supported the party's choice to become the new Cook County board president, despite allegations of political nepotism surrounding the man, who was the son of the previous board president.

Obama also endorsed Daley, saying he was still concerned about City Hall corruption but thought Daley had taken steps to clean it up. And he supported the November re-election of Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich, whose administration is under federal investigation for hiring fraud.

Attorney Gery Chico, the Daley former chief of staff who lost to Obama in the 2004 Senate primary, said Obama has been under increasing pressure to play a role in local races and it's smart for him to get in the mix.

"You don't want to go the route of Al Gore," Chico said. Gore famously didn't win his home state of Tennessee in his failed bid for president in 2000.

But the Daley endorsement in particular -- featured in one of the mayor's campaign mailers -- isn't sitting right with some people in this city known for its legendary political machine.

Daley's father, the late Mayor Richard J. Daley, built the once-mighty machine that doled out jobs and favors in exchange for support for Democrats on Election Day. The courts have mostly dismantled the machine by outlawing political patronage, but the city's powerful Democrats -- like Daley -- can still turn out the vote.

Obama's decision to support Daley turned off voter Alan Dobry, who's part of a Chicago independent-voters group.

"He's trying to play with the machine," Dobry said. "I'm very unhappy about it."

They Rush For California's Gold (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

A UCLA linebacker shells out $11,100 to help a Republican senator in Pennsylvania.

A businessman from the small northern California town of Eureka spends $515,000 to defeat a powerful Democrat in South Dakota.

A Silicon Valley couple funnels cash to elect Democratic secretaries of state in swing states such as Ohio who will oversee voting in the coming presidential election. Those tidbits from campaign finance reports demonstrate why California lately feels like Iowa or New Hampshire next winter. For politicians, including presidential candidates, it's where the money is.

Last week alone, Democrats Barack Obama, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Christopher Dodd and Joseph Biden made the trek. Republican Sen. John McCain was also here, following his rival, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who had been here the week before, while Republican Mitt Romney will be here next month.

"It is the place you go to get political money," said Sheila Krumholz, director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C.

Californians spent at least $502 million on federal campaigns in the last four years, federal campaign records show -- 24 percent more than runner-up New York and about 13 percent of all federal campaign funds raised nationally.

At the Los Angeles Times' request, the center compiled a list of California's top 100 donors to federal campaigns. The Times supplemented that effort by interviewing contributors and reviewing Federal Election Commission documents and other records.

The donations were for the 2003-2004 election cycle, which included the latest presidential campaign, and the 2005-2006 races for the U.S. House and Senate.Donors' motives vary. They might be trying to gain an edge in business, or access to powerful officials. Some win perquisites, such as ambassadorships. Many are ideologues whose passions run high on the war or health care or taxes.

Federal law restricts donors from giving more than $4,600 directly to a single candidate in a year. But many give far larger sums to independent campaign committees. Others leverage their money by organizing fund-raising events.

In the past four years, Deborah Rappaport and her husband, venture capitalist Andrew Rappaport, of Woodside, have spent $5.2 million on federal politics, much of it to encourage young people to vote. They held a fund-raiser for White House candidate John Edwards of North Carolina earlier this month, raising more than $100,000.

In one of the more unusual uses of campaign money, Silicon Valley Democrats Michael and Frances Kieschnick helped fund a successful campaign in 2006 to elect Democrats as secretaries of state who will oversee balloting in five swing states -- a reaction to perceived bias by Republican officials in Florida and Ohio in the 2000 and 2004 presidential vote counting.

Los Angeles-area developer Rick Caruso has a goal of raising $1 million for Massachusetts Gov. Romney's bid for the Republican nomination.

"I'm on a big Republican list," said Caruso, who has given $315,000 since 2003 to federal campaigns. "Politicians ... never lose your number."

Californians had a significant role in the 2006 fight for control of Congress, donating $6.6 million directly to candidates in the six U.S. Senate races that tipped control to Democrats, campaign records show.

In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester ousted Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by 3,600 votes, aided in part by Richard and Marilyn Mazess of Montecito. They gave $50,000 to the independent group Campaign Money Watch, which aired a commercial ridiculing Burns for his ties to "big oil."

Hollywood moguls Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg and other Californians donated $500,000 directly to Tester. Burns collected $460,000 from such Californians as Los Angeles venture capitalist Elliott Broidy and Edward Atsinger III, of Camarillo, chief executive of Christian radio network Salem Broadcasting.

"The money -- the California and New York money -- was very important to Tester," said political scientist Craig Wilson of Montana State University, Billings.

In addition to familiar California sources of political money -- defense, energy and aerospace companies, developers, unions, Hollywood and Silicon Valley -- the top donors include numerous lawyers, heirs and heiresses, and little-known financial, agricultural and other players scattered around the state.

(Among the big-name donors who don't make the latest list: Hollywood mogul David Geffen and investor Ronald Burkle.)

California is widely seen as a bastion of Democrats. But its greenbacks often are shaded Republican red.

One such Republican is Robin Arkley, who owns a finance and real estate firm in the far Northern California town of Eureka.

In 2004, Arkley had a hand in upending the Democratic power structure nationally when he spent $515,000 on independent campaign ads attacking then-Democratic Senate minority leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota. Daschle was ousted by Republican John Thune, who raised $1.29 million from California, more than any other state, including South Dakota, according to Political Moneyline.

One of the Taylors' sons, Christian, plays football for UCLA. He donated $45,000, much of it to such Republicans as Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

DOJ_NMG_0137274

There was one savvy exception to the Taylors' Republican ways. They gave $20,000 to the Green Party of Lucerne County, Pa., including $9,000 from Christian. The goal: to help a Green Party candidate steal votes from Bob Casey, the Democrat challenging Santorum.

The strategy failed; Casey unseated Santorum. The Taylors did not return calls.

In addition to raising millions directly for President Bush, the state's Republicans have funded Progress for America, a group based in Washington that has countered the liberal MoveOn.org. In 2005, it aired television ads urging senators to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court. It also has run ads supporting the war in Iraq.

A. Jerrold Perenchio, chairman of Univision, the Spanish language television network, has given the group $9 million since 2003. Stockton, Calif., developer A.G. Spanos gave another $5 million, as did Los Angeles billionaire Roland Arnall and his wife, Dawn. Caruso chipped in $100,000 to help Roberts, now chief justice.

Bush has bestowed ambassadorships on five Californians, including Los Angeles car dealer Robert Holmes Tuttle, United Kingdom; Orange County investor George Argyros, formerly to Spain; Los Angeles venture capitalist Ronald Spogli, Italy; and investor Frank Baxter, Uruguay. Combined, they have given $1.6 million to the GOP since 2000, including donations to Bush's inaugurals.

The fifth, Arnall, is the biggest donor-ambassador. He represents U.S. interests in the Netherlands. Since 2004, Arnall and his wife, Dawn, have given $5.5 million primarily to Republican candidates and organizations, and another $1 million to Bush's 2005 inaugural. Arnall owns home mortgage lender Ameriquest Capital Corp. At $14.1 million, Los Angeles movie producer Stephen L. Bing was the state's largest single donor to federal campaigns during the past four years, most of it to Democrats. Bing, who declines interviews, spent another $49 million on a failed California initiative in 2006 to boost alternative energy. He likely will support Clinton's candidacy.

Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., has taken $7.7 million from here for her U.S. Senate campaigns, second only to the $26.5 million she has raised in her home base. After Illinois, California has been the second largest source of money for Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., Federal Election Commission records show.

Sacramento Democrat Eleni Tsakopoulos-Kounalakis and her father, Angelo Tsakopoulos, have helped organize events for many Democrats, but are "Hillary people all the way."

"We want to see the White House restored to competent hands," she said.

She explained her family's political involvement by telling her father's story. He came here at age 15 from Greece with nothing, made a fortune as a developer and hosted a president, Bill Clinton, at his home. Tsakopoulos never could have attained such success in the old country. These days, Democratic politician all come courting.

"Everybody calls and we love it," she said. "What an incredible honor and privilege."

Times researcher Janet Lundblad contributed to this report.

Liberal Lobbying Groups Target 'Power Corridor' (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

Liberal lobbying groups are trying to flex their newfound muscle on K Street after a dozen years in exile, promising to avoid the same tactical mistakes that led to the downfall of, and jail sentences for, some Republicans last year.

"Washington has been congested with conservatives abusing their power for far too long," said Toby Chaudhuri of the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a progressive lobbying organization.

"We're cleaning out the stables on Washington's K Street power corridor, opening the back rooms to the public light," he said. "We have an opportunity to challenge the grip the right has had on our imaginations and our policies over the past quarter-century."

Part of that effort includes lining up prime real estate along the K Street corridor of Northwest Washington, which has been the traditional home of lobbyists in the nation's capital. The group yesterday announced it is moving to K Street while simultaneously doubling its office space. It has traditionally relied on grass-roots support for its campaigns.

Mr. Chaudhuri said CAF has signed a 10-year lease for the new office space, which will be shared with fellow liberal activist organizations including the Progressive Majority, the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, Americans United and USAction.

"Maybe they are moving over to K Street so they can get their contributions more directly from the AFL-CIO headquarters," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a conservative organization with close ties to K Street. "They are a front group for organized labor. These are the anti-reformers."

Despite their deep ideological differences, CAF and other liberal organizations are trying to emulate some of the tactics used by Mr. Norquist in helping the conservative movement rise to power. For instance, Mr. Norquist hosts the "Wednesday meetings," a weekly gathering of conservative activists, strategists and Republican congressional staffers.

The CAF now hosts its own biweekly patchwork of ideological allies that they call the "Tuesday Group."

"After the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994 and the White House in 2001, Norquist and a network of conservatives tightened their hold on power by dominating lobbying firms on K Street and building upon patronage, contracts and one-party rule. The changeover in Congress last month has helped alter this political culture," Mr. Chaudhuri wrote in the release.

"Yes, it's flattering, except it doesn't work for them," Mr. Norquist said of the comparison. "What unites our various causes is the desire to be left alone by the government. They can't sit around the campfire, because the only thing that unites their coalition is the desire for more government funding."

Nonetheless, CAF helped to organize and fund a successful advertising campaign last year against several Republican lawmakers, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and former Ohio Rep. Bob Ney.

After stepping down from his leadership position, Mr. DeLay decided against seeking re-election and now runs a Web site that focuses on issues of importance to the conservative base. Mr. Ney also decided against running for re-election after pleading guilty to charges of conspiracy and making false statements stemming from his connections to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Last year in January, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts for his role in defrauding American Indian tribes and charges of corruption of public officials.

CAF says it hopes to use its new location to focus on energy independence and to "create a national conversation about providing health care coverage for everyone in America."

Court Upholds Calif. Stem Cell Agency (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Three years after California passed a $3 billion stem cell initiative, a state appeals court has upheld the creation of the agency that will distribute the money, rebuffing legal challenges from abortion opponents and anti-tax activists.

The 1st District Court of Appeal Monday upheld a decision by a lower court judge who had ruled in favor of the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine (CIRM) last year.

The agency was created when 59% of voters passed Proposition 71 in 2004. In addition to creating the institute, the proposition authorized it to sell $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research over 10 years.

"Once again, the judiciary has upheld the constitutionality of California's innovative stem cell research project — in its entirety, without equivocation, and with absolutely no room for further argument," said Robert Klein, chair of the CIRM's Independent Citizens Oversight Committee. "We are grateful that the court rendered this decision so quickly, as it speeds the day when the will of 7 million voters can be fully realized."

The institute has not been able to borrow money pending the resolution of the lawsuit. But it has already received loans of $195 million from the state and philanthropic organizations.

Ten days ago the institute approved 72 grants totaling for $45 million for embryonic stem cell research at 20 institutions. "Another $80 million is teed up for mid-March," said spokesman Dale Carlson. Those grants made CIRM the largest U.S. backer of human embryonic stem cell research.

Robert Tyler, an attorney for Advocates of Faith and Freedom who helped the plaintiffs craft the lawsuit, told the Associated Press he expects the case to be appealed to the California Supreme Court. The plaintiffs are the California Family Bioethics Council and the People's Advocate and National Tax Limitation Foundation.

Among the arguments rejected by the court was the plaintiff's contention that officials from three university systems who sit on the oversight committee could benefit because their schools are applying for millions in research funds. The proposition dictates that those officials must withdraw when the board is considering an application from their schools.

The court also rejected arguments that the agency isn't under the exclusive control of the state. The plaintiffs argued that because University of California officials on the agency's oversight board aren't public officials, they have no authority to spend state money.

The plaintiffs have 40 days to file their petition, said Carlson. "(The) Supreme Court has 60 — 90 days to decide whether or not to take the case. If they don't, we can begin issuing bonds. If they do, case is probably resolved by year end."

Human embryonic stem cells are harvested from 3 to 5 day old embryos and are capable of becoming all tissues in the body. Researchers hope that one day they can be used to treat diseases ranging from Parkinson's to Alzheimer's to cancer.

But current techniques require the destruction of the embryo to harvest the cells, which is opposed by those who feel the destruction of the early embryo is the destruction of a human life.

In 2001, President Bush issued a decision limiting all federal funding of stem cell research to those projects using cell colonies, or lines, created prior to his August speech. California's Prop. 71 was in part a reaction to that decision.

School Lawsuit Gets Green Light (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, February 27, 2007

A lawsuit brought by one of eight former radiography students who sued career school Sanford Brown College in North Kansas City for fraud has been allowed to proceed.

Senior U.S. District Judge Scott Wright last week denied the college's motion for summary judgment, finding that there were disputed facts that needed to be resolved by a jury.

Although Wright's ruling technically applied to just one of the eight cases, he noted that all of the plaintiffs had made similar allegations, suggesting he will hand down identical rulings in the other cases.

Sanford Brown is a subsidiary of publicly traded Career Education Corp., which operates career colleges. The company posted $1.79 billion in revenues last year.

The lawsuits, which were filed in early 2005, charge that college admissions representatives lied to the plaintiffs about the cost of tuition, the availability of grants and loans, the jobs and starting salaries they could expect to get upon graduating, and the experience and preparedness of the school's instructors.

The lawsuit in which Wright ruled last week was brought by Darla Roberts, who alleged that the admissions representatives had sales quotas and were paid on the basis of how many leads they converted to interviews and enrollments.

One college admission representative, Maddy Koehler, stated in her deposition testimony, "It's like any sales job, either you can sell it or you can't."

After getting her associate degree in December 2003, Roberts says she obtained a job at KU Hospital but had to be retrained because her supervisor said she did not know what she was doing.

Roberts and the other former students are represented by North Kansas City attorney Gene Graham of White Allinder Graham & Buckley, who declined to comment.

Kathryn G. Lee of Husch & Eppenberger, Sanford Brown's attorney, said that Roberts' claims concerned conduct that occurred before Career Education owned Sanford Brown.

Sanford Brown "believes that the allegations made by Ms. Roberts and the other plaintiffs are meritless, and it will continue to vigorously defend the case at trial."

The lawsuits are among a host of legal headaches for Career Education Corp. Last May, the company disclosed that it was being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice after a false-claims lawsuit charged that some of its colleges had obtained federal funds to which they were not entitled. The company said it was cooperating with the investigation.

In mid-2005, the U.S. Department of Education imposed a moratorium on new company campuses, saying it was concerned by CEC's "history of noncompliance" with federal laws governing financial aid.

The moratorium was imposed just months after CBS' "60 Minutes" ran a scathing piece on the company's Brooks College in Long Beach, Calif., which offers courses in fashion merchandising. Former students said that college officials lied to them about tuition costs, the quality of instruction, and the kind of jobs they could expect to get after graduation.

States Consider Tobacco Tax Hikes (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

More than a dozen states are considering higher tobacco taxes this year, most often to help millions of uninsured people get health coverage.

Four of the most closely watched proposals call for tax hikes of $1 per pack or more, an increase attained by only four states in the past. Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle wants a $1.25 increase. Iowa, Maine and Maryland are considering $1.

The number of tax hike efforts isn't unusual: 21 states boosted tobacco taxes in 2002 and 17 in 2003 to combat the recession. Many of the new proposals are noteworthy for their size and link to helping some of the nation's nearly 47 million uninsured people.

"The amounts you're seeing are larger than we've seen in recent years," says Harley Duncan of the Federation of Tax Administrators. Expanding health insurance, he says, is an "expensive proposition."

Forty-two states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico have increased taxes since 2002 — 10 of them more than once, says the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids. Since 2000, tobacco sales in the USA have declined 15%, falling more steeply (27%) in the 19 states and the District of Columbia that tax cigarettes at $1 per pack or more, industry data show.

Taxes are rising in six states this year, pushing the average price of a pack of brand-name cigarettes to $4.26, up from $1.95 a decade ago, according to the economic consulting firm Orzechowski and Walker.

State tobacco taxes range from 7 cents a pack in South Carolina to $2.58 in New Jersey. They raised $14 billion in 2006, up from $7.3 billion a decade earlier. The 39-cent federal tax, last increased in 2002, raised $7.5 billion last year.

Industry officials say taxing tobacco to fund statewide initiatives is discriminatory. "It's asking one small minority group to fund a program to benefit the entire state," says Steve Kottak of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco. "Our view is, the smokers have paid enough."

Many states link tobacco taxes to helping people who don't have health insurance:

•In Oregon, where Gov. Ted Kulongoski has made this a top priority, Democrats must win five Republican votes in the House next month. The goal is to cover most of the state's 117,000 uninsured kids.

•Maryland House leaders want to double the state's $1 tobacco tax and help nearly one-third of the state's 780,000 uninsured.

Iowa Gov. Chet Culver wants a $1 boost to close the gap between $100 million raised from the existing tax and $277 million spent on smokers' health care.

Tax proposals have been made in at least 19 states this year, although some are not likely to pass. There are, however, a dozen advanced by governors.

GOP Firm Bucks Lobbying Trend (POL)

By Jeanne Cummings

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

The rise of new Capitol Hill chairmen is turning lobbying shops across town into shades of Democratic blue and bipartisan purple, but one notable powerhouse is sticking with brilliant Republican red.

Barbour Griffith & Rogers was founded by political infighter and now Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R), and his old partners are now bucking the post-midterm trend of bringing in a Democrat.

It's a counterintuitive strategy that carries obvious risks, not the least being diminished access to the emerging power centers on Capitol Hill. But the firm's path, which plots a decidedly different course than most other GOP shops in town, also rests on a gamble: that at a time of razor-thin partisan margins in Congress and increasingly complex public policy, what you know can be as important -- and lucrative -- as who you know.

That helps explain why Barbour Griffith & Rogers was signing on a handful of policy experts last year when many Republican-controlled lobbying shops were scooping up key Democratic aides and operatives.

Among the firm's new hired guns: Stephen Rademaker, former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's national policy director; Mary Lacey Reuther, a health care expert from the Bush administration; and Celeste Ward, a military operations and Iraq expert who worked at the Pentagon.

Sure, they are all Republicans, making them easy fits inside the firm. But the firm's chairman, Ed Rogers, is banking on their depth of knowledge to attract corporations and other interest groups.

By year's end, Reuther, a former special assistant to Bush's one-time Medicaid and Medicare director Mark McClellan, was already toiling away on the interests of drug makers Eli Lilly & Co. and Bristol-Myers Squibb -- whose combined payments to the firm amount to $160,000 for six months work, disclosure reports show.

The firm saw a similar dynamic when it hired former U.S. Ambassador to India Robert D. Blackwill to head its international operations. Corporations interested in breaking into the fast-growing Indian economy flocked to the firm to get Blackwill's help in navigating the nation's complex regulatory system.

Loren Monroe, the firm's chief operating officer, said the firm isn't ruling out the notion of hiring a Democrat someday. But "we can't change our business plan in anticipation of an election." Their clients "know we're Republicans and we're not going to try to fake it."

The more business-oriented shift toward lobbying began some time ago. No longer can you "take Jamie Whitten (the former Appropriations Committee cardinal from Mississippi) to the Palm Restaurant and get your deal done" as you could in the late 1970s, says Rogers.

But the post-Abramoff era and the fear of future lobbying scandals have accelerated the pivot. Many lobbying experts say they must tinker with their tactics by relying more heavily on "white papers" and policy justifications rather than their own personal relationships with lawmakers to make a case for their clients. The changed leadership on Capitol Hill -- with Democrats' vow to curb K Street's influence -- has made tactical changes all the more vital.

Barbour Griffith & Rogers' unorthodox strategy looks beyond simple partisan balance to give itself maximum flexibility in creating coalitions to support client needs.

"Depending on the issue, you may need a Democrat, a lawyer, a public relations expert or a media handler. It's best to go out and find the person with the best skills to handle troubles rather than associating with any one Democrat," Rogers explains.

It's a corporate plan based in part by watching and working with Democratic lobbying firms that managed to survive the last six years of Republican dominance. Among them is Ricchetti Inc., whose namesake is Steve Ricchetti, a former Clinton White House deputy chief of staff.

Ricchetti says his firm succeeded by offering clients an array of services, from issue expertise to public relations advice to grass-roots organizing. Corporate clients with big Republican contracts also threw work his way, recognizing the value added in having bipartisan support for their legislative wish list. That balance not only can pad the vote in their favor but also insulate them from becoming poster children for pork in the political season.

Of course, when all the knowledge and strategizing isn't enough, a firm aligned with a filibuster-strong minority can work to deploy their most potent weapon: Kill the legislation.

Ricchetti was part of a coalition that blocked passage of Bush's much-coveted repeal of the estate tax. "We sometimes were hired to make sure things didn't happen," he says.

So, in addition to recruiting policy experts, Barbour Griffith & Rogers, with its deep ties to Senate Republicans and the White House, is now poised to become the Republican go-to shop for executing the "block and tackle" play on Capitol Hill, says Monroe.

Adds Rogers: "What's the story that's happened for the last three years? Things pass the House and get bogged down in the Senate. I predict for the next two years, things will pass the House and get bogged down in the Senate, again."

Remaining all-Republican has other advantages: It makes the personal and political relationships a lot simpler.

The firm's client list doesn't set off internal squabbles because of the philosophical goals of the clients they attract. But a token Democratic hire or two might squirm at working for a firm that's paid $360,000 every six months to protect the oil interests of Iraq's Kurdish population at a time when their congressional allies argue that Iraq should solve its own internal divisions. Or one that banks another $100,000 semiannual payment to track any congressional efforts to regulate tobacco for Lorillard Tobacco Co., maker of Newports and Kents.

The strategy also squarely aligns the firm with the us-against-them Senate Republicans. When those politicians are feted at fundraisers at the firm's well-appointed Pennsylvania Avenue offices, they can rest assured that a Democrat won't be nibbling on a fresh order of the same hors d'oeuvres the next week. "We don't try to be cute about it or split the baby," says Rogers.

Indeed, the firm is hosting a fundraiser for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky this week; Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada shouldn't wait for his embossed invitation.

Welcome to Pit Boss, a weekly take on money and lobbying in Washington. My plan is to get into the weeds every Tuesday and explain how lobbying shops work, who the players are and how that world intersect with political fundraising and spending. I'll be on the hunt for background brawls, winners and losers, and bundlers extraordinaire. I welcome any comments, advice and, of course, tips for tracking the town's most lucrative industry and its renowned political generosity.

Halliburton Moves To Cast Off Rest Of KBR, Become Pure Play (WSJ)

By Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Halliburton Co. took a decisive step to separate itself from its KBR Inc. unit, which generates a fraction of the company's profit but the lion's shares of headlines and headaches.

Halliburton said it would dispose of its 81% stake in the construction, engineering and government contracting firm by offering Halliburton shareholders the opportunity to trade their Halliburton shares for KBR shares at an unspecified ratio. If the offer isn't fully subscribed, the remaining KBR shares will be distributed through a special dividend to Halliburton owners.

In November, Halliburton sold a 19% stake in KBR through an initial public offering. The company has said for some time that it wanted to separate the KBR unit to raise the market value of its core oil-field-service business.

Halliburton, Houston, is the second-largest provider of specialized oil-field services by market capitalization behind Schlumberger Ltd. Its KBR unit designs and builds energy facilities, especially in remote and inhospitable regions.

KBR is best known for its logistical support contract for the U.S. military. Awarded in 2002, the logistics contract was expected to be fairly small, but it quickly ballooned as the war in Iraq escalated. Halliburton earned billions of dollars in revenue, but fairly thin profit margins. The company became a lightning rod for criticism, in part because Vice President Dick Cheney was Halliburton's chief executive from 1995 to 2000. KBR also drew allegations that it had overcharged the military.

Halliburton first discussed plans to separate KBR in 2004. Wall Street cheered the move as turning Halliburton into a pure-play energy-services company.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, KBR shares were at $24.12, up 7%, in anticipation of the decision. The stock is up 16% since its close on the first day of trading in November.

Halliburton To Complete Split With KBR (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Halliburton, the oil field services provider, said yesterday that it would complete its separation from KBR Inc. by offering current stockholders the remaining 81 percent stake in KBR, its former subsidiary.

Halliburton, once led by Vice President Dick Cheney, will offer its 135.6 million shares of KBR in exchange for its own stock. KBR is the largest American military contractor in Iraq.

If the offer is not fully subscribed, any remaining KBR shares will be given to stockholders as a special dividend on a pro rata basis, Halliburton, which is based in Houston, said.

Halliburton's chief executive, David J. Lesar, first raised the possibility of separating from KBR in 2004. He told investors in January that the company was considering a share swap — called a split-off — rather than the originally conceived spinoff.

Philanthropy Hits Record As Number Of $100 Million Donations Increase (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, February 27, 2007

As the rich get richer, they get more generous. Much more generous.

The number of individual donations of $100 million or more hit a record in 2006, according to The Chronicle of Philanthropy, which compiles a yearly list of the biggest givers. Last year, there were 21 donations of $100 million or more by individuals to universities, hospitals and charities, compared with 11 in 2005.

The biggest gift by far was Warren Buffett's pledge to donate stock in his investment firm Berkshire Hathaway, now worth $43.5 billion, to several groups, including the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Even without this huge donation, the philanthropy of the country's 60 most generous givers hit a record $7 billion in 2006, up from $4.3 billion the year before.

The reason for the increase in mega-gifts is simple: There are more people with deep pockets.

"It's a sign that wealth is growing and people are just raising their sights in terms of philanthropy," says Stacy Palmer, editor of The Chronicle.

Universities and other fundraising institutions ask for more and larger contributions, too. Stanford University, for example, is in the midst of a $4 billion campaign, the largest ever for a university.

Among those swimming in the deep end of the donor pool: Nike co-founder Phil Knight, who gave $105 million to Stanford's business school; David Rockefeller, who gave away $225 million, mostly to the Rockefeller family foundation; oilman T. Boone Pickens, who gave away $172 million, including $160 million to set up his own foundation; and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who gave $165 million to 1,000 groups but would name only five, which combat smoking.

In addition to the amount of money available to be given away, philanthropy experts and the givers themselves say there is a greater consciousness that those who have should give.

"It's sort of gotten out there that it's the right thing to do to be generous," says Stanley Katz, Princeton University professor of public policy and a scholar of philanthropy. "For the moment, that's more of the ethos of wealthy people."

A gift the size of Buffett's does have an influence, one of the top givers says.

"When people see substantial gifts, and they're in the same league, if they haven't given to that level, they start to think about giving," Pickens says.

Backing Abortion Rights While Keeping The Faith (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Frances Kissling has been called the “philosopher of the pro-choice movement” by her friends and an “abortion queen” by her critics.

But the name Ms. Kissling wears most defiantly, to the consternation of many religious believers, is Roman Catholic. For 25 years, as president of Catholics for a Free Choice, she has angered the church hierarchy and conservative Catholics by criticizing fundamental teachings on sex.

“I’m so Catholic, I can’t get away from it,” said Ms. Kissling, who was once in a convent. “How I construct concepts of life, of justice, it all comes out of being Catholic.”

Though unknown to most lay Catholics, she has inspired and worked with politicians and activists, many Catholic, to speak out in favor of giving women access to abortions and to artificial contraception.

On Wednesday, Ms. Kissling, 63, will step down from her post, relinquishing her role as one of the most vocal of the so-called bad Catholics, those who manage to accommodate the opposing sentiments of love for the church and anger at much of its doctrine.

“The constant refrain in this office is, ‘Are we really Catholic?’ ” Ms. Kissling said here in a recent interview. “I know with every ounce of my being that you don’t have to agree with the positions of the church on issues of abortion and contraception to be Catholic.”

Many Catholics passionately disagree. The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops has issued statements challenging the right of Catholics for a Free Choice to call itself Catholic. Critics dismiss Ms. Kissling's organization as a mouthpiece for bigger, secular abortion rights groups and a front for anti-Catholic bigotry.

"They could get special attention and get special digs at the church because of their name," said Helen M. Alvaré, an associate professor of law at the Catholic University of America and a former planning director of the Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities at the Catholic Bishops conference. "They had no grass-roots base among Catholics. There was nothing very different about them from other pro-choice groups in the arguments they made."

Catholics for a Free Choice says it gives voice to the large percentage of Roman Catholics who disagree with the church's position on reproductive issues. Its $3 million budget is largely financed by well-known secular foundations, including the Ford Foundation.

Ms. Kissling agrees with her detractors that her organization has not affected church doctrine. Instead, it has focused on working with lay Catholics and others to build momentum for its causes.

With other groups, it successfully lobbied against the naming of John Klink, a former representative of the Holy See at the United Nations, to lead the State Department Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration in 2001. Most recently, it worked with staff members for Representatives Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut, and Tim Ryan, Democrat of Ohio, to draft legislation intended to decrease abortions, partly by increasing financing for family planning.

Sitting in her Washington office, Ms. Kissling was unequivocal in her distaste for the church hierarchy. "I think that in many ways, the church has become an unjust institution," she said. On one wall of her office was a cherub, on another a Che Guevara calendar. In a corner stood a candle that looked like a bishop's miter, yet to be lit.

Ms. Kissling continued: "It abuses nuns, anyone who thinks, homosexuals, women who have abortions. It sexually abuses children. It treats people badly, and something has to be done to change its abusive nature."

Ms. Kissling was born Frances Romanski into a working-class Polish family in New York, the oldest of four children. When she was a child, her mother divorced and later married a man named Kissling, which in the eyes of the church made her an adulteress, Ms. Kissling said.

Despite her frustration with such beliefs, Ms. Kissling said, she was inspired by the nuns at her Catholic school. In the early 1960s, she joined a convent, at age 19.

Convent life demanded that she look deep inside herself, she said, and she discovered that she did not agree with the church's teachings on divorce and birth control. She left after six months to attend the New School.

Avowedly heterosexual, she said she never had a desire to marry or have children. She became active in the women's movement in the 1960s. Then in 1970, when abortion was legalized in New York, she was asked to direct an abortion clinic in Pelham. She had no experience, she said, but neither did anyone else, so she took the position.

In 1978, she joined the board of Catholics for a Free Choice, and in 1982, she took over as president.

Critics and supporters say Ms. Kissling has a more nuanced view of abortion than many in the abortion rights movement. She said her experience working at an abortion clinic and her upbringing in the church made her believe "there was a certain void in the pro-choice movement around the questions of morality and ethics."

In late 2004, she published an article in her group's magazine, Conscience, titled "How to Think About the Fetus." She said that while the fetus might not be a person, it was part of the continuum of humanity. She wrote that the fetus "is not nothing," and that women who consider abortion know that.

Ms. Kissling said that abortion rights leaders feared acknowledging the value of a fetus because they did not want to further stigmatize abortion. But, she contends, that reticence has cast the abortion rights movement as casual about the emotional realities of abortion.

"Women know that something is inside them, and they know that something will become a baby if they don't act in some way," she said. "I don't think we could say anything to them about the value of fetal life that they haven't thought of already."

Many abortion rights leaders said the article was damaging, especially because it came out while politicians were considering bans on so-called partial-birth abortions. But others, including some in the anti-abortion camp, commended Ms. Kissling.

"With her approach, she has found the real-life stuff," said Representative Ryan, a Catholic who opposes abortion. "Those of us in the debate get hooked on philosophy and theory and dogma, and what Frances brings is reality: that abortion is a difficult decision for a woman."

Ms. Kissling said she had decided to step down because she believed that her efficacy might soon wane, that she was on the "verge of becoming boring or predictable." Jon O'Brien, 41, executive vice president of Catholics for a Free Choice, is to take over as president.

Ms. Kissling hopes to write a book about the value of the fetus, or teach, or finish the house she is building on the coast of Uruguay, she said. She has no plans to leave the Catholic Church.

"There are days when I think I can't be a Catholic and that I want to go join a community where I am welcomed, honored, where I can join a parish," she said. "But in the end, I don't want to be a Methodist. I'm a member of the greatest religion in the world."

Senior Slump (WP)

THE TROUBLING condition of America's public high schools has long been recognized. Even so, it was sobering to learn last week that high school seniors, though taking more advanced classes and getting better grades, are performing dismally on national tests.

The data from the U.S. Education Department revealed a disturbing incongruity between how well schools say students are doing and how well students really are doing. Transcripts show more students taking supposedly more rigorous courses, yet raising their grade-point average from 2.68 in 1990 to 2.98 in 2005. But when these same students had to demonstrate what they learned on nationally recognized tests, only 35 percent scored proficient or better in reading. That's the worst performance since the testing began in 1992.

Why? Advanced classes may have highfalutin course descriptions, but the curriculum has been dumbed down. Pressure to pass students has caused grade inflation. The students hurt most are poor and minority. The Post's Amit R. Paley vividly demonstrated this by visiting two classes supposedly teaching the same material. Students at a more affluent high school faced higher expectations and standards than those at a school with more poor and black students. But even students who typically are seen as doing well in school -- suburban, middle-class children -- showed no gains. And the data don't deal at all with the many children who drop out before 12th grade.

Some states are moving to overhaul high schools and stiffen standards. Twenty-nine states, including Maryland and Virginia, are working with Achieve, a nonprofit group, to raise academic standards and accountability so students graduating from high school are able to meet the demands of college or work. So far, the No Child Left Behind Act has focused mainly on the elementary grades. The national debate over the law's reauthorization must include a robust discussion of how to improve high schools and create national standards. If not, any progress made in boosting achievement in elementary grades will be lost.

A Bad Report Card (NYT)

The news from American high schools is not good. The most recent test results from the National Assessment of Educational Progress, commonly known as the national report card, finds that American 12th graders are actually performing worse in reading than 12th graders did in 1992, when a comparable exam was given. In addition, 12th-grade performance in reading has been distressingly flat since 2002, even though the states were supposed to be improving the quality of teaching to comply with the No Child Left Behind education act.

The new scores, based on tests given in 2005, show that only about 35 percent of 12th graders are proficient in reading. Simply put, this means that a majority of the country's 12th graders have trouble understanding what they read fully enough to make inferences, draw conclusions and see connections between what they read and their own experiences. The math scores were even worse, with only 23 percent of 12th graders performing at or above the proficient level.

Marginal literacy and minimal math skills might have been adequate for the industrial age. But these scores mean that many of today's high school seniors will be locked out of the information economy, where a college degree is the basic price of admission and the ability to read, write and reason is essential for success.

Congress, which is preparing to reauthorize both the No Child Left Behind Act and the Higher Education Act, needs to take a hard look at these scores and move forcefully to demand far-reaching structural changes.

It should start by getting the board that oversees the National Assessment of Educational Progress testing to create rigorous national standards for crucial subjects. It should also require the states to raise the bar for teacher qualifications and end the odious practice of supplying the neediest students with the least qualified teachers. This process would also include requiring teachers colleges, which get federal aid, to turn out higher quality graduates and to supply many more teachers in vital areas like math and science. If there's any doubt about why these reforms are needed, all Congress has to do is read the latest national report card.

U.S. Displays Bomb Parts Said To Be Made In Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — In a dusty field near the Baghdad airport on Monday, the American military laid out a display of hundreds of components for assembling deadly roadside bombs, its latest effort to embarrass the country it contends is supplying the material to armed Shiite groups here: Iran.

Officers of the First Cavalry Division whose unit seized the components said they had been found in a palm grove just north of the Iraqi capital two days earlier, after a tip from a local resident. An explosives expert said the components were made to be assembled into the deadly canisters called explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s, which explode and hurl out a high-speed blob of copper designed to cut through tough American armor.

"I've lost good friends to these E.F.P.'s," said Capt. Clayton Combs, whose unit turned up the cache of weapons. "And the fact that we found these before they got to the side of the road is just a huge win for us."

The cache included what Maj. Marty Weber, a master explosives ordnance technician, said was C-4 explosive, a white substance, in clear plastic bags with red labels that he said contained serial numbers and other information that clearly marked it as Iranian.

But while the find gave experts much more information on the makings of the E.F.P.'s, which the American military has repeatedly argued must originate in Iran, the cache also included items that appeared to cloud the issue.

Among the confusing elements were cardboard boxes of the gray plastic PVC tubes used to make the canisters. The boxes appeared to contain shipments of tubes directly from factories in the Middle East, none of them in Iran. One box said in English that the tubes inside had been made in the United Arab Emirates and another said, in Arabic, "plastic made in Haditha," a restive Sunni town on the Euphrates River in Iraq.

The box marked U.A.E. provided a phone number for the manufacturer there. A call to that number late Monday encountered only an answering machine that said, "Leave your number and we will call you back."

Anthony H. Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh A. Burke chair in strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that despite those confusing new elements, the United States has been cautious in how it has presented the possible evidence of Iranian involvement.

"The case that has been made has been very careful and very restrained," Mr. Cordesman said. "If this is unrealistic, it can't be blamed on the intelligence community. This has had the highest possible policy level review, and credibility on an international level is clearly the major criteria in reviewing everything that was said."

Other analysts have expressed skepticism that the American military has made a strong case for the Iranian origin of the E.F.P.'s as tensions are running high between the United States and Iran over its nuclear program.

Items in the cache included the concave copper dishes called liners that cap the canisters and roll into deadly armor-piercing slugs when the explosive detonates. There were also various kinds of electronics, presumably for arming and triggering the devices, the PVC tubes, and two types of rockets and mortar shells that Major Weber said had markings and construction that identified them as being Iranian in origin.

The PVC tubes, of several different sizes, appeared to be fittings of the kind of used to splice two stretches of PVC tube together in routine applications.

"It's worth pursuing that it's machine-made and you can track the country of origin," said Maj. Jeremy Siegrist of the First Cavalry Division. "And it's manufactured for a specific purpose."

That raised the possibility that the parts were purchased on the open market and that the liners were then manufactured to the right size to cap the fittings.

Captain Combs said the cache was hidden in buried freezers and an 80-gallon water container. "What they couldn't bury, like the 122-millimeter rockets you see in front of you, was covered in tarps," he said.

U.S. Find Stokes Fears Of Iraqis' Bomb-Making Ability (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- An American military raid in southern Iraq uncovered a makeshift factory used to construct advanced roadside bombs that the U.S. had thought were made only in Iran. The find raises fears that Shiite Muslim insurgents across Iraq may be able to manufacture large quantities of such weapons on their own.

The Saturday raid in the small town of Jedidah marked the first time U.S. forces found evidence that militants inside Iraq are assembling "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, which can punch through the armored shells of U.S. military vehicles. U.S. officials said they found components for building about 150 of the devices, one of the largest caches of such weapons found to date in Iraq.

This find -- separate from one made in the southern city of Hilla a week ago -- is forcing U.S. officials to reassess their belief that such bombs were being built in Iran and smuggled fully assembled into Iraq. U.S. commanders briefing reporters here said Iraqi militants appear able to construct the bombs out of materials purchased locally or shipped into the country from Iran.

"We originally thought these came into Iraq already created, and now that intelligence has been totally relooked," said Capt. Clayton Combs, who led the raid. "It's like a playground kit you get in the mail: You can plot the instructions and start putting it together on-site, and that's what we have here."

U.S. commanders said the discovery raises concerns that the weapons could go into wider use, if militants no longer depend on receiving fully assembled devices from Iran or other sources. U.S. officials say the bombs, used mostly by Shiite militants, are more lethal than conventional roadside bombs used by Sunni insurgents.

U.S. military commanders said many of the weapons seized in the Saturday raid -- including mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades and large quantities of plastic explosive -- had markings indicating they had been manufactured in Iran. That could be used by the Bush administration to bolster its allegation that Iran is funneling weapons to Shiites in Iraq.

The U.S. commanders said they hadn't found evidence linking the weapons to Iran's government, army or paramilitary forces -- a connection the U.S. has yet to firmly establish despite its accusations. Tehran has denied the White House allegations and has accused Washington of fabricating evidence to justify a possible military strike on Iran.

The raid followed a call to a U.S.-run hotline from an Iraqi reporting that weapons were stored in a palm grove in Jedidah, a town near the Shiite city of Baqubah. U.S. forces searching the site found two freezers and a large water container that had been buried up to their lids and covered with palm fronds. Inside were dozens of rocket-propelled-grenade warheads, rocket launchers, mortar rounds and other weapons, U.S. commanders said.

The most important find was a mound of 150 concave copper caps, the main ingredient in EFPs, they said. When EFPs detonate, the caps turn into molten balls that can pierce the armored shells of Humvees or other vehicles, killing or maiming the soldiers inside.

Capt. Combs said the copper caps were smooth and perfectly symmetrical, suggesting they had been made with a high degree of technical precision. He said he didn't know where the caps came from or whether they had been made in Iran. "That's the hard thing about this war," he said.

Army Officers Say Iran Made Bomb Components (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD -- In the latest attempt to link the deadliest form of roadside bombs in Iraq to components manufactured in Iran, U.S. Army officers today displayed plastic explosives they said were made in Iran and recovered during a raid Saturday in violence-racked Diyala province.

An Army explosives expert said the C-4 plastic explosives were used to make lethal bombs that the military calls EFPs -- explosively formed projectiles. The explosives were found alongside enough bomb-making materials to build 150 EFPs capable of penetrating heavily armored vehicles, according to the expert, Maj. Martin Weber.

Mortars and rockets found in the same cache also were manufactured in Iran, Weber said. The cache included 150 machine-milled copper plates that form a shaped, concave lid on the projectile. When the weapons explode, those lids form balls of molten metal that can punch through the armor on vehicles.

The cache was believed to be the first EFP manufacturing site found inside Iraq, officers said. They had previously assumed that most EFPs were assembled outside the country and brought in nearly whole.

Officers said they did not know where the copper plates were manufactured, or by whom. They also said they could not prove who supplied the materials or who was building the EFPs.

The briefing was the third in two weeks in which U.S. military officials set forth evidence that they said showed Iran's hand in Iraq's violence.

By contrast with previous sessions, officers at today's display were careful not to accuse the Iranian government of involvement. U.S. officials have had to backtrack from previous assertions of direct involvement by Iran's top government officials.

"I don't think there's any way for us to know if it's tied to any government," said Maj. Jeremy Siegrist, the executive officer for the unit that recovered the materials. "That's a stretch too far."

But by summoning reporters to the display and providing Weber as an on-site expert to assert that some items came from Iran, the military was clearly emphasizing the linkage to that country.

Weber said cutting, stamping and milling the copper plates requires technical expertise, as does arming and triggering the EFPs. He said Iran has the necessary expertise. That country provides weapons and technical support for Hezbollah, which has used similar explosive devices in southern Lebanon.

Referring to the C-4, rockets and mortars, Weber said, "you can establish the country of origin, and that is a fact."

Capt. Clayton Combs, the company commander whose 1st Cavalry unit recovered what officers called "an IED factory," using the military acronym for improvised explosive devices, or roadside bombs, said he found it "interesting" that explosives, rockets and mortars from Iran were including among EFP-making materials. Asked to elaborate, Combs replied, "I'm not willing to go beyond that."

A cache of EFP materials found by U.S. forces in Hilla, south of Baghdad, last week was probably a transit point for materials to be assembled elsewhere, Weber speculated. The Hilla cache – and many others found by U.S. troops – included C-4 explosives made in Iran, Weber said.

Mortars and rockets are commonly used in other types of IEDs. The rockets and mortars found in Diyala, a province north of Baghdad, were manufactured in 2006 and 2002, respectively, officers said, meaning they were not left over from the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s.

EFPs have killed at least 170 U.S. troops, according to U.S. officials. So far, 3,156 U.S. troops have died in the war.

The Bush administration is mounting a campaign to isolate and discredit Iran over its nuclear program and its alleged role inside Iraq. It has accused the Al Quds Brigade, a unit of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, of supporting Shiite attacks against U.S. forces in Iraq.

Siegrist said U.S. troops were tipped off about the bomb site in Diyala by a local resident. The materials were hidden inside two freezers and a water container buried in a palm grove.

The cache included plastic plumbing pipes cut to form EFP housings, along with metal rings used to secure the devices. Also found were detonation cord, blasting caps, fuses, voltage regulators and ball bearings.

DOJ_NMG_0137286

On display today was a fully formed EFP, which Combs said had been found at the site, fitted with a C-4 charge. The device is the size and shape of a large coffee can. It was fitted with what Weber said was a metal sighting device for aiming at a target. It was topped with a copper plate, or disk, the size of a bread plate.

EFPs cause more damage than other types of IEDs because of "the density and speed of two to four pounds of metal [copper] traveling at an extremely high rate of speed," Weber said.

Also recovered from the Diyala site were 15 122-mm rockets, two dozen 120-mm mortar rounds, mines, anti-aircraft ammunition and rocket-propelled grenades, Combs said.

The most significant items were the copper plates, made from 5mm copper sheets, Combs said.

"They're the hardest part to make," he said. "You need good quality copper and it has to be done just right, so this is a major find."

Diplomats To Begin Drafting New U.N. Sanctions On Iran (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — The coalition of six world powers that has been trying to get Iran to rein in its nuclear program will begin drafting a new United Nations Security Council resolution to ratchet up the pressure again, officials said Monday after a meeting in London.

Top officials from the United States, Britain, China, Russia, Germany and France agreed to begin working on the resolution after the International Atomic Energy Agency reported last week that Iran was expanding its efforts to enrich uranium, in continuing defiance of the United Nations.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States was willing to join in talks between the Europeans and Iran over the nuclear program, provided that Iran suspended its uranium enrichment activity.

Mr. McCormack added: “Should they choose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences. And those consequences will be diplomatic isolation from the rest of the world.”

Although American and British officials sounded buoyant, the United States discovered last year that there could be a long way between the start of work on a sanctions resolution against Iran and passage by the Security Council.

The first sanctions resolution against Iran took about four months to put together, after much disagreement between the United States and Russia in particular.

The resolution that finally passed, two days before Christmas, was much weaker than American officials had wanted. It banned the import and export of materials and technology used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles, and froze the assets of 12 Iranians and 10 companies said to be involved in nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

But it did not include a mandatory travel ban on people involved in nuclear activities, as the Bush administration had proposed. To achieve consensus, the Americans dropped their insistence on a travel ban after Russia balked. Moscow also balked over sanctions against a nuclear power plant that Russia is building at Bushehr, in southern Iran.

The resolution gave Iran 60 days from Dec. 23 to suspend uranium enrichment — the first step in making fuel that can be used for civilian power plants or atomic bombs — or face further sanctions.

American and European officials are hoping that this time in the Security Council, things will be different. The United States and Britain would like to see the next round of sanctions include the travel ban, as well as a further freeze on international financial transactions by top Iranian officials.

“We’ve done a lot of the political negotiation that we didn’t do last time,” said one European diplomat involved in the negotiations. He characterized the meeting on Monday in London, attended by the American under secretary of state for political affairs, R. Nicholas Burns, and his five counterparts from Europe, Russia and China, as “one of the best meetings that they’ve had yet.”

But, he added, “I’m sure it won’t be straightforward.”

A second sanctions resolution would be part of the overall increase in oratory and pressure against Iran by the Bush administration, which has also accused the Iranians of meddling in Iraq. Part of the debate on another resolution is bound to reflect concern from Russia over the possibility of American military action against Iran.

Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that “all options are still on the table” for Washington to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, a comment that has heightened fears that the administration is considering attacking Iran’s nuclear sites.

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, said Monday, during a conversation with President Vladimir V. Putin that was broadcast on state television, that Moscow was worried about that kind of talk.

Major Powers Work On Iran Resolution (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, February 27, 2007

The five permanent Security Council members and Germany began work Monday on a new U.N. resolution to pressure Iran to suspend parts of its nuclear program, but said they were still committed to seeking a diplomatic solution.

The six nations, meeting in London, said they were seeking the best way to "re-engage" Tehran after it failed to respect a U.N. deadline to halt its uranium enrichment work. However, they said no decisions were made and more talks were needed.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, briefing reporters in Washington after the meeting, said the diplomats would hold a telephone conference Thursday, "at which time they hope to be able to hammer out the elements of a U.N. sanctions resolution."

However, sharp differences appear to remain between the tough U.S. position and what Russia and China, veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are willing to accept.

The U.N.'s nuclear watchdog confirmed last week that Iran had defied a Security Council order to freeze enrichment — a possible path to nuclear arms — expanding its program instead. Iran insists its only interest in the technology is for the production of fuel for nuclear power plants.

John Sawers, the British Foreign Office official who chaired the closed one-day meeting, issued a statement calling Monday's meeting a productive first step.

"We also considered how best to re-engage with Iran. We are all committed to seeking a negotiated solution," Sawers said.

The senior officials from Britain, the United States, France, Germany, Russia, China and the EU Secretariat discussed the possibility of imposing incremental restrictions on trade and arms for Iran, officials said.

Sanctions approved in December ban all countries from supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and froze the Iranian assets of 10 key companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

Russia and China are likely to oppose strict economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition. Before the meeting Monday, a senior British diplomat said officials would examine options including whittling away at export credits made available to companies that trade with Iran.

"I expect the tortuous negotiations will continue and not result in any meaningful compromise anytime soon," said Ray Takeyh, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, a U.S. think tank. "There is a fundamental disagreement about what kind of a threat and how much of a threat Iran poses."

McCormack said U.S. officials want to engage in negotiations with Iran. "But we are equally committed to sending the message to the Iranian government: Should they chose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences," he said.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator on Monday said if the United States made a formal request for talks, Iran would respond positively but would not accept conditions placed on such discussions, the country's official news agency reported.

The Islamic Republic News Agency said Ali Larijani was responding to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments Sunday that the U.S. would hold direct talks with Iran if Tehran suspended its nuclear program.

Iran has repeatedly said it would not freeze enrichment as a precondition to holding talks on its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0137288

"Setting conditions means indicating the outcome of talks prior to holding them. Therefore, such a policy has not been answerable," IRNA quoted Larijani as saying.

Diplomats Seek Way To 'Reengage' Iran (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 -- Representatives of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany said after meeting in London on Monday that they were committed to seeking a negotiated solution with Iran, which has defied a U.N. order to halt its uranium enrichment program.

In Washington, meanwhile, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters that the six nations had "agreed on the fact that they will go forward with a U.N. sanctions resolution."

McCormack said the six nations -- the United States, Britain, France, China, Russia and Germany -- wanted Iran to negotiate. But he also said, "We are equally committed to sending the message to the Iranian government: Should they choose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences."

Last week, the International Atomic Energy Agency issued a report saying that rather than halting its uranium enrichment program, Iran had expanded it.

During a visit Saturday to Sydney, Vice President Cheney told reporters that "all options are still on the table" for dealing with Iran, raising concerns that the United States was considering a possible military strike.

The United States accuses Iran of secretly using its nuclear program in an effort to build atomic weapons. The Tehran government insists its program is solely for energy purposes and that it has no intention of stopping its uranium enrichment as demanded by the Security Council.

Officials at the talks sought to play down any rising confrontation. John Sawers, the British official chairing Monday's meeting, issued a statement saying that the group had "considered how best to reengage with Iran. We are all committed to seeking a negotiated solution."

Not all parties agree on the seriousness of the threat from Iran or how best to contain it. Of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, Russia and China have resisted tough sanctions.

In December, the Security Council banned countries from supplying Iran with technology that could be used in its nuclear and missile programs and froze the assets of certain companies and individuals. Now wider economic sanctions are being considered, along with a travel ban on some officials.

Officials from the six nations involved in the talks are to continue discussions by phone on Thursday.

UN Action On Iran 'Still Has Time To Work' (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

US and British diplomats yesterday said the west's strategy on Iran - involving a new round of measures at the United Nations - still had time to succeed, despite Tehran's failure last week to meet a UN deadline on its nuclear programme.

"The genie isn't out of the bottle yet but . . . they are working very aggressively to get it out," a US official yesterday told the Financial Times, referring to Iran's efforts to move ahead with uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons-grade material.

Last week the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, said Iran had installed or nearly installed more than 600 centrifuges at a site intended for large-scale uranium enrichment and aimed to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by May.

"They have not perfected running these things, there is still more work to do to master the technology," said the official.

The comments came as officials from the leading powers met in London to discuss whether to toughen the sanctions against Iran agreed last December.

The officials - from the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, plus Germany - will now consult their own governments on next steps.

DOJ_NMG_0137289

"We began work on a new Security Council resolution . . . we also considered how best to re-engage with Iran," said the British Foreign Office.

It added that, following their "productive first discussion", the diplomats would resume contacts with one another this week.

The European Union and the US want to persuade Russia and China to sign up to a travel ban against named individuals involved in Iran's missile and nuclear programmes - who are currently subject to lesser measures - and to extend the list of people concerned.

In addition, the US, with some UK support, would like European countries to cut back on export credits to companies doing business with Iran and to restrict arms sales.

These measures may be difficult to agree at UN or even EU level. But for both export credits and arms sales, the big powers may decide to exercise greater voluntary restraint or to back a move at the UN that would call on, but not legally require, states to limit such dealings with Tehran.

France and Germany argue that demand for export credits is already declining because the nuclear dispute makes it less to attractive for companies to trade with Tehran. The incremental nature of the measures under discussion has led some to conclude that the west's approach is unlikely to persuade Iran to change course.

But the US and the EU argue that Iran's leadership has been unsettled by Security Council censure and Washington has sought to increase pressure on Tehran by actions such as dispatching a second aircraft carrier to the Gulf.

Such military moves have been criticised by Russia, perhaps the key countryin agreeing any further international pressure on Tehran.

Sergei Lavrov, foreign minister, said yesterday he was "concerned that forecasts and predictions of strikes on Iran have become frequent".

US Presses For More Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

US and British diplomats said on Monday the world's big powers had agreed to start work on new United Nations measures against Iran after Tehran's failure last week to meet a deadline on its nuclear programme.

They added that the west's strategy of incremental pressure still had time to succeed despite difficulties in agreeing far-reaching steps.

"We began work on a new [UN] Security Council resolution . . . we also considered how best to re-engage with Iran," said the British Foreign Office, after officials met in London to discuss toughening the sanctions against Iran agreed in December. The officials – from the five permanent members of the Security Council, plus Germany – will now consult their governments.

The Foreign Office added that the diplomats would resume contact this week.

Separately, a US official told the Financial Times there was still time to resolve the dispute diplomatically.

"The genie isn't out of the bottle yet but...they are working very aggressively to get it out," he said, referring to Iran's efforts to move on with uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons-grade material.

Last week the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, said Iran had installed or nearly installed more than 600 centrifuges at a site intended for large-scale uranium enrichment, and aimed to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by May.

The US and the EU want Russia and China to sign up to a travel ban on named individuals in Iran's missile and nuclear programmes.

In addition, the US, with some UK support, would like Europe to cut back on export credits to companies doing business with Iran and to restrict arms sales.

These measures might be difficult to agree and the big powers could decide to exercise greater voluntary re-straint or to back a move at the UN calling on, but not requiring, states to limit such dealings with Tehran.

The US and the EU argue that Iran has been unsettled by Security Council censure and Washington has sought to increase the pressure by dispatching a second aircraft carrier to the Gulf.

Such military moves have been criticised by Russia, which is key to agreeing further sanctions. Sergei Lavrov, foreign minister, said on Monday he was “concerned that forecasts and predictions of strikes on Iran have become frequent”.

Meanwhile, Javad Zarif, Iran’s outgoing ambassador to the UN, told a conference in New York that a deal on the nuclear programme that included a political commitment to peaceful activity, greater monitoring by the IAEA and the participation of an international or regional consortium in its uranium enrichment was still possible.

Mr Zarif told the meeting of the Century Foundation that there was “enough on the table already to find a resolution on the nuclear issue”, but described the Security Council as “part of the problem”, alleging it had been used as a tool of the US rather than as a genuine way of finding a negotiated deal.

He sidestepped questions about what conditions would be needed for Iran to suspend enrichment but said any demand on it to abandon its right to nuclear technology was “not a good solution”.

Iran's Pursuit Of Nuclear Power Raises Alarms (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

Iran's mantralike insistence that its pursuit of nuclear technology is an internationally guaranteed right that it will never curtail has countries as diverse as the United States and China worried it is seeking a nuclear weapon.

But the huge increases in energy demand anticipated across the developing world over the next two decades, coupled with a growing urgency about global warming, have nuclear nonproliferation experts focused on Iran's case for broader and even more unsettling reasons. If a sense of entitlement to nuclear power and the fuel that makes it possible is allowed to take root, they say, the world soon could find itself with dozens of nuclear countries with the means to switch from peaceful energy production to building a nuclear arsenal virtually overnight.

Many of those countries would be in such hot spots as the Middle East and Southeast Asia, where a mounting temptation to keep up with worrisome neighbors could be too much to resist.

"It's not too difficult to foresee a world of dozens of virtual nuclear-weapons states, capable of building a bomb because of the nuclear material and technology they have, and Iran represents the danger of this future scenario," says Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington. "A country that claims it is within its rights defies the international community, and gets right up to the edge of producing bomb-grade uranium."

The question of how to control the spread of nuclear technology – which can supply both civilian electrical energy production and horrendous mass destruction – has been on the international agenda since the early 1950s. A key worry has always been how to control the nuclear fuel, uranium or plutonium, that powers a civilian plant but that also is a key building block for military use of nuclear energy.

Concerns receded in recent decades, as interest stalled in nuclear-power generation. But with the US Department of Energy predicting a 50 percent rise in global demand for electricity in little more than a decade – and with rising concerns about the effect of energy sources that produce greenhouse gases – nuclear is again a "hot" energy solution.

Enter Iran and its repeated claims to a "right" to nuclear technology and power. The UN Security Council's five permanent members plus Germany met in London Monday to consider a second round of sanctions against Iran, which the UN's nuclear watchdog agency last week said was accelerating its uranium-enrichment program. The meeting, not concluded at press time, was expected to produce ideas for additional turns of screws designed to bring Tehran back to the negotiating table.

Since the 1970 Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), international law has acknowledged a universal right to peaceful nuclear energy. But Iran is using a "pick-and-choose" approach to the NPT, many experts say. Even before the part of the treaty that speaks of a right to nuclear energy, they point out, the language first lays out a country's responsibilities to forswear military uses and to provide assurances that its uses are peaceful.

"What we're talking about here is a loose interpretation of a right to something that brings you to within days of having a bomb, but when people say there is a right to that they are wrong," says Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center in Washington and a former Pentagon nonproliferation official.

It is "sloppy reading" of rules that include safeguards, Mr. Sokolski says, that has allowed Iran to move forward while citing "rights" but not responsibilities. Some countries and some US officials are pressing for a stricter interpretation, he says, that there is "no per se right to technology" without an equal willingness to prove that its use is solely for peaceful purposes.

A problem, though, stems from past practice of the US and other nuclear powers who have looked away as friendly nations with nuclear-energy programs developed their own programs for producing nuclear fuel. That response has allowed a list of nonnuclear-weapons countries like Japan and Germany to nevertheless possess all the material they need to have a bomb in no time (an alternative Japan has occasionally mulled over as North Korea has gone nuclear).

"We have winked at a list of friendly countries like Japan, Germany, Brazil, and others on the question of whether or not they should be able to make their own nuclear fuel, and the result is the idea that if it was true before it must be true for everybody," Sokolski says. The NPT says no such thing about nuclear fuel, he adds, because the international nuclear-fuel regime was never taken up by the treaty.

A problem for the international community is that many developing countries, no matter what they may think of the Iranian regime, perceive that Iran has a point when it speaks of developed-world favoritism, says the Arms Control Association's Mr. Kimball. Other analysts agree.

"Whether we like it or not, Iran is tapping into this issue of fairness and equality," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for America Progress and author of a new book, "Bomb Scare," on the future of nuclear weapons.

Regional fears about Iran's intentions are also a factor. As Iran has asserted a right to nuclear technology, other countries in the oil-rich Middle East have announced plans to develop nuclear energy – something many experts doubt is a coincidence.

"We may still be debating whether Iran's nuclear program is ultimately for peaceful purposes or progressing with the intent of building nuclear weapons, but the countries in the region have made their decision that it is an aggressive program that requires a counter," says Ilan Berman, vice president of the American Foreign Policy Council and an Iran expert.

Noting that at least eight countries in the Middle East have recently declared intentions to develop nuclear technology, he says: "They are looking for some sort of counterweight to the Iranian program, which the Iranians may say is for peaceful purposes but which [these countries] know has the potential of being a nuclear-weapons program as well."

Needed: disincentives to make fuel

Beyond the immediate case of Iran, Mr. Berman says, the NPT poses a problem in that its guarantees of access to nuclear power encourage countries to develop technology "that allows them to come within striking distance of a nuclear-weapons capability."

An urgent need, he adds, is a new international system that creates "disincentives" for countries to move beyond nuclear power to producing nuclear fuel.

Ideas are out there, though no one is jumping at adopting them.

One proposal is to create a privately funded "fuel bank" – a stockpile of low-enriched uranium for use by countries that pledge not to build their own fuel-cycle capabilities. The Nuclear Threat Initiative co-founded by Ted Turner and former US Sen. Sam Nunn has committed $50 million to creating such a bank through the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Others, such as the proliferation education center's Sokolski, say the incentives for nuclear-power production, including huge subsidies that countries give it, must be accounted for so that nuclear programs make economic sense. That would level the playing field as countries look for energy alternatives, and limit the "excuses" for developing a technology with a military adaptation, he says.

Jitters about nuclear rise again

While jitters about nuclear's potential for destructive uses are not new, they are heightened by the need for clean energy sources and new security threats.

America's first National Intelligence Estimate, issued under the Eisenhower administration, noted that countries would choose how to use nuclear technology "depending on how they think the wind is blowing," notes Mr. Cirincione.

"The challenge we face now is this: If we think nuclear energy is part of a global-warming solution, then we have to solve the nuclear-fuel problem to make the world safe for nuclear-power production."

Iran Demonized By U.S. And U.N. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

In response to "Table Talk1 by Michael Rubin and Danielle Pletka (editorial page, Feb. 21): Iran has not violated any of its international obligations by seeking to produce nuclear fuel for its civilian reactors.

While exercising its inalienable rights under the Non-Proliferation Treaty, Iran has cooperated with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), by placing all its nuclear facilities under the full scope of IAEA's monitoring and safeguard mechanisms.

After more than 2,200 days of inspection of Iran's nuclear facilities, the IAEA has time and again concluded that there is no evidence of diversion to non-peaceful purposes.

This raises a question: What grounds are the United Nations using to impose sanctions on Iran, while simultaneously ignoring the absence of disarmament and the proliferation threats posed by Israel, which has a huge nuclear arsenal and has refused the slightest inspections by the IAEA?

The international community must seek an immediate end to this outrageous double standard and discrimination against the rights of Iran.

Unfortunately, the right-wing pundits in the U.S. are blinded to Iran's rights, as well as to the constructive role of Iran in promoting stability and regional cooperation, intent as they are in constant demonization of Iran.

Iranian Leader's Rhetoric Criticized (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

TEHRAN -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad faced a new round of sharp criticism at home yesterday after he said Iran's nuclear program is an unstoppable train without brakes, language opponents say only inflames the West as it considers further sanctions.

In London, the United States and five other world powers agreed to begin work on a new U.N. Security Council resolution over Iran's refusal to suspend its nuclear program, but they remained committed to seeking a negotiated solution, British officials said.

Last week, the ayatollah voiced rare criticism of the domestic record of Mr. Ahmadinejad's government, and the president was notably absent when a group of Cabinet members and vice presidents met recently with the Shi'ite cleric, who has the final word in all political affairs in Iran, including the nuclear issue.

The Bush administration has taken a more aggressive stance toward Iran, building up the U.S. military presence in the Gulf and accusing Tehran of backing militants in Iraq. That has increased fears among Iranians of possible U.S. military action.

But on the eve of the London gathering, Mr. Ahmadinejad again struck a defiant tone, telling a group of clerics Sunday, "The train of the Iranian nation is without brakes and a rear gear."

Those comments brought a hail of condemnations in Iran yesterday, not only from reformists who have long opposed Mr. Ahmadinejad, but also from conservatives who once backed him but now see his fiery rhetoric as needlessly provoking the West into confrontation.

The conservative daily Resalat chided Mr. Ahmadinejad, saying "neither weakness nor unnecessarily offensive language is acceptable in foreign policy."

"Our foreign policy must reflect the ancient Iranian civilization and rich Islamic culture of the Iranian nation," the newspaper said.

DOJ_NMG_0137293

Few details emerged from the London meeting of the United States and its partners -- France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany -- but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said they would hold talks by phone Thursday "at which time they hope to be able to hammer out the elements of a U.N. sanctions resolution."

U.S. officials have been pressing for strong action against Tehran but have run into opposition, notably from Russia, over how tough a line to take.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow was "worried that the forecasts and suppositions of a possible attack on Iran have become more frequent."

Mr. Ahmadinejad's critics have grown more vocal since his allies suffered a humiliating defeat in local elections in December. That vote was swept by reformist parties and anti-Ahmadinejad conservatives who said the president has spent too much time castigating the West and has neglected Iran's faltering economy.

The president appeared to have toned down his rhetoric in the past few weeks, insisting Iran would not give up its nuclear program but using a more moderate tone and expressing a desire to negotiate with the West.

Iranian political analyst Iraj Jamshidi said it appeared "the top leadership has cautioned him about his remarks," but he added that Mr. Ahmadinejad's tough rhetoric "is part of his personality."

Iran denies U.S. and Western claims that it is secretly trying to develop nuclear weapons, and the country's political factions have long been united in their stance that Iran has a right to a peaceful nuclear energy program. So far, the criticism of the president has focused on his confrontational tone -- though some reformers have gone further, saying Iran should be more willing to consider at least a temporary suspension of the nuclear program.

At the same time, Mr. Ahmadinejad's top political rival, Ayatollah Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West, saying the nuclear dispute needs to be resolved through "dialogue and wisdom."

Mr. Rafsanjani, a top figure in Iran's clerical leadership, lost to Mr. Ahmadinejad in the 2005 election, but Mr. Rafsanjani's allies were among those swept to victory in the December local elections.

Iranian Scholars Denounce Conference That Denied Holocaust (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 26 — A group of Iranian academics, writers and artists has denounced the Holocaust conference held in Tehran late last year, calling it a move that endangered peace and hurt the reputation of Iranian academics.

The Iranian government organized a two-day gathering in December, billed it as a legitimate conference on the historical record and invited notorious Holocaust deniers and white supremacists from around the world. Among those from the United States was the former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke.

The Foreign Ministry held the event after President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said several times that the Holocaust was a myth invented to justify the state of Israel.

In a bold gesture, more than 20 academics, writers and artists, many of whom live outside of Iran, signed a statement that was sent to The New York Times and circulated on the Internet last week, arguing that the gathering was an exercise in propaganda.

The statement said the conference harmed the academic image of Iranian universities and merely provided a pretext for warmongers in the region. It added that the gathering perpetuated the immoral stance of Holocaust denial, a position that seriously endangers world peace.

“The extensive material evidence, the confessions made in the Nuremberg trial and other trials that took place after the war and the testimonies of the survivors established the veracity of the accounts beyond any doubt,” the statement said.

“The accuracy of the accounts has been acknowledged by many academic, political and religious authorities, including the Catholic Church.”

The statement added that talking inconsiderately about the genocide can only be described as rubbing salt into a historical wound.

DOJ_NMG_0137294

"Those who perpetuate the discourse on Holocaust denial ignore the feelings of the people directly affected by this event," it said.

The statement also argued that denying the Holocaust would not help the Palestinian cause. "No matter what political position we adopt regarding the creation of Israel and its further expansion, the historical evidence for the Holocaust remains intact," it said.

"The Palestinians, like all other nations, have a right to enjoy their livelihood in their own independent state," the statement added. "This right has nothing to do with the denial or acknowledgment of the Holocaust."

Given the risk of harassment and repression for those who criticize the government, dissent over the so-called conference had been slow to build. Recently, reformist politicians and several members of Parliament voiced their outrage over the consequences of holding such an event.

Akbar Alami, the parliamentary representative from the northwestern city of Tabriz, had asked Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki to appear in Parliament to explain the ministry's plans for decreasing tension with the West in January and accused Mr. Ahmadinejad of conducting a reckless foreign policy.

"Why did we have to bring up the issue of the Holocaust, which belongs to 60 years ago?" Mr. Alami asked Mr. Mottaki.

Mehdi Karoubi, a veteran politician and a former speaker of Parliament, criticized the event last week, saying that it led to a United Nations resolution against Iran.

"Have we ever asked how questioning the Holocaust has harmed us and what price we had to pay for it?" he asked in a speech at Tehran University, the ILNA Labor news agency reported.

The United Nations reacted to the event in Tehran by adopting a resolution without vote that rejected denial of the Holocaust as a historical event.

Persian Shrug (WSJ)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Almost everyone in Washington agrees that Iran is the big winner in the Middle East power competition, and the U.S. the big loser. Instead of the irremediably hostile Taliban, Iran now has a friendly Afghan government on its eastern border. Rather than having to face Saddam Hussein's regime, Iran has nothing to fear from an Iraqi government dominated by friends and obedient clients, many of whom lived as protected exiles in Iran for 20 years or more.

Having crushed Tehran's enemies, the U.S. finds itself under attack by Iran's rulers, who no longer have to worry about defending their own borders and can instead challenge American interests all over the Middle East, and as far away as Venezuela. At the same time, Iran continues to build facilities to process, gasify and enrich uranium, in spite of the International Atomic Energy Agency and solemn resolutions by the U.N. Security Council.

For some, including the Baker-Hamilton commission, all this is a compelling argument for negotiations. The hope is that Iran's mighty rulers can be persuaded to stop arming and inciting the insurgents attacking American and British troops in Iraq, and perhaps help to stabilize the country, allowing the U.S. to withdraw less ignominiously. Now there is even talk of a détente with Iran, that being the standard diplomatic method to deal with a hostile country too powerful to be intimidated or defeated, and with which one must simply coexist on the best terms that can be had. In this case, it would mean coexistence with Tehran's continued support for Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and three different Iraqi militias, as well as with Iran's nuclear program.

Back in the 1970s, détente with the Soviet Union was criticized on the grounds that it actually propped up a regime in irreversible decline, and whose power could be confronted successfully. In the 1980s, the critics of that détente led by Ronald Reagan had their opportunity to challenge the Soviet Union, which did not outlast the decade.

There is every reason to believe that history is about to repeat itself. Iran does not resemble the Soviet Union in any other way and certainly does not have even a fraction of its military power, but it too is a multinational state in an age when nations are everywhere asserting their separate identities. In arguing that there is universal support for the nuclear program, regime spokesmen and even many Persians in exile speak of Iran as a unitary state inhabited by "Iranians" who are very nationalistic, even if they oppose the ayatollahs.

None of this remotely corresponds to Iran's ethnic realities. Persians only account for half the population, and the other half includes many different nationalities increasingly resentful of Persian cultural imperialism.

Kurds account for some 7% of the population, and their nationalism is Kurdish and not Persian, having been much strengthened by the successful example of virtual Kurdish independence in Iraq. Their demands for autonomy have become sufficiently forceful to start an insurgency. The same is true of two smaller nationalities that are even more violently disaffected with frequent fire-fights and bombings: the Arabs and the Baluch, which account for another 3% of the population. But the largest of Iran's subject nationalities are the Azeris. While many have been assimilated, at least 20 million still speak an entirely different Turkic language, and increasingly form the core of a united Azeri nation that extends beyond western Iran to include the former Soviet republic of Azerbaijan.

The religious extremism of Iran's regime creates its own divisions. The bloody persecution of the Bahais, the new persecution of the Sufis and the institutional subjection of Christians, Jews and Zoroastrians have attracted greater attention, but the ill-treatment of the 9% of the population that is Sunni is more important politically: In Tehran where more than a million Sunnis live, there is no Sunni mosque as there is in Rome, Tel Aviv and Washington, D.C.

If Iran's economy were more successful, ethnic divisions and even religious resentments would matter less. As it is, with at least 20% unemployment and an annual inflation rate of some 30%, Iran's economy is scarcely a unifying force, especially because most of its minorities are distinctly poorer than the dominant Persians.

Viewed from the inside, Iran is hardly the formidable power that some see on the outside. The natural outcome of increasing popular opposition to extremist rulers, of widening ethnic divisions and bitter Sunni resentment of Shia oppression is a breakup. Certainly there is no reason why Iran should be the only multinational state to resist the nationalist separatism that destroyed the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, divided Belgium in all but name and decentralized Spain and even the United Kingdom, along with other states large and small.

Once again, there is a better alternative to détente with a repulsive regime, and that is to be true to the Wilsonian tradition of American foreign policy by encouraging the forces of national liberation within Iran.

Germany's Iran Trade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Contrary to the impression created by your Feb. 20 editorial "Europe and the Mullahs," Germany's trade with Iran as well as its export credit guarantees have declined sharply in the past year. German exports of goods to Iran in 2004 rose by 33% compared with 2003; in 2005 the increase was 24%, and in 2006 exports fell by almost 8%. A further fall is foreseen for 2007. Export guarantees from 2005 to 2006 declined by 33%, due to the federal government having tightened its policies. A further decline by 40% is predicted for 2007. Over 2006 and 2007 export guarantees will thus have dropped in volume by 60%.

Palestinian Killed In Israeli Sweep Of West Bank City (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 26 — Israeli troops searched for militants and weapons in the West Bank city of Nablus for a third day Monday, going door to door and periodically clashing with gunmen and stone-throwing youths.

One Palestinian man was killed and his son was wounded, Palestinians said, the first fatality since Israel began the operation on Saturday through the warren of homes and shops in the casbah area of central Nablus.

The Israeli troops, in dozens of jeeps and armored vehicles, have placed the neighborhood under curfew and blocked off the surrounding streets with concrete blocks while they conducted an open-ended search.

The Israeli operation has kept tens of thousands of residents confined to their homes.

"The operation will carry on until we achieve our main mission," said Brig. Gen. Yair Golan, the commander of forces in the city.

Over the past year, more attempted attacks against Israel have originated in Nablus than in any other West Bank city, the general said.

The Israeli military said Monday that soldiers had surrounded a house after they received reports that gunmen were inside.

When two men from the house were seen climbing onto the roof, the soldiers fired, killing one and wounding the other, the military said.

Palestinian witnesses and hospital officials identified the dead man as Anan al-Tibi, who was in his 40s, and said the man who was wounded was his son.

Palestinian medical workers said Israeli troops had stationed themselves outside the city's three main hospitals and were checking ambulances when they arrive to see if they contained suspected militants.

"The doctors keep asking the army to move back from the hospital entrance," said Ran Goldstein, a spokesman for Physicians for Human Rights/Israel, a group that is monitoring events in Nablus. "The soldiers might move 10 meters away, but they keep coming back."

Since Saturday, the Israelis say they have made several arrests and uncovered two bomb-making laboratories. Nablus, the largest city in the West Bank, has been a center for militants since the Palestinian uprising began more than six years ago.

On Sunday, the Israeli military interrupted Palestinian radio and television broadcasts to announce the names of seven wanted militants, and warned residents in the area not to hide them.

On Monday, Israeli authorities also said that they had arrested two Palestinian teenagers in connection with the stabbing death of a Jewish settler on Sunday night near the West Bank settlement of Bat Ayin, several miles from Hebron, and that the two confessed. The Israeli settler, Erez Levanon, frequently walked into the woods near his home to pray and meditate, neighbors said.

Also on Monday, the Hamas political leader in exile, Khaled Meshal, arrived in Moscow and praised Russia for its stance on the boycott in Western assistance to the Palestinian government, which is led by Hamas.

"We value Russia's position toward lifting the blockade from which the Palestinian people suffer," said Mr. Meshal, who is based in Syria, according to Russia's RIA news agency.

Russia is part of the so-called quartet of Middle East mediators, which also includes the United States, the European Union and the United Nations.

The group has demanded that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements.

However, unlike the United States and the European Union, which have labeled Hamas a terrorist group and have refused to deal with it, Russia maintains ties with the group.

3 French Sightseers Killed Near Saudi Holy City (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 26 — Gunmen killed three French citizens and wounded a fourth near the holy city of Medina in Saudi Arabia early Monday, in a brazen reminder that attacks on foreigners there have not stopped despite an aggressive three-year security crackdown.

The Saudi Interior Ministry said eight French citizens had been traveling toward Medina from Tabuk, a northwestern town, when they came under attack. Two men were pronounced dead at the scene and another died in a provincial hospital later in the day, a Saudi security official said.

A fourth member of the group was listed in critical condition, Maj. Gen. Mansour al-Turki, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said late Monday.

General Turki said the group had stopped by the side of a road typically restricted to Muslims about 10 miles from Medina when a car pulled near them and opened fire.

The group included men, women and at least one child, he said, but only men were struck in the attack.

Two of the victims were identified by colleagues as engineers who worked at Schneider Electric in Riyadh, the Saudi capital.

The colleagues said the group had been returning from a trip to see the Nabatean ruins at Madain Salih, near Tabuk. Jean-Pascal Tricoire, the chairman and chief executive officer of Schneider Electric, expressed his regrets to the families of the victims in a statement on Monday.

The group initially included 17 Belgians who had left for home earlier in the day, while the others planned to go to Medina and Mecca, a security official said.

General Turki said he could not immediately confirm the religious affiliations of the dead. But Medina, where the Prophet Muhammad built a Muslim state and is buried, is strictly forbidden to non-Muslims. The group might have been traveling to another ancient site recently opened to non-Muslims, he said.

Philippe Douste-Blazy, France's foreign minister, condemned the attack as a "horrible act" and said the French and Saudi authorities were cooperating "so that full light is shed and that the perpetrators are arrested and punished."

The motive for the attack was not immediately clear. A French Foreign Ministry spokesman said late Monday that the attack had not been categorized as an act of terrorism.

A Saudi security official said remnants of Al Qaeda were believed to be hiding in the rugged area, where it is easy to find refuge. Police officers and paramilitary units were put on alert as a search for the suspects began Monday night, the official said.

Since May 2003, a wave of Qaeda-led attacks, initially against foreigners in Saudi Arabia and later against government assets and officials, has sought to topple the United States-backed monarchy there with suicide bombings and gun attacks.

The attacks included the beheading of Paul M. Johnson Jr., an American helicopter engineer. At least 75 other people have been killed, among them a BBC cameraman.

Saudi security officials have continued to make arrests and raid militant hide-outs.

French Nationals Killed On Saudi Tour (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Gunmen in Saudi Arabia shot dead three Frenchmen who were working in the country on Monday as they were travelling north of the holy city of Medina in what appeared to be an attack by Islamic militants.

The attack took place as a group of nine French nationals, including women and children, were resting by a roadside, said Major General Mansour al-Turki, the interior ministry spokesman. He said it was too early to determine if it was a terrorist act.

"They are all residents who work in Riyadh and who had gone on a desert trip," he said, adding that the attackers escaped after apparently stalking the group as they camped overnight.

The French foreign ministry said one of the dead was a teacher and two others worked with French company Schneider Electric.

There have been no serious attacks against foreigners in Saudi Arabia since a spate of killings by extremists thought to be linked to al-Qaeda in 2003 and 2004. But western embassies have warned their national that the terrorism threat in the kingdom remains high.

Philippe Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, condemned the attack. "French authorities are mobilised along with the Saudi authorities so that light can be shed and that those responsible be detained and punished," he said.

Saudi Arabia's efforts to tackle terrorism have been under intense scrutiny since the September 11 2001 attacks when it emerged that 15 of the 19 hijackers were Saudi citizens.

In 2003 extremists launched attacks against compounds housing foreigners working in Saudi Arabia, killing dozens of people. Militants launched a further wave of attacks against westerners in 2004, including an assault on the US consulate in

Jeddah. BBC security correspondent Frank Gardner was seriously injured and cameraman Simon Cumbers died in a Riyadh shooting attack the same year.

But there had been no serious attacks against expatriates since then and diplomats credit Saudi authorities for tough action against the threat of extremists.

Last February Saudi authorities killed five suspected militants believed to be linked to an assault on the Abqaiq oil facility, the world's biggest oil processing plant. In October US-led coalition naval forces moved into Saudi Arabia's port of Ras Tanura to counter a possible maritime threat to the oil facilities.

The British embassy's travel advisory warns that it continues to believe "terrorists are planning further attacks, including against westerners and places associated with westerners in Saudi Arabia".

Millions In Aid Linked To Yemeni Reform (CSM)

By Ginny Hill

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

President Ali Abdullah Saleh was en route to Washington in 2005 for talks on his country's role in the "war on terror" when his entourage learned that Yemen would be dropped from a list of countries hoping for millions in US aid.

But no one in his retinue dared broach the subject with President Saleh, says a Sanaa source familiar with the trip. The leader, who had long denied that his country has a corruption problem, wouldn't learn until he reached the White House that Yemen was cut from the list of nations eligible to apply for the Millennium Challenge Account (MCA), a Bush administration plan that ties aid to governance benchmarks.

"It came as a real shock," says the source. "It was only then that the scale of Yemen's problems sank in."

While the November 2005 trip was a public embarrassment for Saleh, it marked a turning point in how his government began dealing with corruption.

In the beginning of 2006, he launched an ambitious anticorruption program, and on Feb. 14, the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), which administers the MCA, reinstated Yemen's chance for assistance as a result of an "aggressive reform effort."

Now, this fragile state on the tip of the Arabian Peninsula could gain hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, if it can sustain reform momentum. Yemen is the poorest Arab country – almost half the population is illiterate and 1 in 10 people live on less than $2 a day.

"Our economy is heavily dependent on oil supplies that won't last more than 15 years and the water table is dropping at an alarming rate," says Ali Saif Hassan, director of Yemen's Political Development Forum, an independent think tank. "The current reform program is very welcome, but there's a danger that the speed of the approaching resources crisis will outpace the process of transformation."

Saleh's reward for his U-turn has more political value than immediate financial benefit. The country still has many hoops to jump through before it can claim the prize of full participation in President Bush's aid program.

Yemen is now embarking on a round of negotiations that will force it to define its intentions. If Yemen is accepted to join the MCC's Threshold Program during the next few months, it will receive funds to speed up early reforms that will allow Yemen to apply for full membership, known as compact status, in a few years' time. The process can be suspended at any time.

In December 2006, Yemen's parliament ratified a law forming the National Supreme Anticorruption Authority. The MCC board will be watching to see if this new body operates effectively before Yemen can progress to the compact stage.

Yemen must also show that revised procurement laws for government contracts are being used and that steps are being taken toward press freedom and respect for the rule of law.

The payoff could be substantial. Ghana is one of 31 countries admitted to the twin stages of the Millennium Challenge and the most recent applicant to qualify for a compact; it was awarded $540 million over four years.

DOJ_NMG_0137299

The MCC's nod comes at a time of growing confidence in Yemen among donors. In November 2006, Britain and Yemen's Gulf neighbors pledged $4.7 billion in aid over the next four years. The agreement to increase aid followed the recognition that Yemen was underfunded. It receives just $12 per person in annual development assistance. Its African and Asian peers, on average, receive three times that amount.

British Ambassador Michael Gifford says Yemen is standing at "a crucial point. There are a number of reform-minded ministers responsible for key portfolios and recent pledges of increased aid, including from the UK, demonstrate that President Saleh's government has the good will and support of the international community."

To be sure, there are concerns about Yemen's capacity to spend this extra money wisely. Donors admit that such an extensive reform process will be difficult. In the long term, they emphasize Yemen's need to follow through on its promises.

"Economic reform and stamping out corruption are vital to solving the country's future challenges," says Kevin Rosser, an oil and gas analyst at risk consulting firm Control Risks. "Without them, there can be no progress toward reducing poverty, combating extremism, or strengthening democratic institutions."

Western diplomats and progressive Yemenis hope that this opportunity won't be squandered. Saleh has endorsed the project personally. Observers are hoping that he demonstrates the will to implement the changes in a sustained reform drive that lasts the course of his term in office.

"If Yemen backslides, it will affect the whole region," says presidential adviser Faris Sanabani. "Yemen has huge potential, and the economy is our next battle. Our commitment to reform is going to turn the country around and put us on the right track for the future."

Court Declares Bosnia Killings Were Genocide (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 26 — The International Court of Justice on Monday for the first time called the massacre of Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica in 1995 an act of genocide, but determined that Serbia itself was not guilty of the enormous crime.

Nonetheless, it faulted Serbia, saying it “could and should” have prevented the genocide and, in its aftermath, should have punished the Bosnian Serbs who systematically killed close to 8,000 men and boys in July 1995.

The ruling resulted from a civil lawsuit Bosnia had brought against Serbia, the first in which one country sued another for genocide.

The 15 international judges who held nine weeks of hearings and deliberated for nearly 10 months relied in part on evidence presented in criminal cases heard by the United Nations Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which has found two Bosnian Serb officers guilty of genocide for the Srebrenica massacre.

In the end, the lawsuit resolved Monday may have been the most complex case handled in the 60-year history of the World Court, which the United Nations set up to resolve legal disputes between states.

The ruling appeared to give some satisfaction — and frustration — to both sides. It freed Serbia of the stigma of being a genocidal nation and absolved it from having to pay war reparations, as demanded by Bosnia.

At the same time, Bosnia obtained what it said it wanted from the outset: a recognition of Serbia’s guilt.

During the war in Bosnia, from 1992 to 1995, the United Nations declared Srebrenica a haven and promised to protect it. But in July 1995, Bosnian Serb forces overwhelmed 370 lightly armed Dutch peacekeepers, seized control of the enclave and killed almost every Bosnian Muslim man and boy captured there.

That massacre led to the ruling Monday, which also stressed that other large-scale killings and abuse of Bosnian Muslims had taken place with the financial and military support of Serbia during the 1990s war that broke up Yugoslavia.

Judge Rosalyn Higgins, the court’s president, read the ruling, which described the close ties between Serbia and the Bosnian Serb forces. It said that the leaders in Belgrade, and President Slobodan Milosevic above all, “were fully aware of the deep-seated hatred which reigned between the Bosnian Serbs and the Muslims in the Srebrenica region,” and that massacres were likely to occur. Yet the Serbs did nothing to avert atrocities or prevent the killings, “claiming they were powerless, which hardly tallies with their known influence” over the Bosnian Serb forces, the ruling concluded.

Serbia thereby violated the United Nations Convention on Genocide to which it is a party, the ruling found. The ruling, Judge Higgins noted, is binding and final, without appeal. Failing to arrest and hand over the Bosnian Serb military commander, Ratko Mladic, was a further violation, the court said.

The court said that other offenses committed against Bosnians might amount to war crimes and crimes against humanity, but that it had no jurisdiction over those issues. It did not list specific killings or the number of victims. International organizations say more than 100,000 people died between 1992 and 1995, two-thirds of them Bosnian Muslims.

"This is a moral victory, certainly, but less of a legal victory," said Alain Pellet, a spokesman for the Bosnian legal team. "But violations by one state against another have now been determined and many atrocities have been cited. Genocide is not the only atrocity."

After the ruling, the Serbian president, Boris Tadic, urged the Serbian Parliament to condemn the Srebrenica massacre, but that may be difficult to obtain because nationalist groups continue to deny it. He said it was "very important for Serbia and its citizens" that Serbia was not found guilty of genocide, but lamented that once again Serbia was mentioned in the context of war crimes and genocide.

In a statement after the session, Judge Higgins noted that the findings did not completely satisfy either side. "That does not mean, of course, that the court has been seeking a political compromise," she said.

All the same, the ruling, even if strictly based on the law, hews close to the political wishes of Western countries that want to pull Serbia into a wider Western European community, rather than see it isolated as a pariah state, possibly accused of genocide, with its extreme nationalists growing in strength.

NATO last year invited Serbia to join its Partnership for Peace venture and some European Union countries want to start membership talks with Belgrade, with some demanding that it first locate and hand over General Mladic, charged with genocide at the United Nations war crimes tribunal.

The court said Serbia had to abide by the Genocide Convention, requiring punishment of those accused, and urged it to do so immediately. The court's ruling might strengthen the hand of Serbians who want to rid themselves of the burden of keeping General Mladic as a fugitive in Serbia.

But the last word on the role of the Serbian leadership in the Bosnian war has not been said. Although Mr. Milosevic died last year before the end of his four-year trial, other senior Serbian political and military leaders are still facing trial at the tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

The tribunal has part of the war-time records of the Supreme Defense Council, which included the former Yugoslavia's military and political leaders, including Mr. Milosevic. Tribunal officials have said part of the minutes of the meetings were blacked out and some whole sections were missing. But the minutes still provided much information on how the Serb leaders "ran their proxy army" in Bosnia, one tribunal official said.

Serbia made a deal with the tribunal that only its judges and lawyers could see the records, the effect of which was that they were kept out of reach of the lawsuit at the World Court. In their ruling Monday, the judges made the point that they had been prevented from seeing them.

Lawyers for Bosnia had tried to convince the court that the pattern of atrocities across many communities in Bosnia demonstrated the intention to commit genocide, not only by killing, imprisoning and deporting the population, but also by destroying evidence of their presence. Andras Riedlmayer, a historian testifying for Bosnia, said the Serb campaign to purge 26 municipalities of Bosnia of non-Serbs had destroyed or damaged 958 mosques and close to 300 Roman Catholic churches and monasteries.

But the judges ruled that demonstrating a pattern of conduct or of atrocities was "too broad" to qualify for the definition of genocide. The crime of genocide required showing convincingly there was a specific plan or the specific intention to destroy the group or part of it, they ruled.

In essence, they did not answer the question often asked in The Hague: when does ethnic cleansing become genocide?

U.N. Court Clears Serbia Of Genocide (WP/AP)

By Mike Corder

DOJ_NMG_0137301

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 26 -- The United Nations' highest court on Monday cleared Serbia of genocide against Muslims in Bosnia's bloody 1992-95 war. But it said the country's former government should have stopped the July 1995 slaughter of more than 7,000 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica and ordered Serb leaders to hand over the alleged architect of the massacre.

The case marked the first time a state had been taken to court over allegations of genocide, outlawed by a U.N. convention in 1948 after the Nazi Holocaust. Individuals have been convicted in genocide cases linked to massacres in Bosnia and Rwanda.

In a 171-page ruling, the International Court of Justice said the massacre of thousands of Muslims by Bosnian Serb forces at the U.N.-protected Srebrenica enclave was an act of genocide.

But the 15-judge panel rejected Bosnia's claim that the Serbian state was responsible for the killing, saying it did not have effective control over the Bosnian Serb forces it had helped arm and finance. Instead, the judges ruled that Serbia stood by and allowed the massacre to happen.

Serbia, "could, and should, have acted to prevent the genocide, but did not," the court's president, Rosalyn Higgins, told reporters.

The ruling sparked outrage in Bosnia, which filed the case, and among dozens of war survivors who gathered outside the gates of the International Court of Justice.

"Shame on the people who reached such a verdict. How can they say not guilty of genocide when there are photos, video footage?" Zinaida Mujic, of the Mothers of Srebrenica association, said in Sarajevo.

The Srebrenica massacre was the worst mass killing in Europe since World War II and the bloodiest episode in the violent breakup of Yugoslavia into six independent states, including Bosnia, Serbia and Croatia. The fighting started in Slovenia in 1991, spread to Croatia in 1992 and Bosnia the same year, leaving at least 200,000 dead. In the Bosnian war, Muslims, Catholic Croats and Orthodox Serbs fought one another.

Higgins also condemned Serbia's failure to hand over Bosnian Serb Gen. Ratko Mladic, indicted more than a decade ago by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia for the genocide in Srebrenica.

The court said there was "plentiful, and mutually corroborative, information suggesting that Gen. Mladic . . . was on the territory of [Serbia] at least on several occasions and for substantial periods during the last few years and may still be there now."

The order to arrest Mladic and other genocide suspects was part of the binding judgment in the case. Failure to comply can be reported to the U.N. Security Council. However, international officials have been pushing Serbia to hand over Mladic for nearly 12 years without success.

The European Union has made Serbia's hopes for membership conditional on its cooperation in handing over Mladic and other fugitives.

Although Higgins mentioned Mladic by name, his accused accomplice, former Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic, was not so cited. Karadzic is believed to be hiding in the Serb-controlled portion of Bosnia, out of Serbia's reach.

Last week, international forces in Bosnia raided the homes of Karadzic's son and daughter, saying they were suspected of supporting their fugitive father.

Serbia's president, Boris Tadic, welcomed Monday's court ruling and said cooperating with the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal in handing over Mladic was key to the country's future.

"Unless Serbia finally wraps up that cooperation . . . I believe, as a state, it will face dramatic political and economic consequences," Tadic said.

Grim Mystery Unfolds In Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Alex Renderos

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

SAN SALVADOR -- For more than a week, Guatemalans and Salvadorans have been in the grip of a murky and gruesome mystery story born of Central America's criminal underworld.

It began on the night of Feb. 19, with an SUV burning on a rural road outside Guatemala City. The charred bodies of three Salvadoran legislators and their driver were found at the scene. Among them were Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of one of El Salvador's most notorious right-wing leaders.

On Sunday night, the latest chapter played out at a Guatemalan prison, when four officers from a top Guatemalan police unit were slain in their cells three days after they had been arrested and charged with killing the legislators.

Police and government officials in El Salvador and Guatemala said the case may have exposed an unsettling link between drug traffickers and the security and political elite of the countries.

On Friday, Guatemalan President Oscar Berger said drug traffickers were behind the killings of the legislators and promised a "thorough purge" of corrupt elements in the Guatemalan police force.

Berger said he would take the extraordinary step of requiring dozens of high-ranking police and government officials to take polygraph tests, including, "if necessary," Interior Minister Carlos Vielmann, the country's top security official.

The four police officials killed Sunday were all members of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, including the unit's director, Luis Arturo Herrera. There were conflicting reports as to how they were killed.

Some media reports said an armed "commando" unit had entered the maximum-security prison about 40 miles outside Guatemala City. The assailants reportedly disarmed the guards, then slit the throats of the arrested officers.

Other reports said inmates in the prison killed the men in retribution for their actions as police officers.

In neighboring El Salvador, some saw a conspiracy.

"The killing of these officers shows there are more people involved" in the assassination of the legislators, said Rodrigo Avila, head of El Salvador's national police. "They wanted to silence these officers, who were part of a very powerful [criminal] organization.... They're trying to close a Pandora's box."

Avila said top officials in Guatemala's national police had joined forces with an organized-crime group involved in a variety of illicit activities, including drug trafficking, immigrant smuggling and money laundering.

"We are very worried that the top levels of the [Guatemalan] police appear to have been infiltrated by organized crime," Salvadoran Minister for Security and Justice Rene Figueroa said.

Salvadoran officials say they don't know precisely how or why the legislators were slain.

The legislators left San Salvador in a caravan with other lawmakers on the morning of Feb. 19, headed for a meeting in Guatemala City of the Central American Parliament, a body that advocates and regulates regional economic cooperation.

They were last seen alive in Guatemala City on the day of their disappearance, after leaving behind their Guatemalan police escort. Their bodies were discovered on a farm 25 miles outside the city, with gunshot wounds and burned beyond recognition. At least two of the men may have been burned alive, according to news reports.

Guatemalan authorities said the method of the attack clearly suggested it was a "message" killing.

Besides D'Aubuisson, the 32-year-old son of Roberto D'Aubuisson, the late founder of El Salvador's ruling Nationalist Republican Alliance, the dead included two other legislators from the right-wing party, William Pichinte and Jose Ramon Gonzalez.

Salvadoran President Tony Saca called the men national heroes who had died "in the cause of freedom."

But on Sunday, the Guatemala City newspaper Siglo XXI quoted an unnamed Guatemalan police official who said the killers and victims were linked "with a drug trafficking organization made up of Guatemalans and Salvadorans, among them a contact with a lot of political influence" in El Salvador.

The crime was the result of "a business deal gone sour, which is unforgivable among drug traffickers," the police official said.

In El Salvador, the idea that the scion of one of the nation's leading right-wing families may have been involved in drug dealing was unpalatable. Salvadoran police floated a different theory: mistaken identity.

The conservative newspaper El Diario de Hoy quoted Salvadoran police who said the slain lawmakers had been confused for "Colombian drug dealers" and killed when their assailants failed to discover cash or drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0137303

The arrested police officers told investigators that they had been contracted by a group of Guatemalan drug traffickers linked to Salvadoran organized crime. But they would say no more about their orders, because, as one of them said, "I'd rather commit suicide than talk."

Negroponte Expected To Make Mark In China (AP)

By George Gedda, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

The State Department has been lacking a diplomatic heavyweight to handle China issues since last summer, and President Bush's choice to fill that role plans to travel to Beijing this week as part of a three-nation East Asia tour.

John Negroponte, newly installed as the State Department's No. 2 official, is scheduled to visit South Korea and Japan, in addition to China.

Negroponte, 67, began his career as an Asia hand more than 40 years ago and has worked on regional issues periodically since then, including a stint as ambassador to the Philippines. He was director of national intelligence for the past two years, and issues relating to China crossed his desk frequently, including the country's military buildup.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also will call on Negroponte for advice on Iraq, where he served as ambassador.

For the United States, there may be no foreign relationship as important as the one with China. It is a fellow permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, a major trading partner and an important player on such diplomatic problems as North Korea, Iran and Sudan.

The Bush administration has become increasingly bothered by China's secrecy on its defense spending levels and the goals of what officials call its "rapid military modernization."

China touched off fears of an arms race in space in January when it destroyed a defunct Chinese weather satellite by hitting it with a warhead launched from a ballistic missile.

On the other hand, the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament breakthrough with North Korea was achieved partly as the result of close U.S.-Chinese cooperation

Negroponte does not qualify as a China expert, but the same could have been said of his predecessor, Robert Zoellick, who nonetheless was admired around the State Department and beyond for his grasp of the China puzzle. Zoellick left the State Department in July to take a job on Wall Street.

Some China experts believe the void created by Zoellick's departure has been costly.

"One has the feeling that the government has been compassless. There is almost a blindness in regards to China," says Orville Schell, director of the Asia Society's Center on U.S.-China Relations in New York.

Jeffrey Bader, a China expert at the Brookings Institution who served on President Clinton's National Security Council, said that no one at the State Department's senior level has been focused on China since Zoellick's departure.

He noted that Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary for East Asian affairs, has been consumed with North Korea since his appointment almost two years ago.

The most prominent China expert in government is Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who had traveled to China dozens of times on business before joining the Cabinet in July. Paulson expects to make his third trip to China as secretary in early March. His frequent dealings with the Chinese have touched on trade, environmental and economic issues, but not the critical security questions that Negroponte will take on.

As Zoellick was leaving the State Department last summer, Tom Christensen, a China expert from Princeton, was being appointed as a deputy assistant secretary in the East Asia bureau, an important but not top level post. Christensen has written a book on U.S.-China relations and nowadays puts his fluent Chinese to work in discussions with Beijing officials.

He has held teaching positions at Cornell and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The department also boasts a number of China hands at lower levels with strong command of the issues and the language as well.

Broadcast Media In China Put On Notice (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137304

BEIJING, Feb. 26 -- Communist Party propaganda chiefs have issued a stern new warning to China's broadcast executives, saying news reports and entertainment should promote socialist loyalty and soothe tensions as the country enters a sensitive political season.

The new guidelines were issued Jan. 12 at a meeting called by the party propaganda department; a written record of the gathering is currently circulating in Beijing.

The guidelines reflect a particular desire at senior levels of President Hu Jintao's government to see a picture of harmony and contentedness in the broadcast media as the Chinese legislature prepares to meet next month and the Communist Party gets ready for its 17th national congress in the fall.

Propaganda officials regularly issue orders to Chinese television, radio and newspaper executives, listing subjects to be avoided or treated with care in the heavily censored media. But the marching orders last month appeared to be part of a concentrated effort to orchestrate the news in the lead-up to this year's major political meetings. They followed guidelines designed to maintain the traditional cultural focus and political correctness of television movies and serials.

"In foreign countries, televisions are privately owned and you can broadcast whatever you want," Wang Weiping, deputy head of the series division at China's State Television, Film and Broadcasting Administration, told the Southern Weekend newspaper recently. "But in China, television is the mouthpiece of the party and the people. This is its main mission, and entertainment is secondary."

The national party congress, held every five years, is especially important to Hu, who has headed the party since 2002. It is the occasion for him to cement his leadership and install his followers in key positions, particularly in a new Politburo and its ruling nine-member Standing Committee.

"To create a proper atmosphere for the 17th party congress, we should sing high praises for socialism," Li Dongshen, deputy head of the propaganda department, told the assembled executives, according to the written record of the gathering. "We should sing loudly the main themes of our nation."

According to the record, Li recalled that he had recently banned eight books because they "ran the red light" of party limits on what is acceptable for publication. He said that the broadcast industry faces similar problems and that "we need to assure the correct leading direction of propaganda and promote cultural richness."

For instance, he urged the executives to continue publicizing the policies of economic reform and opening that began two decades ago and that Hu continues to champion. But he cautioned that there should be "no publicizing of pro-privatization comments."

Li's remarks appeared to be part of an effort to dampen a quiet controversy between the reform-minded people around Hu and disgruntled party conservatives who maintain that the reforms are being pursued too quickly, without concern for the social welfare of millions of Chinese. The pace at which unprofitable state-owned enterprises are being sold off has become one aspect of this debate. A proposed law to establish legal guarantees for private property has become another, likely to be discussed during the annual session of the National People's Congress that begins next week.

Li warned that exposing corruption by party officials, a major topic in government declarations, should be done "positively," with emphasis on the party's efforts to end it. In dealing with corruption, whether in news or entertainment programs, he said, television producers should take care not to emphasize corrupt officials' high living or numerous mistresses.

He also said news reports should avoid "inside stories" about flaws in the legal system and the party's attempts to control the news. "Go all out for articles that preserve social stability and avoid triggering social conflict," he added.

Finally, in the new Year of the Pig, Li warned, executives should take into account the sensitivities of China's 35 million Muslims, who consider pigs unclean and offensive. "In principle, touch on the character of the pig as little as possible," he said.

Chinese County Reins In Birth-rate – Without A One-child Limit (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

Behind the high gray walls of this farming village, peasant couples are conducting an experiment that suggests, its designers say, that the most unpopular and costly policy of the past quarter- century may not have been necessary.

For the past 21 years, the citizens of Yicheng County, in the mining province of Shanxi, have been exempt from the "one-child policy" on which the Chinese government has founded its bid to keep a lid on its vast population. They have been allowed to have two children. Yet Yicheng's birth-rate is lower than the national average.

"If the whole country had adopted the Yicheng policy from the start, we could have kept China's population under 1.2 billion," below the official target for 2000, says Tan Kejian, of Shanxi's provincial Academy of Social Sciences. "And this policy was much easier for peasants to accept."

Central government officials chal- lenge Mr. Kejian's conclusions. But the government-sanctioned Yicheng experiment, almost unknown outside family-planning circles, is under increasingly interested scrutiny from Chinese experts as the "one-child policy" approaches what appears to be the end of its life, after 27 years.

"Most scholars are recommending to the government that the one-child policy needs to be turned into a two-child policy," says Chen Wei, head of the Population and Sustainable Development Group at Renmin University in Beijing. "Maybe not now, but in 2010," when the next five-year plan begins.

Officials at the National Population and Family Planning Commission, which has been responsible for implementing the one-child policy, insist that "the success of China's family-planning policy has been of huge significance," in the words of Yu Xuejun, director of the commission's policy and legislation department. "I am confident our general direction is correct," he says.

But the one-child policy, beyond raising worldwide concerns about the forced abortions and sterilizations that have scarred several generations of Chinese women, has bequeathed a grave legacy.

China's population is aging fast; by 2020, 234 million people, or 16 percent of the population, will be over 60, official figures indicate, up from 9 percent today.

At the same time, 30 million Chinese men will find no brides in 2020; a traditional preference for sons, the spread of ultrasound technology, and the one-child policy have combined to promote widespread sex-selective abortion, officials say.

With male births outnumbering female births by 118 to 100, China is storing up a "hidden danger" that will "affect social stability," a recent government report warned.

Discriminatory abortion is not a problem, though, in Yicheng, which has long applied one of the most liberal of the range of policies imposed around the country.

The "one-child policy" has in fact been much more flexible since the mid-1980s than its name suggests. While it has been strictly enforced in cities, affecting about 36 percent of the national population, parents in most rural areas – accounting for 53 percent of Chinese – are allowed a second child if their first is a girl. In a few cases, families can have three children.

"Overall, it's more of a one-and-a-half child policy," says Professor Chen.

Things are different for Yicheng's 310,000 inhabitants. Parents there can have two children, whatever the sex of their firstborn, if they adhere to certain conditions.

Men may not marry before the age of 25 and women may not before age 23 without being fined. That's three years later for both sexes than the national policy. They must also wait six years before having a second baby. If they don't, they are fined 1,200 RMB (about $160) per year early, or about 20 percent of an average couple's income in the region, says Yang Chunxiang, the family-planning boss here in Ren Wang.

"No one here is rich enough to pay that easily," she says. There have been no third children in the village since the '80s, and few whose birth didn't track the six-year gap.

"The one-child policy ran into strong opposition from people right from the start," says Liang Zhongtang, who designed Yicheng's policy. "I proposed a two-child policy to see if people still opposed that."

From his post as a teacher at the Communist Party school in Taiyuan, the capital of Shanxi, Professor Liang quickly rallied local family planning workers to his cause.

"People were just ignoring the policy and the government had to punish them" with fines and confiscations, recalls An Dousheng, an old man in Mao cap and collar, who headed Yicheng's family-planning unit in the 1980s. "It was difficult work. Ordinary people did not welcome the policy and did not cooperate. Our work was called 'the hardest job under the heavens.' "

"We were delighted by the new policy" when it was introduced in 1985, says Duan Chunmao. the Communist Party secretary in Ren Wang. "People felt it was more appropriate to their situation, and it helped cement links between the people and the party" that had been strained.

Twenty years on, its fruits are clear. Yicheng's fertility rate is below 9 per 1,000; the national average is 12 per 1,000. Yicheng's gender ratio at birth is 106 to 100, showing no distortion. Even more remarkably, large numbers of couples today choose to have only one child. Almost half the families in Ren Wang, for example, have only one child (though some may have a second later.)

"Nowadays, people don't want big families" says Ms. Yang. "It's very expensive – with fewer [kids] you can get richer faster."

Lü Yueping, a village shopkeeper, says she would have liked a grandson but both her daughters have had girls and neither is planning a second child. "My elder daughter is an accountant," she explains. "She is really busy."

"Mind-sets have changed a lot," says Cheng Fakui, former vice mayor of Yicheng in charge of family planning in the '80s. "A lot of people want to live for themselves, not just for their children."

China's economic development – reinforced by the one-child policy – has spread this mind-set across the countryside; children are expensive to educate, no longer so necessary for fieldwork, and increasingly unwilling to care for their aged parents – a prime motivation for having children.

The average Chinese couple now has 1.7 children, according to estimates by Renmin University's Population Studies Institute. That is only marginally more than the average number of children – 1.6 - allowed by current policy.

"Much of the decline in fertility can be traced to social and economic change," says Henry Winckler, a demographer at Columbia University in New York. "Probably relatively little ... resulted from making the small family mandatory and from using heavy-handed techniques to enforce it."

Liang, an outspoken critic of the policy, agrees. "[It] is like tilting at windmills," he scoffs. "If the policy Yicheng adopted was successful there, it could have been successfully adopted anywhere else in China."

Top officials at the National Population and Family Planning Commission dispute that. "Experiments are only experiments." points out Dr. Yu. "We dare not make a conclusion that the success" of Yicheng's policy "can represent other experiences."

Yu doubts that the enthusiasm with which Yicheng's leadership applied the policy – ensuring no third births and enforcing birth spacing – could be matched nationally.

In Yicheng, experts express disappointment at the government's failure to extend their policy elsewhere in China. One senior local official, who asked to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the issue, suggested that Beijing "is worried by population pressures and doesn't want to make any mistakes. They are very cautious."

Liang is blunter. "The leaders who make decisions don't understand the nuances of the Yicheng policy and don't want to learn about them," he complains.

Behind the reluctance, suggests Susan Greenhalgh, an expert on China's birth-control policy at the University of California, Irvine, lie wider considerations. The one-child policy is too deeply embedded in the post-Mao political consensus, she believes. "Advocating change of this ... involves political risks that, so far, no national political leader – or not enough of them – feel in a position to take."

Yicheng's time may now have come, however. Officials say the one-child policy will be maintained until 2010, but it is clear that they are studying alternatives.

"Now that the fertility rate is low, the government has expressed interest in researching directions for future adjustments in family-planning policy," says Yu. "Yicheng's experience should provide a good reference point for us."

U.S. Sends Warship Against Sea Pirates (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK -- A U.S. warship yesterday moved into waters off the coast of Somalia, where pirates have hijacked an empty World Food Program cargo ship.

DOJ_NMG_0137307

The MV Rozen was boarded by heavily armed pirates Sunday morning off the coast of Somalia's Puntland region, in the far north of the country.

Officials of the internationally backed interim Somali government said they contacted the U.S. military regional command, based in neighboring Djibouti, to request assistance.

"We have asked the U.S. Navy in the Red Sea ... to help us in the operation, and they told us they have started to move toward the ship," Col. Abdi Ali Hagaafe, police chief of the Bari region, told the Associated Press yesterday.

He said Somali police boats had spotted the hijacked ship, but were told to hang back out of concern for the safety of the ship's crew.

WFP officials said yesterday that the ship had already off-loaded 1,800 metric tons of food aid and equipment before the seizure, and was empty except for its crew of 12 Sri Lankans and Kenyans.

Negotiations for the release of the ship will likely be handled by Motaku Shipping Agency of Mombasa, Kenya, the contractor that owns the ship and employs its crew.

This is at least the third WFP ship to be hijacked by pirates off Somalia's 1,800-mile coastline, reflecting an increasingly difficult environment in which to deliver humanitarian aid to the desperately poor and unstable country on the Horn of Africa.

Such ships are by far the least expensive way to deliver aid to Somalia, a rugged country with few viable roads and airports capable of handling heavy cargo.

If the sea lanes become too dangerous, WFP officials have warned, they will be unable to deliver the hundreds of tons of food aid and other support they say are needed.

Another WFP-chartered ship, the Semlow, was seized and held for more than three months by hijackers in June 2005. It was released only after secret negotiations between the ship's owner and representatives of the pirates.

The United Nations has a clear policy of not negotiating with hijackers or kidnappers who seize U.N. staff, but officials acknowledge that member states or intermediary groups are free to engage such hijackers as they see fit.

James Morris, the outgoing executive director of the World Food Program, indicated in an interview with The Washington Times last week that the Semlow incident was resolved without WFP's direct knowledge.

"I couldn't tell you anything about that," he said. "That was handled by the ship's owners, and we didn't have anything to do with it."

Asked whether the agency maintained a deliberate "don't ask, don't tell" policy on dealing with pirates, Mr. Morris smiled and nodded slightly.

A Land Of Camel Milk And Honey (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

HARGEISA, Somaliland(?)

Here's the ethos of Somalia, as a former Mogadishu resident explained it to me: "If I use a dollar to buy food, then tomorrow I have nothing. If I use a dollar to buy a bullet, then I can eat every day."

That enterprising can-do spirit has turned most of Somalia into the poster child of a failed state, where you feel underdressed without an assault rifle. But wait! Here in the north of the carcass of Somalia is the breakaway would-be nation of Somaliland, and it is a remarkable success — for a country that doesn't exist.

The U.S. and other governments don't recognize Somaliland, so the people here get next to zero foreign aid. And when the "country" was formed in 1991, it had been mostly obliterated in a civil war and was a collection of ruins and land mines.

Yet the clans and elders here formed their own government, held free elections and even established an international airline. Relying on free markets and a general exhaustion with violence, the people of Somaliland embraced tranquillity and democracy and searched for ways to make a buck.

Walk down the streets of Hargeisa, the capital of Somaliland, and instead of gunmen you come across the thriving jewelry and financial market: scores of vendors, most of them women, are hawking millions of dollars worth of gold, precious stones and foreign currency out in the open air. (Don't try that at home!) Continue down the street, and you see that Hargeisa has police cars,

DHL service, cable television, orthodontists, a multitude of Internet cafes and traffic jams (including the horses and camels). There are public schools and hospitals — even a public library.

This is a conservative Muslim country, yet it is generally pro-American and tolerant. In the last election, more women voted than men. Women's groups are fighting the traditional practice of genital mutilation, administered to 97 percent of girls here.

The lesson of Somaliland is simple: the most important single determinant of a poor country's success is not how much aid it receives but how well it is run. If a country adheres to free markets and good political and economic governance, it will generate domestic and foreign investments that dwarf any amount of aid.

As President Dahir Rayale Kahin told me: "There is a proverb in our country: 'You can wash your body only with your own hand.' Outsiders can help, but the indigenous people must find a solution themselves."

One lesson is that Western countries should not only increase their financial aid but also their pressure for better governance. It's great to forgive debts, but not graft or antimarket policies.

The U.S. Millennium Challenge aid program, which promotes good governance, is a useful step in that direction. So is Tony Blair's program to battle corruption in Africa.

One useful kind of Western aid is simply support for civil-society groups that battle corruption. Here in Somaliland, the press is generally free, but the president recently tossed three journalists in prison for reporting on corruption in his family. If Western countries speak out strongly in their defense, that effort may be worth a few million dollars in aid by reducing corruption in the future.

More peer pressure from within Africa would also help. Other African countries should stand up to a racist like Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe with the same vigor they once used to stand up to white racist governments.

Another essential kind of foreign aid is supporting market-friendly economic policies, especially those that would nurture manufacturing industries.

In Mauritania, whose location in northwestern Africa would be ideal for exporting clothing to Europe and America, it takes 82 days to start a new business, which would then have to make 61 tax payments each year, requiring 696 hours to calculate and pay. And in the end, the tax would amount to 104.3 percent of the profit, according to the World Bank.

All that explains why you don't have any shirts in your closet labeled "Made in Mauritania."

So let's be more generous with foreign aid, giving more than 22 cents per $100 of national income to development assistance (the average for rich countries is 47 cents). But those of us who call for aid and debt forgiveness also need to push just as hard for recipient nations to improve their governance, for ultimately the best way for poor countries to prosper is to adopt pro-growth policies.

And in the meantime, it's time to recognize Somaliland as a nation. When a place does this well, we should hail it as a model, not shun it.

The Gall To Speak Her Mind (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Clearly, there is something about Ayaan Hirsi Ali that annoys, rankles, irritates. I am speaking as one who does not know Hirsi Ali -- the outspoken Dutch-Somali critic of Islam -- but as one who, while living in Europe, cannot seem to avoid meeting her detractors. Most recently I met a Dutch diplomat who positively glowered when her name was mentioned. As a member of the Dutch parliament, Hirsi Ali had, he complained, switched parties, talked out of turn and refused to toe whatever was the proper political line. Above all, it irritated him that she did not share his Dutch faith in political consensus.

For those who haven't encountered her name yet, suffice it to say that Hirsi Ali is a European of African descent with an almost American rags-to-riches life story. As a young woman, she escaped from her Somali family while en route to an arranged marriage in Canada, made her way to Holland, learned Dutch, attended college and eventually won a seat in the Dutch parliament. Along the way, she also made an intellectual journey -- beautifully described in her new book, "Infidel"-- from tribal Somalia, through fundamentalism, and into Western liberalism. After Sept. 11, 2001, horrified by some of the things Osama bin

Laden was saying, she reached for the Koran to confirm a hunch: "I hated to do it," she wrote, "because I knew that I would find bin Laden's quotations in there."

Partly as a result she lost her faith, concluding that the Koran spreads a culture that is "brutal, bigoted, fixated on controlling women, and harsh in war," and that should not be tolerated by European liberals. The conclusion led her into a series of controversies -- and to the murder of a Dutch filmmaker with whom she had co-produced a film about the mistreatment of Muslim women. The murderer was the son of Moroccan immigrants, born in Holland; he pinned a letter threatening Hirsi Ali onto his victim's chest. Ultimately, she left Holland for Washington, where she remains, ensconced at the American Enterprise Institute.

Yet even from that distance she continues to provoke Europeans, sometimes without saying anything at all. After a somewhat patronizing review of her first book -- in which British writer Timothy Garton Ash called her a "brave, outspoken, slightly simplistic Enlightenment fundamentalist" -- the French philosopher Pascal Bruckner came galloping to the defense of Hirsi Ali and the Enlightenment. Garton Ash counterattacked, and others joined what turned quickly into a wide-ranging debate (read the whole thing at http://www.signandsight.com) about reason, faith, multiculturalism and the integration of millions of Muslim immigrants into European culture.

Curiously, what seems to rankle Europeans most is the enthusiasm with which Hirsi Ali has adopted their own secularism and the fervor with which she has embraced their own Western values. Though this continent's intellectuals routinely disparage the pope as an irrelevant dinosaur, Hirsi Ali's rejection of religion in favor of reason, intellect and emancipation seems to make everyone nervous. Typical is the British feminist who complained that not only does Hirsi Ali paint "the whole of the Islamic world with one black brush," she also "paints the whole of the Western world with rosy tints," which is, of course, far more objectionable.

Others have compared her unfavorably to the Islamic scholar Tariq Ramadan, who argues that Islam can be made compatible with modern European democracy. He, it is said, offers a way forward for millions of pious European Muslims. By contrast, Hirsi Ali's rejection of religion in favor of Western secularism is said to be a form of integration that works for no one but herself.

I suppose this latter charge might be true. On the other hand, it might not be: Maybe "Infidel" will inspire a generation of Muslim teenagers to study, work hard, join the mainstream -- and then say what they think and spoil the political consensus. Either way, I'm not sure that the impulse to dismiss Hirsi Ali for her lack of utilitarian value reflects well on those who do it. Nor does the underlying assumption: that religious faith must be respected and defended on behalf of the dark-skinned immigrants who live among us, even though we natives no longer seem to require it.

But perhaps it is just a question of time. In America, the phenomenon of the flag-waving first-generation immigrant is familiar. In Europe, such a thing is unknown. Maybe once Europeans get used to the idea -- a Muslim immigrant who embraces Western culture with the excitement of the convert! -- they'll like Hirsi Ali better. And if they're lucky, others will follow in her footsteps.

When It Comes To Gay Rights, Is Cuba Inching Ahead Of USA? (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, February 27, 2007

HAVANA — Years before George W. Bush proclaimed his support for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriages in the United States, the ideologically rigid government of Fidel Castro made a big move in the opposite direction.

It sanctioned the production and viewing of Strawberry and Chocolate, an Academy Award-nominated film about the awkward friendship between a straight man and a gay man — and the homophobia they both had to battle.

Since this movie debuted in theaters here in the mid-1990s, the Cuban government's intolerance of homosexuals has given way to a more egalitarian treatment of gays and lesbians.

The public persecution of homosexuals has declined sharply. Two years ago, Cuba had its first gay film festival. Last year, the highest-rated show on Cuba's state-run television was a soap opera in which a married man fell in love with another man. And now this country is on the verge of enacting a law that gives same-sex couples some form of legal status.

DOJ_NMG_0137310

"We have to abolish any form of discrimination against those persons," said Ricardo Alarcon, president of Cuba's National Assembly. "We are trying to see how to do that, whether it should be to grant them the right to marry or to have same-sex unions."

Alarcon said he expects Cuba's communist government will soon enact a law to do one or the other. "We have to redefine the concept of marriage," he said. "Socialism should be a society that does not exclude anybody."

This awakening comes less than a year after President Bush renewed his call for a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage. "Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them, and changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure," Bush said in June.

Just one state, Massachusetts, allows gay marriages. And only four permit some form of same-sex union, which falls short of the definition of marriage but lets gay couples have some legal rights.

How ironic is this? While a country that successive U.S. governments have called a totalitarian state is moving toward expanding the rights of gays and lesbians, the president of the United States — the world's leading democracy — wants to restrict their rights.

Cuba is not the Netherlands, no gay mecca, but the attitudes of people in and out of government are undergoing dramatic change, maybe because a leading advocate of gay rights is Mariela Castro, niece of Fidel Castro, daughter of his brother, acting President Raul Castro, and head of the Cuban National Center for Sex Education.

It also might have to do with Cuba's ever-evolving strategy for fending off U.S. attempts to topple its Communist government and replace it with a U.S.-style democracy. A same-sex union or gay marriage law could make Cuba appear to be more tolerant than the USA.

"Because of our historical heritage, Cuban society has been intolerant of homosexuals," said Ruben Remigio Ferro, president of Cuba's Supreme Court. "But there has been a change in thinking. We are developing a program to educate people about sexual orientation. But it is not a problem that has been solved."

It is, however, a problem that Cuba's government seems determined to solve. "I'm part of this country, like it or not. And I have the right to work for its future," Diego, the gay character in Strawberry and Chocolate, told his straight friend.

Cuba's half-century tug of war with the United States is an ideological struggle. It is a contest between this country's socialist ideals and America's efforts to impose its will on this island nation. While this battle plays out largely on the world stage, its outcome will be determined by the trench warfare that Cuba wages for the hearts and minds of its people — those who are straight or gay.

Prison Doc: Terror Suspect OK For Trial (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, February 27, 2007

MIAMI -- Alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla has mild anxiety and personality disorders but is mentally able to stand trial, a prison psychologist said Monday in testimony that contradicted two defense experts.

Rodolfo Buigas, the supervisory forensic psychologist at the federal detention center in downtown Miami, rejected the defense experts' diagnosis that Padilla cannot help with his defense because he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder. Buigas said Padilla's anxiety and anti-social personality are minor problems.

"The nature and severity of the symptoms were not sufficient to interfere with some basic capabilities," Buigas told federal Judge Marcia Cooke, who must decide Padilla's mental fitness.

The question is crucial in determining whether Padilla, 36, and two co-defendants will stand trial in April on charges of being part of a North American terror support cell that provided finances, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three face up to life in prison if convicted.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen and former gang member, has been held in isolation during his 3 1/2 years in military confinement. He was arrested in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. Officials initially claimed he was on a mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, but the dirty-bomb allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla was designated an "enemy combatant" and imprisoned by the military without criminal charges.

Padilla has claimed in court filings that he was tortured at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., which officials have denied. Cooke ordered officials from the brig to appear at the hearing Monday.

Buigas testified that the affidavit Padilla signed alleging mistreatment at the brig was evidence of his mental competence.

One of Padilla's lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that he has never been able to get meaningful information from his client. Patel also said that Padilla seems to think his lawyers are part of a government plot against him.

"He has expounded the belief that we are part of the continuing interrogation," Patel said.

Psychologist Says Padilla Is Fit To Stand Trial (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 26 (AP) — Jose Padilla, who is accused of being an operative for Al Qaeda, has mild anxiety and personality disorders but is mentally able to stand trial, a prison psychologist said Monday in testimony that contradicted two defense experts.

The psychologist, Rodolfo Buigas of the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami, rejected the defense experts' diagnosis that Mr. Padilla could not help with his defense because he had post-traumatic stress disorder. Dr. Buigas said Mr. Padilla's anxiety and antisocial personality were minor problems.

"The nature and severity of the symptoms were not sufficient to interfere with some basic capabilities," Dr. Buigas told Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court, who is to decide Mr. Padilla's mental fitness.

The question is crucial in determining if Mr. Padilla, 36, and two co-defendants will stand trial in April on charges of being part of a North American terrorism support cell that provided finances, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three face up to life in prison if convicted.

Mr. Padilla, an American citizen, has been held in isolation during his three-and-a-half years in military confinement. He was arrested in May 2002 at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago. Officials initially said he was on a mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major American city, but those accusations are not part of the Miami case.

Mr. Padilla was designated an enemy combatant and imprisoned by the military without criminal charges.

He has said in court filings that he was tortured at the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., which officials have denied. Defense lawyers had planned to question brig officials on Tuesday, but Judge Cooke will not allow it. She said she wanted to limit the inquiry to Mr. Padilla's "present state of mind."

Dr. Buigas testified that the affidavit Mr. Padilla signed alleging mistreatment at the brig was evidence of his mental competence.

One of Mr. Padilla's lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that he had not been able to get meaningful information from his client. Mr. Patel also said Mr. Padilla seemed to think his lawyers were part of a government plot against him.

"He has expounded the belief that we are part of the continuing interrogation," Mr. Patel said.

Terror Allegations Detailed At Detention Hearing (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen

Chicago Tribune, February 27, 2007

Two Chicago-area cousins linked last week to a terrorism conspiracy traveled to Egypt in 2004 and planned to head to Pakistan for military training, federal prosecutors told a judge Monday.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, were seeking "training in jihad," prosecutors said during a detention hearing on whether Khaleel Ahmed should be kept in custody as he is transferred to Ohio to face the charges.

The trip was not a vacation as the Ahmeds have maintained, Assistant U.S. Atty. Vickie Peters said.

"It was intended as the first stop of a trip that would land him on the battlefield of Iraq fighting U.S. servicemen," Peters told U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown.

The cousins were indicted by an Ohio grand jury last week, charged with conspiracy to murder Americans outside the U.S., including troops in Iraq. A detention hearing for Zubair Ahmed, of North Chicago, was delayed until Monday.

The judge ruled that there was no way the defense could rebut the argument that Khaleel Ahmed is a danger to the community given the charges, and ordered him held. He is expected to be taken to Ohio to join several co-defendants in the case.

Three Toledo men—Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi, and Wassim Mazloum—were charged in the conspiracy last year and have pleaded not guilty.

Peters told the judge that Zubair Ahmed's father and El-Hindi were able to bring the cousins back from Egypt. El-Hindi believed they needed more training and allegedly was able to link the men to someone who could provide it.

He did not know that person—identified as "The Trainer" in the indictment—actually was working for the FBI. Peters said the Ahmeds traveled to Ohio, and Khaleel Ahmed allegedly was recorded saying he wanted weapons and sniper training.

Khaleel Ahmed's defense attorney, Brian Sieve, argued that his client is not a danger, is employed and has been living with his family. Ahmed has no criminal history and no drug use in his past, Sieve said.

The trip to Egypt allegedly took place more than two years ago, and the government was not eager to arrest him, he said. Instead the government is relying on the "emotional appeal of the charges" to detain Ahmed now, Sieve said.

"Mr. Khaleel Ahmed is barely mentioned in the indictment and certainly is not a key player in the conspiracy," he told the judge.

Judge Rejects New Trial For Albany Mosque Leaders (AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

ALBANY, N.Y. -- A federal judge has refused to grant a new trial for two leaders of an Albany mosque convicted of conspiring to support terrorism through money laundering in what turned out to be an FBI sting.

In a 61-page ruling, U.S. District Judge Thomas McAvoy refused to throw out the Oct. 10 convictions of Yassin Aref, who was imam at the mosque, and Mohammed Hossain, a pizzeria owner who attended Masjid as-Salam. Both men are in jail awaiting sentencing March 8.

The nature of the transactions _ where an FBI informant gave Hossain cash and got checks in return, with Aref acting as notary _ "render hollow" defense arguments that it was a legitimate business loan, according to McAvoy.

"There was ample evidence from which the jury could have inferred that Hossain entered into the money laundering scheme with full awareness of its illegality and the need for secrecy to allow the scheme to continue," McAvoy wrote. The transactions spanned eight months. The trial lasted four weeks.

FBI tapes showed informant Shahed Hussain, a Pakistani emigre businessman, telling the Albany men a few times that he sometimes imported arms and ammunition and mentioning that a shoulder-fired missile would be used by Muslim extremists against a Pakistani diplomat in New York City.

McAvoy rejected defense arguments that the Albany men didn't know illicit arms money was involved in their transactions, that they clearly didn't support the Pakistani terrorist group Jaish e-Mohammed, or that the case involved entrapment.

Defense attorneys argued the transactions were innocent _ that since Islam prohibits charging or receiving interest, Muslims often loan money to each other, and clerics serve as witnesses. Both Aref and Hossain said they didn't believe any talk about a missile in New York.

The judge acknowledged that when the informant first mentioned JEM, Hossain replied that he thought it was a singing group. He also noted that taken in isolation, some of the pizzeria owner's secretly taped statements "seem to express a lawful and pacifist attitude," but in context they are open to an opposite interpretation.

McAvoy likewise acknowledged Aref disavowing support for JEM objectives, but concluded that shouldn't change the jury's verdict.

"Whether Aref agreed with the goals of the CW (informant) or JEM is not the issue, but instead whether he knowingly or intentionally provided material support or resources to a group he knew was a foreign terrorist organization," McAvoy wrote. "The evidence was sufficient to support the jury's conclusion that he did."

Hossain, 52, a naturalized U.S. citizen from Bangladesh, was convicted Oct. 10 on all 27 charges against him, including three counts of conspiracy. The jury, which deliberated over four days, found Aref guilty of 10 of the 30 charges against him.

Aref, a 36-year-old Kurdish refugee from northern Iraq, was also found guilty of lying to FBI agents about having known a terrorist leader, Mullah Krekar, when Aref worked for a Kurdish political organization in Damascus, Syria.

An appeal to the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals is expected.

Assistant U.S. Attorney William Pericak said both men face 30 years under federal sentencing guidelines. Defense attorneys Terence Kindlon and Kevin Luibrand proposed much shorter sentences for the family men of only a few years or even no prison time.

UK Muslim Cleric Loses Deportation Appeal (FT)

By Nikki Tait

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Abu Qatada, the Islamic cleric who has been described as Osama bin Laden's "spiritual ambassador" in Europe, on Monday lost a legal battle against deportation from the UK to Jordan.

The Special Immigration Appeals Tribunal rejected his appeal. "We have concluded that there is no real risk of persecution of the appellant were he now to be returned with the safeguards and in the circumstances which now apply to him", it ruled

The Jordanian national's case had been seen as a test of the government's plan to deport alleged terror suspects even if it involves returning them to countries where human rights records are poor, by securing formal diplomatic agreements that their human rights will not be breached.

John Reid, Britain's home secretary, welcomed the SIAC decision. "We are also pleased that the court has recognized the value of memoranda of understanding," he added, referring to the rights protection pact.

"It is our firm belief that these agreements strike the right balance between allowing us to deport individuals who threaten the security of this country and safeguarding the rights of these individuals on their return," he added.

Abu Qatada has denied support for terrorist activities, and claimed that he would not face a fair trial if returned to Jordan, where he has already been convicted in his absence over a series of explosions in the 1990s.

Mr Qatada claimed asylum for himself, his wife and three children in 1993. He is one of a number of men made subject to anti-terror "control orders" - in effect, house arrest - by the British authorities after he was arrested and held in the Belmarsh high-security prison for two years without charge.

British Court Affirms Order To Deport Cleric To Jordan (NYT)

By Jane Perlez

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 — A British court ruled Monday that the government could deport a radical Islamic cleric to Jordan, setting the stage for the deportation of other foreign terrorism suspects in Britain to countries with poor human rights records.

The case of the cleric, Abu Qatada, which has been watched closely in Washington, is the first involving foreigners in Britain accused of posing threats to national security whom the government wants to deport rather than put on trial. Mr. Qatada, a Jordanian citizen of Palestinian background who has been living in Britain since 1994, has been convicted in absentia by a Jordanian court on bombing and conspiracy charges.

Mr. Qatada has been described by the British authorities as a spiritual guide to Al Qaeda. Tapes of his preaching encouraging violence against the West were found among the belongings of Mohamed Atta, the leader of the Sept. 11 hijackers, and he met with Richard C. Reid, the failed shoe bomber, the police say.

He is regarded as one of 10 foreign-born extremists who, the British government says, have helped to radicalize young British Muslims, encouraging them to carry out terrorism attacks.

The ruling on Monday by the Special Immigration Appeals Court rejected an appeal by Mr. Qatada that argued that the cleric would be subjected to torture while in prison in Jordan.

Mr. Qatada's lawyers said they would appeal the decision. Human rights advocates criticized the ruling on the ground that it set a precedent for allowing suspects to be turned over to countries where torture is used to extract evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0137317

A lawyer for Human Rights Watch, Julia Hall, said a memorandum of understanding between Britain and Jordan that torture would not be used on terrorism suspects returned to Jordan was an insufficient guarantee.

The British government has negotiated agreements that are intended to prevent the torture of suspects returned to their homeland with Lebanon and Libya as well as Jordan.

Ms. Hall said an August 2005 agreement between Britain and Jordan empowered a private Jordanian organization to monitor the conditions under which Mr. Qatada is held in prison once he returned to Jordan and to report on any abuses against him.

But Ms. Hall described the group assigned to monitor him, Al Adaleh Human Rights Center, as “a tiny organization, a local organization that has no influence with the government.”

In documents presented to a parliamentary committee, the British government said it was working with the Adaleh center, established in 2003, to improve its “capacity.”

Ms. Hall said the British government had “poured tens of thousands of pounds” to strengthen the fledgling group. But that investment would not overcome what Manfred Nowak, the United Nations special investigator on torture, found to be “institutional impunity” of the Jordanian intelligence services regarding torture, Ms. Hall said.

Mr. Nowak’s report on torture in Jordan was issued by the United Nations in January.

The British government praised the court decision, saying it upheld a policy to deport foreign terrorism suspects after the subway and bus terror attacks in 2005 that killed 56 people, including 4 bombers.

“We welcome the decision of the Special Immigration Appeals Commission that Abu Qatada presents a threat to our national security and can be deported,” said John Reid, the home secretary. “We are also pleased that the court has recognized the value of memoranda of understanding.”

The court concluded its ruling, saying, “There is no real risk of persecution of the appellant were he now to be returned with the safeguards.”

For the Bush administration, Mr. Qatada’s deportation to Jordan would mean easier access to a prisoner with potentially valuable information.

The issue of torture to extract evidence from terrorism suspects returned to their home countries for interrogation became an issue last year when the Canadian government found that Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen, who was sent to Syria by American officials because of suspected links to Al Qaeda, was tortured while in a Syrian prison for 10 months.

Mr. Arar was cleared of all terrorism charges by a Canadian commission of inquiry last year. The commission found that even though a Canadian diplomat visited Mr. Arar during his imprisonment in Syria, Mr. Arar was too afraid of retribution from prison officials to discuss the torture against him.

Cleric Faces Deportation To Jordan (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 -- A British court ruled Monday that Abu Qatada, a radical Islamic cleric believed to have close links to al-Qaeda, faces no risk of abuse if sent to Jordan, opening the way for his deportation.

"We have concluded that there is no real risk of persecution," a special immigration court said, noting that Jordan had signed a memorandum affirming that Abu Qatada's human rights would be upheld.

The case of Abu Qatada, whose real name is Omar Mahmoud Mohammed Othman, had been closely watched by rights groups and terrorism analysts. Past attempts to deport terrorism suspects to countries accused of torture had been blocked on human rights grounds.

The decision was lauded by British authorities, who have argued that radicals -- often fugitives from justice in their homelands -- have been using Britain as a base, knowing it would be difficult to deport them because of human rights laws.

The government had accused Abu Qatada of offering "spiritual advice and religious legitimacy" to extremists planning terrorist attacks. His taped sermons were found in the apartment in Hamburg used by several of the men involved in the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Home Secretary John Reid welcomed the court decision.

"It is our firm belief that these agreements strike the right balance between allowing us to deport individuals who threaten the security of this country and safeguarding the rights of these individuals on their return," Reid said, referring to the memorandum signed by Jordan.

"This is a very significant decision," said M.J. Gohel of the Asia-Pacific Foundation, a London-based security research organization. He said radicals and fugitives here are "abusing the privileges" of the government, even living on government subsidies, while they "propagate hate."

Gohel said Abu Qatada's "legacy for European terrorism is profound and perhaps everlasting -- practically a Who's Who list of terrorism had a connection to him."

Abu Qatada has been convicted twice in absentia in Jordan and sentenced to life imprisonment for plotting to bomb Jewish and American sites. He is on the U.S. government list of terrorism suspects. British authorities said he had links to Richard C. Reid, the British citizen who tried to blow up an American jetliner in December 2001 with explosives hidden in his shoes, and Zacarias Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to conspiring with the Sept. 11 attackers.

Abu Qatada was taken into custody in 2002 under emergency laws passed by the British government following the Sept. 11 attacks. British officials sought to deport him to Jordan, but because of laws that prohibit sending people to a country where they could face mistreatment or the death penalty, the government held Abu Qatada and 10 other men without charge.

The emergency anti-terrorism procedures led human rights activists to describe Belmarsh prison, where the men were detained, as "Britain's Guantanamo," a reference to the U.S. military detention facility in Cuba.

After spending 2 1/2 years in prison, Abu Qatada was freed but put under "control orders," a type of house arrest.

Abu Qatada, who has denied supporting terrorism, argues that he would not receive a fair trial in Jordan.

His attorney, Gareth Peirce, said she would appeal the ruling. She said there is no way to ensure that Jordan will uphold the agreement and "no sanction if it is breached."

Amnesty International issued a statement condemning the court decision, saying there is "ample evidence" that Abu Qatada now risks being subjected to repeated beatings, as well as "being burned with cigarettes, and being threatened with extreme violence including rape."

Canada's Move To Restore Rights (NYT)

The United States was not the only country to respond to the horror of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks with policies that went much too far in curtailing basic rights and civil liberties in the name of public safety. Now we see that a nation can regain its senses after calm reflection and begin to rein back such excesses, but that heartening news comes from Canada and not the United States.

Canada's Supreme Court has struck down a law that the government used to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely — employing secret evidence and not filing charges — while orders to deport them were reviewed. The law was actually passed in 1978, but was primarily employed to detain and deport foreign spies. After the 2001 attacks, the Canadian government began using it aggressively to hold terrorism suspects, claiming that it was an important tool for keeping Canada safe.

That is just the sort of argument the Bush administration used to ram the excesses of the Patriot Act and the 2006 Military Commissions Act through Congress, and offered as an excuse for other abusive policies, like President Bush's illegal wiretapping of international calls and e-mail.

The Canadian justices rejected their government's specious national security claim with a forceful 9-to-0 ruling that upheld every person's right to fair treatment. "The overarching principle of fundamental justice that applies here is this: before the state can detain people for significant periods of time, it must accord them a fair judicial process," Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin wrote.

The contrast with the United States could not be more disturbing. The Canadian court ruling came just days after a federal appeals court in Washington ruled that Congress could deny inmates of the Guantánamo Bay detention camp the ancient right to challenge their confinement in court. The 2006 military tribunals law revoked that right for a select group who had been designated "illegal enemy combatants" without a semblance of judicial process.

In late January, Canada created another unflattering contrast with United States policy when it offered a formal apology and financial compensation to Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who was a victim of Mr. Bush's decision to approve open-ended detentions, summary deportations and even torture after 9/11. Mr. Arar was detained in the United States and deported to Syria, where he was held for nearly a year and tortured.

Instead of apologizing to Mr. Arar, who was cleared of any connection to terrorism by a Canadian investigatory panel, Justice Department lawyers are fighting a lawsuit he has brought in this country, using their usual flimsy claim of state secrets. The Bush administration still refuses to remove Mr. Arar from its terrorist watch list.

The United States Supreme Court has ruled twice in favor of Guantánamo detainees on statutory grounds, but it has yet to address the profound constitutional issues presented by American practices, including the abuses Congress authorized when it passed the Military Commissions Act. Such a showdown does not seem far off, but Congress also has a duty to revoke or rewrite the laws that have been abused in the name of national security, starting with the 2006 tribunals law.

Lawmakers have only to look to the Canadian court for easy-to-follow directions back to the high ground on basic human rights and civil liberties.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Biological And Chemical Safety Nets (WSJ)

By Lawrence M. Wein

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

As Congress revisits homeland security, now is a good time to assess the government's progress in preventing or mitigating another, more catastrophic attack -- 100,000 or more deaths -- from biological, chemical or nuclear threats. Setting aside genetically engineered agents which may take years for terrorists to master, most experts agree on the three most dangerous bioterror agents: smallpox, anthrax and botulinum toxin.

Smallpox is the only agent of the three that results in a contagious disease; thankfully a smallpox attack appears to be the least likely due to the difficulty of obtaining the virus. Here we can point to one of the biggest homeland security achievements: the stockpiling of enough smallpox vaccine for every American, and the plans that are in place for widespread mass vaccination in the event of an attack.

It is true that the response is likely to be delayed, because there are only 40,000 first responders vaccinated nationwide (in contrast to the original government goal of 500,000). And an uncontrolled smallpox epidemic would be disastrous. Nevertheless, widespread mass vaccination (e.g., one million people vaccinated per day per afflicted city), coupled with the difficulty of initially infecting large numbers of people (the virus does not survive long in the air) and the slow speed of disease spread (each generation of the disease is approximately two weeks), precludes a situation in which tens of thousands of U.S. citizens will die.

What about anthrax? Late last year the government cancelled a $877 million contract with VaxGen Inc. for developing and stockpiling a new generation of anthrax vaccine suitable for civilian use. Consequently, the number of deaths in a large-scale aerosol anthrax attack would depend largely on the response, or lack thereof, during the first several days. For anthrax, the single most important post-attack capability is rapid antibiotic distribution.

Unfortunately, this has been left to individual cities and states, whose capabilities vary widely. Based on a suggestion I made along with Edward Kaplan of Yale, Washington, D.C. will, in the event of a large attack, use postal workers to deliver antibiotics door-to-door to minimize the mayhem and the time required for distribution. The federal government should roll out this program nationwide.

The third bioterror agent of grave concern is botulinum toxin, the deadliest substance known to humans. The obvious mode of attack is via the water or food supply; but fortunately, reservoirs are too large and their treatment systems too harsh to make it workable.

To their credit, after 9/11 the government and dairy industry intensified the heat pasteurization formula for milk -- the most obvious food target, because the toxin mixes well in liquids, and seven billion gallons of milk are consumed annually in the U.S. The inactivation efficacy of the new pasteurization formula is classified, however, so it is not clear whether this is sufficient to prevent a large number of casualties in the event. But a post-pasteurization attack would be inefficient for terrorists because milk is bottled soon after pasteurization.

That's the good news. The bad news is that the government has made no other perceptible move to prevent deliberate food contamination. Just as the 1990 Clean Air Act led to consequence analyses to estimate the number of casualties from an accident at chemical facilities, legislation is now required to estimate the number of casualties from a terrorist attack at food and beverage facilities. This undertaking would allow for an effective allocation of counterterrorism resources -- such as security upgrades, process changes (as in the dairy industry), and testing for botulinum toxin during food production -- targeted at the food facilities, and perhaps their upstream supply chains, that could generate a huge death toll if attacked.

Chemical security is not much farther along than food security. We do know which specific facilities -- the ones that store or produce heavier-than-air chemicals that can travel 10 to 20 miles -- could generate the most casualties if attacked. And we know there are 700 plants nationwide that, if attacked, could result in the death or serious injury of over 100,000 people. But the only progress toward prevention thus far are voluntary security investments made by the private sector.

Fences and background checks on workers might deter or thwart an attack by an unsophisticated or under-resourced terrorist group. But a determined group can compromise any chemical facility or shipment that it puts its mind to. Consequently, what is needed is a redesign of the processes or products of the most dangerous facilities, such as replacing hydrofluoric acid with sulfuric acid or modified hydrofluoric acid (neither of which pose nearly as dangerous a risk) in the alkylation process at large oil refineries in urban areas, where immense amounts of this acid are currently stored.

Although both houses of Congress last autumn produced chemical security bills with some teeth, there was no vote. Rather, a watered-down version was attached as a rider to the Department of Homeland Security's budget appropriation, which does not require high-risk facilities such as oil refineries to consider or use safer chemicals or processes.

Both houses of Congress are currently considering a chemical plant security bill. But it is not yet clear whether it will improve real security by mandating process changes, or merely produce a façade in the form of fences and background checks.

The biggest chemical threat may be the transport of the 100,000 90-ton tank cars containing toxic gases such as chlorine or anhydrous ammonia that are shipped each year in the U.S. Attacks on these well-marked cars in a densely populated area could also harm 100,000 people.

Tank cars cannot currently be designed to weather a suicide attack or a bombing. We therefore need to ban these hazardous shipments through populated areas, and not simply require their continuous tracking, as the Department of Homeland Security recently proposed. Incredibly, when Washington attempted to block hazardous rail shipments through its municipality, the federal government sided with the rail industry in court and had the ban overturned.

The worst-case scenario is a nuclear weapon detonated in a major U.S. city. The most effective way to deal with this threat is to secure all the nuclear weapons and materials in the former Soviet Union. This has not been done; hence we must resort to keeping this material from entering the country.

A second-line-of-defense program has put in place detection systems at some critical roads leading out of the former Soviet Union. But the Bush administration's approach to preventing nuclear weapons and materials from coming through our ports has been dismal -- essentially amounting to radiation testing of shipping containers that are flagged by the deeply flawed targeting system of U.S. Customs.

Radiation testing and two-dimensional scanning (which detects heavy-metal shielding) of all U.S.-bound containers, and human analysis of enough of these scans to provide a deterrent effect, is possible without increasing port congestion. It should be undertaken immediately at overseas ports. True, President Bush signed the Safe Port Act last October, which requires radiation testing at 22 domestic ports. But terrorists can detonate a bomb remotely at a U.S. port and shield a weapon's emissions with heavy material. Thus the law provides only the illusion of security.

We are today safer from a smallpox or a botulinum-in-milk attack, but only marginally safer from an anthrax, botulinum-in-food, chemical or nuclear attack. Most of the cost to secure the latter three scenarios can be passed on to consumers, but the federal government needs to lead the way.

Let us hope that during the next five years, these gaping holes are fixed so that terrorists are forced to use much less dangerous methods.

EDITORIAL Drop The 'L.A. 8' Case (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

FOR TWO DECADES, the U.S. government has been trying to deport two Palestinians living in Southern California — middle-aged men who have been lawful permanent residents of this country for three decades. The Department of Homeland Security, which must soon make a decision on the matter, should drop the case and allow Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh to continue to live their American lives.

The two men are the remnant, for legal purposes, of the "L.A. 8." That was the term used to describe seven Palestinian men and a Kenyan woman who were arrested at gunpoint at their homes in 1987 for their alleged association with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, or PFLP, a Marxist-Leninist faction of the Palestine Liberation Organization. The government began proceedings to deport them on the theory that the faction advocated "world communism through written or printed publications."

Hamide and Shehadeh were originally slated for deportation under the McCarran-Walter Act, a noxious Cold War law that was substantially overturned in 1988. "The government is trying to stifle certain ideas from entering our society through certain aliens through its immigration power," wrote the federal judge at the time.

Undaunted, the government filed charges against Hamide and Shehadeh, accusing them of ties with "an organization that advocates or teaches the duty or necessity or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of government officials." The deportation effort was later justified under a provision of the Patriot Act enacted after 9/11.

Throughout the tortuous litigation, the government argued that the L.A. 8 provided support that found its way to the PFLP and its terrorist activities, while the members of the L.A. 8 insisted that they raised funds only for the building of hospitals and other humanitarian purposes.

In terminating the deportation proceedings last month, federal immigration Judge Bruce J. Einhorn embraced neither of these conflicting narratives. Instead, he cited the government's refusal to comply with his order seeking any evidence that had the potential to exonerate the men and emphasized that the case had lingered so long as to violate due process. He referred to the case as "a festering wound" on Hamide and Shehadeh and said it was "an embarrassment to the rule of law."

The judge's prose may be purple, but his conclusion is correct. Hamide and Shehadeh are well-integrated members of the community. They have not been convicted of any crime. The government's unrelenting effort to deport them smacks of bureaucratic face-saving. Einhorn has offered the government a graceful exit from this litigation — and the government should take it.

Hundreds Scramble To Beat Deadline For Filing Katrina Claim (AP)

By Michael Kunzelman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

Hundreds of residents scrambled Monday to beat a deadline for filing court claims against the federal government and U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for damage resulting from the failure of levees and flood walls following Hurricane Katrina.

The corps says Thursday at 4 p.m. is the deadline for it to receive the Katrina litigation claims at its Uptown office. Roughly 30,000 residents already had filed a claim as of late last week, but Thursday's deadline surprised many more people whose homes and businesses were damaged or destroyed in the flooding following the storm.

On Friday, lawyers representing thousands of plaintiffs accused federal officials of reneging on an agreement to set Aug. 29, 2007 - the two-year anniversary of Katrina - as the deadline for claims to be filed or else risk exclusion from class-action litigation.

Joe Bruno, one of the plaintiffs' attorneys, said the U.S. Department of Justice stunned his legal team this week by informing them that certain claims must be filed by this week, 18 months after the storm.

On Monday, Bruno asked a federal judge to consider postponing the deadline until after the court decides whether to certify a class action against the corps and federal government.

Bruno asked U.S. District Judge Stanwood Duval to hold a hearing on his request "because there is much anguish and uncertainty among all Hurricane Katrina victims concerning their rights."

"The court can bring a sense of calm by deciding plaintiffs motion right away," Bruno wrote.

Duval didn't immediately rule on Bruno's request.

On Monday, meanwhile, a steady procession of people stopped by the corps' Leake Avenue office to drop off their claims. Charles Brown, 47, said he didn't know about the deadline until Sunday.

"A lot of people aren't going to get their claims in," said Brown, who has been living in a government-issued trailer since his Gentilly home was damaged by the Aug. 29, 2005 storm.

To prove that she filed a claim on her mother's behalf, Janet Long, 45, used the camera in her cellular phone to photograph herself inserting the form in the drop box.

"It's aggravating, but it's worth it," said Long, whose mother's home in the city's Lakeview neighborhood was flooded with seven feet of water after the levees failed.

The corps' drop box will be open this week from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., through Thursday afternoon. "They are taking a chance if they put it in the mailbox because it may not get here in time," corps spokesman Vic Harris said.

The failure of the levees has spawned a mountain of litigation in Louisiana.

Earlier this month, a legal team led by Bruno sued the federal government and Army Corps of Engineers in a lawsuit that alleges flooding during Katrina was the fault of a corps decision to allow dredging of the 17th Street Canal.

Also this month, Duval allowed to go forward a suit charging the corps with liability for flooding of eastern New Orleans and St. Bernard Parish from the Mississippi River-Gulf Outlet. The ship channel, maintained by the corps, connects New Orleans' inner harbor with the Gulf of Mexico.

WAR NEWS:

Cheney Unhurt In Blast Outside Afghan Base (CNN/AP)

CNN/AP, February 27, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) -- A suicide bomber killed 19 people and wounded 11 outside the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan on Tuesday during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, officials said. The Taliban claimed responsibility and said Cheney was the target.

The blast happened near the first security gate outside the base at Bagram, said Khoja Mohammad Qasim Sayedi, chief of the province's public health department. Gov. Abdul Jabar Taqwa said "18 to 20 dead bodies" lay on the ground after the blast.

Maj. William Mitchell said it did not appear the explosion was intended as a threat to the vice president.

"He wasn't near the site of the explosion," Mitchell said. "He was safely within the base at the time of the explosion."

However, a purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said Cheney was the target of the attack.

"We knew that Dick Cheney would be staying inside the base," Ahmadi told The Associated Press by telephone. "The attacker was trying to reach Cheney."

Cheney traveled to Afghanistan after a stop in Pakistan.

On Monday, Cheney -- underscoring growing alarm in the West at how militants have regained ground in Afghanistan and Pakistan -- sought Pakistani aid to help counter al Qaeda's efforts to regroup, officials said.

However, Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf insisted his forces have already "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory -- and insisted that other allies also shoulder responsibility in the U.S.-led war on terrorism.

Cheney, accompanied by CIA deputy director Steve Kappes, made an unannounced stop in Pakistan Monday en route to Afghanistan.

The vice president made no public comment in Pakistan, but a senior aide to Musharraf said they held detailed talks, including a one-on-one lunch of more than an hour.

"Cheney expressed U.S. apprehensions of regrouping of al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," Musharraf's office said.

He also "expressed serious U.S. concerns on the intelligence being picked up of an impending Taliban and al Qaeda 'spring offensive' against allied forces in Afghanistan," the statement said.

The Musharraf aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he is not an official spokesman, said the two men "exchanged ideas and suggestions" on improving cooperation against terrorism. However, he said Cheney made no specific demands.

U.S. and British officials have praised Pakistan publicly for its role in arresting al Qaeda suspects after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States and for a string of bloody operations against militants along the border.

Five years after the Taliban's ouster from power, however, militants have regained ground in Afghanistan and Pakistan.

There are signs of U.S. and NATO frustration at Musharraf's limited success in disrupting Pakistan-based Taliban fighters, who are expected to step up raids into Afghanistan in coming months, and in trapping Taliban and al Qaeda leaders suspected of holing up in tribal areas of Pakistan near the border.

The Bush administration wants Musharraf to be more aggressive in hunting al Qaeda operatives, and has raised the possibility that the U.S. Congress could cut aid to Pakistan unless it takes tougher steps.

Musharraf told Cheney that Pakistan "has done the maximum in the fight against terrorism and "joint efforts" were needed if the fight was to succeed.

"The president emphasized that most of the Taliban activities originated from Afghanistan and the solution of the issue also lies within that country," his office said. The more than 50,000 NATO and U.S. troops in Afghanistan as well as Afghan security forces also share responsibility for policing the border, Musharraf added.

Cheney and Karzai are expected to talk about security along the Afghan-Pakistan border and the expected increase in violence by militants as spring thaws mountain snows.

The United States has 27,000 troops in Afghanistan. About 14,000 are part of the 35,000-member NATO force commanded by U.S. Gen. Dan McNeill. At Bagram, Cheney met with McNeill and Maj. Gen. David M. Rodriguez -- the commander of U.S. troops -- to discuss military operations, the security situation and reconstruction, said Maj. William G. Mitchell, a U.S. military spokesman.

Blast Occurs While Cheney Visits (LAT)

By Shafiqullah Azimi And Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN — Suspected insurgents set off a blast early today outside the main U.S. base in Afghanistan while Vice President Dick Cheney was visiting, killing as many as 20 people, officials said.

Cheney was not injured in the explosion outside Bagram air base, north of Kabul, the capital, the U.S. military said.

But the blast was seen as a brazen effort on the part of insurgents to show they could cause disruption during Cheney's visit, and strike close to a heavily fortified area.

The vice president arrived at Bagram on Monday night after a brief, unscheduled stop in Pakistan to meet with President Pervez Musharraf.

News agencies cited local Afghan authorities as saying the explosion occurred near the outermost gate of the base, which is the principal entrance. Several more inner gates and checkpoints separate the area from the main part of the installation, which is a former Soviet military base.

Just outside the gate lies a makeshift market with a cluster of small, ramshackle shops, some of them housed in metal shipping containers. At midmorning, the time of the blast, the area is usually crowded with merchants and shoppers.

The governor of Bagram, Abdul Jabar Taqwa, was quoted by the Associated Press as saying as many as 20 bodies were on the ground after the explosion. Earlier, witnesses had put the death toll much lower.

Cheney had planned to travel to Kabul by military helicopter to meet with Afghan President Hamid Karzai on Monday evening, but a snowstorm made it too dangerous to fly.

The vice president instead met with senior U.S. military officials and breakfasted this morning with American troops at the Bagram base.

A meeting with Karzai was to be held today in the capital.

Officials in Cheney's entourage said earlier that he intended to consult with the Afghan leader about the spring offensive that Taliban fighters are expected to mount in coming weeks against allied troops.

Cheney Warns Pakistan To Act Against Terrorists (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Just hours after Vice President Dick Cheney delivered a stiff private message to President Pervez Musharraf in Pakistan, the Pakistani government lashed out Monday with a series of statements insisting that "Pakistan does not accept dictation from any side or any source."

The unusual outburst, later toned down, revealed the depth of tensions between General Musharraf and Washington over what administration officials say have been inadequate efforts by Pakistan in combating Al Qaeda and the Taliban.

By the time of the Pakistani response, Mr. Cheney had left Pakistan to make a second secret trip, this time across the border to Afghanistan, where a meeting with President Hamid Karzai was suddenly delayed. American officials said a snowstorm prevented helicopter flights between Kabul and Bagram Air Base, where Mr. Cheney had landed, and neither leader seemed inclined to take a risky drive to meet the other.

Mr. Cheney's trip to Pakistan was shrouded in unusual secrecy. In trips to Pakistan last year, President Bush and Secretary State Condoleezza Rice announced their plans days in advance, and reporters filed articles on their visits as soon as they landed. But Mr. Cheney's traveling press pool was sworn to secrecy, and allowed to report only the barest details just before he left.

News organizations that knew of Mr. Cheney's travels, including The New York Times, were asked to withhold any mention of the trip until he had left Pakistan. That appeared to be a reflection of growing concern about the strength of Qaeda and Taliban forces in the area, and continuing questions about the loyalties of Mr. Musharraf's own intelligence services.

The White House would say little on Monday about the message Mr. Cheney was sent to deliver, though it did not deny reports that it included a tough warning that American aid to Pakistan could be in jeopardy. Democrats have threatened to link aid to Pakistan to its effectiveness in combating both Al Qaeda and the Taliban. Pakistan's response, delivered by a Foreign Ministry spokesman, expressed concern about "proposed discriminatory legislation" in Congress to curb the aid.

The sensitivities of Mr. Cheney's trip were particularly evident as the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, parried detailed questions about the vice president's message to Pakistan, a country that Mr. Bush has hailed as a close American ally.

Referring to Mr. Cheney, Mr. Snow said that "the precise nature of his comments and the tenor of comments to the president would be the sort of things that would be confidential," and then reaffirmed Mr. Bush's confidence that General Musharraf was committed to fighting terrorism.

When asked about comments by senior administration officials who fear that General Musharraf's peace plan with tribal leaders in the area bordering Afghanistan has allowed Qaeda and Taliban forces to move with more impunity in that region, Mr. Snow said: "We're often asked to give out report cards on other heads of state. I'm not going to play."

Mr. Cheney's trip was one of a series to Pakistan by senior members of the administration, part of what administration officials have said is a plan by the Bush administration to keep the pressure on General Musharraf. To some outside analysts, that is a sign of increasing concern that American efforts to coax along the sometimes prickly Pakistani leader has hit its limits.

"There is a growing consensus that our Pakistan policy is not working," said Derek Chollet, a fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington who estimates that over the past five years the United States has sent $10 billion in aid to Pakistan — and perhaps as much in covert funds.

Mr. Musharraf alluded to those payments in his recently published memoir, in which he wrote, "Those who habitually accuse us of 'not doing enough' in the war on terror should simply ask the C.I.A. how much prize money it has paid to the government of Pakistan." When asked about that assertion, C.I.A. officials have declined to answer.

Mr. Cheney's trip to Pakistan and then to Afghanistan appeared to be part of an effort to resolve a continuing dispute between the two countries over who is more responsible for the failure to stop cross-border attacks. Mr. Musharraf and Mr. Karzai have made no secret of their mutual dislike. President Bush held a dinner with the two men in Washington last fall, in hopes of encouraging them to work together. As soon as the two leaders returned to their respective capitals, however, the sniping resumed.

A particular source of concern is Mr. Musharraf's peace accord giving tribal leaders greater sovereignty — a deal that he has assured Mr. Bush would not diminish Pakistan's commitment to fighting extremists. Mr. Bush noted in September that Mr. Musharraf had looked him "in the eye" and said, "There won't be a Taliban and won't be Al Qaeda." Now, American officials contend those groups have gained ground.

Mr. Cheney traveled with the deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency, Stephen R. Kappes, an indication that the conversation probably included discussion of American intelligence agency contentions that Qaeda camps have been reconstituted along the border with Afghanistan.

Speaking in Islamabad on Monday, Pakistani officials acknowledged that Mr. Cheney had expressed concern about the regrouping of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas and that he had called for concerted efforts in countering the threat. Then, at a news briefing, the Pakistani Foreign Ministry protested the "dictation" that the country was being offered, a clear reference to Mr. Cheney's visit. Later in the day the ministry toned down its comments, saying that Mr. Cheney had "shared U.S. concerns and assessments in the context of intelligence and security cooperation."

American officials did not explain the extraordinary secrecy surrounding Mr. Cheney's visit to Pakistan, a country the administration has cast as a stable nation moving gradually toward democracy. Mr. Cheney's aides told The Times and other news organizations that the Secret Service had imposed the requirement that there be no mention of his trip until he had left Pakistan.

Mark Silva of the Chicago Tribune, who is traveling as the sole newspaper "pool" reporter with Mr. Cheney, reported in an e-mail message: "These all were explained as security measures for the protection of the vice president, and ostensibly us as well. There was no indication of any particular threat that would lead to these measures."

Such caution is not unprecedented. In 2000, President Clinton flew into Islamabad on an unmarked Air Force plane rather than on Air Force One. President Bush's trip last year was marked with siege-like security and unusual maneuvers during takeoff.

Insurgent Activity Spurs Cheney Trip To Pakistan (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Griff Witte

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The White House signaled its growing impatience with Pakistan's failure to crack down on Islamic extremists, dispatching Vice President Cheney for an unannounced visit yesterday to pressure President Pervez Musharraf to do more against a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters.

Following visits to Japan and Australia last week, Cheney stopped off in Islamabad for consultations with Musharraf before flying on to Bagram air base in Afghanistan. His four-hour presence in Pakistan, kept secret until after he left the country, was perhaps the strongest indication of administration concern over the presence of radical Islamic fighters in the unruly border area between the two South Asian countries.

While Iraq continues to consume the administration's attention, U.S. officials are increasingly worried that the Taliban is making a comeback in Afghanistan, using parts of Pakistan to stage cross-border raids and undermine the authority of Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Officials also fear that al-Qaeda is becoming more active in Pakistani tribal areas close to the border and that Musharraf has been insufficiently aggressive about taking action -- despite promises to President Bush and other senior officials that he would address the situation.

"We don't want Afghanistan to return to being -- nor the border provinces in Pakistan to become -- safe havens for al-Qaeda, where they can plan attacks on the United States and other Western countries," said one senior administration official who discussed Cheney's mission on the condition of anonymity.

Administration officials declined to offer many details of the vice president's trip, which has been in the works for several weeks, but privately officials have said they would like to see Musharraf do more.

The administration is also under new pressure on Capitol Hill, where Democrats have pushed through legislation in the House that would end U.S. military assistance to Islamabad unless Bush certifies that the Pakistani government is making all possible efforts to curtail Taliban activity in Pakistan. The president has proposed $785 million in assistance to Pakistan next year, including $300 million in military aid.

While the fate of such legislation in the Senate is uncertain, administration officials are using the prospect of congressional intervention as leverage to encourage Islamabad to crack down on militants. While Musharraf has deployed tens of thousands of troops to the border area and vowed action against terrorists, his hold on power also depends on the support of military and intelligence officials more sympathetic to Islamic extremists.

"Cheney doesn't go someplace unless it's very serious," said Barnett R. Rubin, a New York University scholar of South Asia who has been critical of the Musharraf government. "The government of Pakistan is paralyzed, and Cheney is there to give them a shove."

Mahmud Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States, said Cheney and Musharraf had "a pleasant meeting," and he rejected the idea that the vice president came down hard on Pakistan's counterterrorism record.

"They looked at ways and means that the upcoming spring Taliban offensive can be defeated, and they came to some conclusions," Durrani said. "They agreed on the need to work jointly."

Durrani said that a representative from Pakistan's intelligence service was present to meet with counterparts from the CIA and that any intelligence offered by the United States would be taken seriously. "Pakistan has always said, 'If you know something, tell us,' " he said. "If you tell us, we take action. The perception that Pakistan is staying back and ignoring things, that's not right."

Britain announced yesterday that it is sending 1,400 more troops to Afghanistan, where NATO has placed about 33,000 soldiers to help the Karzai government secure the country. The move follows a recent announcement from the Bush administration that it is sending an additional 3,200 U.S. troops to help blunt the Taliban's expected spring offensive.

Cheney was accompanied on his trip to Islamabad by Stephen R. Kappes, deputy director of the CIA and a Middle East expert who has served in Pakistan. Intelligence officials said Kappes's presence was a sign of U.S. interest in increasing intelligence operations with Pakistan. They said there are indications that the al-Qaeda leadership, though moving constantly, has resumed training of outsiders in some areas of Pakistan, though it is nowhere near the extent that occurred in Afghanistan under the Taliban.

Afghan officials have long accused Pakistan of feeding the Taliban insurgency. Musharraf's government, many Afghan officials believe, has either looked the other way or covertly supported the Taliban's cause as a way to capture U.S. aid, gaining strategic leverage in Pakistan's competition with India and undermining Karzai's government in Kabul.

Musharraf and Karzai, both U.S. allies, have a stormy relationship, with deep mistrust on both sides. Cheney was supposed to meet with Karzai in Afghanistan yesterday, but the meeting was postponed, the vice president's office said.

Cheney Pressures Musharraf On Taliban (FT)

By Farhan Bokhari And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Dick Cheney, US vice-president, on Monday flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan to convey US concerns over a resurgence of the Taliban and al-Qaeda and to impress on General Pervez Musharraf, Pakistan's military ruler, the need for tougher action before an expected spring offensive by militants.

With the stability of Afghanistan's weak central government at stake, strains are emerging in the US relationship with Gen Musharraf.

Analysts said Mr Cheney was in a good position to gain leverage for stronger military co-operation by using threats by Democrats in the US Congress to cut assistance to Pakistan.

Statements from Washington and Islamabad reflected the US desire to increase pressure on Gen Musharraf while not endangering the relationship.

"The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight al-Qaeda but, having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done," said Tony Snow, White House spokesman.

Western diplomats in Islamabad said the US message was driven mainly by recent intelligence reports concluding that al-Qaeda, forced out of Afghanistan by US forces in 2001, was regrouping in Pakistan's Waziristan tribal region along the Afghan border following a controversial agreement made by Gen Musharraf with tribal leaders last year.

DOJ_NMG_0137326

A diplomat commented: “This agreement has not helped the US. Last year alone there were well over 100 suicide attacks in Afghanistan. The message from the vice-president was therefore blunt.”

Separately, Margaret Beckett, UK foreign secretary, also met Gen Musharraf to discuss securing the border with Afghanistan. Des Browne, UK defence secretary, later confirmed to parliament that Britain would send 1,400 more troops to Afghanistan to join the 6,300 already there.

Mr Cheney’s visits to two key US allies were not previously announced. However, his office said talks with Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, were delayed because of bad weather on arrival at Bagram air base.

Gen Musharraf’s office said Mr Cheney praised Pakistan’s contribution to the war against terror but also “expressed US apprehensions of regrouping of al-Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat”. Mr Cheney was said to have expressed “serious concern” over the impending offensive by the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan.

Tariq Fatemi, a former senior Pakistani diplomat, said: “One key contradiction is that Gen Musharraf had appeared unwilling to completely marginalise the Taliban and al-Qaeda while still wanting to satisfy the US. This is not possible anymore.”

In Washington, Alexis Debat, analyst with the Nixon Center think-tank, said it was likely Mr Cheney had offered Pakistan more military assistance, such as training with US forces, to operate in such a hostile environment as Waziristan, or even joint operations.

Cheney Visit Turns Up Heat On Pakistan (LAT)

By Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, PAKISTAN — Vice President Dick Cheney's unannounced visit to this capital Monday was the latest and most visible sign of renewed American pressure on President Pervez Musharraf to crack down on Islamic militants in Pakistan's lawless tribal areas bordering Afghanistan.

But complex domestic considerations in Pakistan, and a keen awareness on Musharraf's part that the Bush administration sees no palatable alternative to his leadership, diminish the prospect of any dramatic Pakistani move against the militants, diplomats and analysts said.

"There is only so far that he is prepared to go," said Rahul Roy-Chaudhury of the International Institute for Strategic Studies, a leading British think tank on security matters. "Some of this is dictated by the [Pakistani] military's view of things, and some by the fact that this is not politically popular in large parts of Pakistan."

Cheney became the latest high-ranking U.S. official to press Musharraf to rein in what American officials characterize as a volatile mix of homegrown militant groups, Taliban strategists and Al Qaeda elements, all operating with increasing freedom in the tribal zones along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

The issue has been central to U.S.-Pakistani relations since the Sept. 11 attacks, but seldom has the Bush administration been as blunt or as public in its pressure on Musharraf, a key ally in the region. The stepped-up pressure also comes as Congress threatens to cut aid to Pakistan unless it sees more concrete results from the nation in combating militants' cross-border infiltration of Afghanistan.

Neither Cheney nor Musharraf spoke publicly before or after their meeting at the presidential palace, which lasted more than two hours. They appeared before cameras for a handshake only.

In a written statement, however, the Pakistani leader's office acknowledged that Musharraf had come under at least indirect criticism. Cheney "expressed U.S. apprehensions of [the] regrouping of Al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," the statement said.

Cheney was accompanied by Stephen Kappes, the deputy CIA director, whose presence underscored U.S. concern over intelligence assessments that indicate a deteriorating situation in the tribal areas.

For his part, Musharraf hewed to what has become his government's scripted reply to such concerns: that Pakistan already is doing all it can, and that the burden of confronting the Taliban and its allies must be shared by others, including Afghanistan and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The Pakistani president told Cheney that the international community was "collectively responsible for defeating the scourge of terrorism," adding that "Pakistan has done the maximum," the government statement said.

And in a protest against any move to cut aid to his government, the fifth-largest recipient of U.S. foreign assistance, Musharraf decried "proposed discriminatory legislation regarding U.S. aid to Pakistan," said the Pakistani statement.

The New York Times reported Monday that President Bush intended to warn Musharraf that congressional Democrats might seek such cuts in response to the Pakistani leader's perceived reluctance to confront the militant threat.

In Washington, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said, "The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight Al Qaeda, but having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done."

Much of the recent Western criticism of Musharraf has centered on a deal struck last year with tribal elders in the North Waziristan area, under which Pakistani troops pulled back to their barracks in exchange for a pledge that the Taliban and other insurgents would not use the area as a springboard for attacks against NATO forces. Coalition military officials say cross-border attacks have increased sharply in the wake of the pact.

But Musharraf, whose government is reported to be contemplating a similar deal in the Bajur tribal agency, defended the Waziristan accord, telling Cheney that economic incentives and political moves were the best way to counter insurgents' influence in the tribal areas.

Pakistani Foreign Minister Mian Khursheed Mehmood Kasuri, meanwhile, made similar arguments after a meeting Monday with British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett.

Kasuri declared that Pakistan was being criticized unfairly, and blamed NATO and Afghan troops for failing to halt cross-border infiltration.

"We've got 1,000 checkposts; they've only got 100," he said.

Several Western diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, said there was a gap between Western expectations and what Musharraf was in a position to accomplish.

Pakistan has been hit by a spate of suicide bombings that began after a government air raid aimed at Islamic militants in the tribal areas late last year. Some analysts suggested that Musharraf risked being blamed if such raids triggered a backlash in Pakistani towns and cities.

"If he goes back to a more robust military intervention, the view here will be that he is toeing the American line," said Talat Masood, a retired Pakistani general. "I think it will give rise to a lot of spillover effect, in terms of violence and suicide bombings."

And Musharraf is unlikely to let his own domestic political agenda be dictated by Washington, Roy-Chaudhury said.

"We've seen a ratcheting up of pressure on Musharraf, certainly, but his No. 1 priority is that this is an election year, and he wants to stay in power," he said.

Cheney Urges Pakistan To Help Fight Terrorism (USAT)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Vice President Cheney warned Monday that al-Qaeda was regrouping in Pakistan's remote tribal areas and sought President Pervez Musharraf's help in a push against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants, Musharraf's office said. Musharraf told Cheney, who made an unannounced stop in Islamabad, that Pakistan "has done the maximum" in the fight against terrorism.

The Bush administration has raised the possibility of cutting aid to Pakistan unless tougher steps are taken. "There's a lot more that needs to be done," White House spokesman Tony Snow said in Washington.

After his visit to Pakistan, Cheney flew to Afghanistan. He had planned a meeting with President Hamid Karzai, but it was canceled because of bad weather.

In London, British Defense Secretary Des Browne announced the deployment of 1,400 additional troops to Afghanistan, bringing British troop levels to 7,700. The United States has about 27,000 troops there.

U.N. court acquits Serbia in genocide

The United Nations' highest court acquitted Serbia of direct responsibility for genocide in Bosnia in the 1990s but ruled that it should have prevented the1995 slaughter of Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica. The International Court of Justice in The Hague, Netherlands, found that Serbia didn't control the Bosnian Serb army or the paramilitary units that massacred more than 7,000 Bosnian Muslim men and boys. The Bosnian Serb army captured the U.N.-protected Srebrenica enclave in July 1995. The court ordered Serbia to hand over suspects for trial by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

Madrid bombing suspect denies confession

An Egyptian accused of being a mastermind of the Madrid train bombings denied that his voice is the one heard in a wiretapped phone conversation in which prosecutors say he claimed the attacks were his idea.

"I'm not the person speaking," Rabei Osman said as he testified a second time in the trial of 29 suspects. They are accused in the March 2004 attacks, which killed 191 people and wounded more than 1,800. Italian prosecutors say it is Osman telling an associate in Italy, "I'm the thread to Madrid; it's my work."

Cheney Presses Musharraf Over Border Control (WT/AP)

By Stephen Graham

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan -- Vice President Dick Cheney made a surprise visit to Pakistan yesterday to press President Pervez Musharraf to step up the campaign to counter increased attacks by al Qaeda and Taliban forces against neighboring Afghanistan, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0137328

The stop was the latest sign of growing U.S. unease over resurgent Islamic terrorism in the region, but Gen. Musharraf insisted his forces have "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory.

Mr. Cheney, accompanied by CIA Deputy Director Steve Kappes on a tour of several Asian allies, made an unannounced stop in Pakistan en route to Afghanistan, where snow prevented him from reaching Kabul for talks with Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

The vice president made no public comment in Pakistan, but a senior aide to Gen. Musharraf said they held detailed talks, including a private lunch of more than an hour.

"Cheney expressed U.S. apprehensions of regrouping of al Qaeda in the tribal areas and called for concerted efforts in countering the threat," Gen. Musharraf's office said.

President Bush recently announced an increase in U.S. forces in Afghanistan, and officials in Britain and Turkey said yesterday they would be adding a combined 1,600 troops to the NATO-led mission in the country. The alliance about 33,000 troops in Afghanistan.

"Put simply, the alternative is unacceptable," British Defense Minister Des Browne told Parliament. He said Britain also would be sending four more Harrier jets, four Sea King helicopters and a C-130 Hercules transport plane.

U.S. and NATO officials praise Pakistan publicly for its role in arresting al Qaeda suspects after the September 11 attacks in 2001 and for a string of bloody operations against militants along the border. But U.S. and Afghan leaders are increasingly critical of Pakistan's efforts to curb al Qaeda and Taliban cross-border operations.

U.S. military officials said last month that attacks from Pakistan have increased fourfold since Gen. Musharraf struck a widely criticized deal last fall that put local tribes in charge of much of the security in the border area of North Waziristan.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said yesterday, "The Pakistanis remain committed to doing everything possible to fight al Qaeda, but having said that, we also know that there's a lot more that needs to be done."

U.S. officials have been reluctant to press Gen. Musharraf too hard for fear of undermining his political standing at home and encouraging Pakistan's own militant Islamic factions.

Mr. Cheney's visit was kept secret until the last moment for security reasons. He landed at a military base outside Islamabad and took a helicopter to the presidential palace.

Gen. Musharraf has argued that Pakistan is being unfairly singled out for problems rooted in the U.S.-sponsored battle against the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s. He also says there is no evidence that al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden or the Taliban's Mullah Mohammed Omar are on Pakistani soil.

The Pakistani leader also expressed concern about proposed U.S. legislation that would link U.S. military aid to Pakistan's record in containing militant attacks. U.S. officials have said they hope to persuade congressional Democrats to drop the link before the bill, which passed the House in January, becomes law.

Pakistani officials acknowledge the North Waziristan deal has not been properly implemented, but argue that large-scale military action by the government would only alienate moderate tribal groups.

U.S. military officials in Kabul say suicide bombings in Afghanistan jumped from 27 in 2005 to 139 last year, while direct- and indirect-fire attacks on Afghan and allied troops nearly tripled. U.S. and NATO officials say the anticipated spring offensive by the Taliban this year could be the most potent since the 2001-2002 U.S.-led campaign.

In Afghanistan, Mr. Cheney landed at Bagram Air Base, about 30 miles north of Kabul. He had planned to travel to the capital, but a steady snowfall made the trip unsafe, and the two leaders hope to meet today, an aide to Mr. Karzai said.

Pakistan Lobbies Against Sanctions As The Senate Takes Up 9/11 Bill (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Pakistan's weeks-long lobbying effort to thwart potential security aid sanctions is culminating this week as the Senate takes up its version of the 9/11 Commission recommendations bill, approved by the House in early January.

Legislation crafted by the office of House Foreign Affairs Committee Chairman Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) and included in the 9/11 bill has put Pakistan's embassy in Washington on the defensive. Officials there fear such blunt legislation could alter the U.S.-Pakistan relationship.

The lobbying drive's latest lap coincides with Vice President Cheney's unannounced trip to the country, where he expressed Monday the administration's concern that al Qaeda is regrouping in the tribal areas at the Pakistan-Afghanistan border and pressed for a clampdown ahead of a Taliban "spring offensive" in Afghanistan.

Pakistan's role as both a key non-NATO ally of the U.S.-led war against terrorism and a host to an unruly population of Islamic extremists has led to a widening rift between Congress and the White House on how to handle cooperation with Pakistan.

According to a Monday New York Times report, Cheney told Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf that a Democratic-led Congress could cut aid to his country if it fails to hunt down al Qaeda operatives.

The Bush administration, which has been publicly complimentary of Pakistan as an ally, opposed the House legislation imposing security aid sanctions on Pakistan, but now is using Congress as a sledgehammer against the Pakistani government, said a source following the issue closely.

"They know they can't threaten Musharraf directly," said the source. "It is a tactic that has some teeth in it."

A congressional source said Cheney's trip to Pakistan and the threat that Congress may cut off aid will put Pakistan issues on the front burner in the Senate and increases pressure on the chamber to act.

None of the legislation dealing with the 9/11 Commission's recommendations likely to be taken up in the Senate includes any reference to Pakistan. Such language would come under the jurisdiction of the Foreign Relations Committee, chaired by Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.), although any other senator can offer legislation.

A 9/11 bill authored by New Jersey Sens. Robert Menendez (D) and Frank Lautenberg (D) includes Pakistan-specific clauses and has been referred to Biden's committee.

On Monday it was unclear whether Biden or another committee member would offer amendments relating to Pakistan. According to a congressional source, such legislation could be included in the 9/11 bill, but the Senate may want to take a more comprehensive approach toward Pakistan than the House did — potentially in separate legislation.

The House Pakistan language, which received no debate and little notice in the lower chamber, sets limitations on U.S. security assistance to Pakistan.

A license for any item controlled under the Arms Export Control Act may not be approved unless President Bush certifies that the "government of Pakistan is making all possible efforts to prevent the Taliban from operating in areas under its sovereign control, including in the cities of Quetta and Chaman and in the Northwest Frontier Province and the Federally Administered Tribal Areas."

The president, however, can waive the limitations if he certifies that lifting them is important for national-security reasons.

The certification would be difficult for the administration to meet, according to a congressional source. "The administration has not done anyone any favors by saying preemptively that they would be able to certify that," the source said. "It shows a large degree of contempt towards Congress by certifying something that is not truthful."

The House legislation also directs the president to impose sanctions for transfers of nuclear technology involving foreign nationals. It also requires the president to identify nuclear proliferation network countries and suspend arms sales to such countries.

If applied retroactively, it could apply to Pakistan and the A.Q. Khan network. A.Q. Khan, considered the father of Pakistan's nuclear bomb, confessed to proliferating nuclear technology to Iran, North Korea and Libya. Pakistan will not turn him over to the United States, as such move would constitute a national humiliation, said a source close to the issue.

The House acknowledges that Pakistan has been an important partner in helping the United States remove the Taliban regime in Afghanistan and combat terrorism in the frontier Pakistan provinces.

Pakistan's ambassador in Washington, Mahmud Ali Durrani, led a concerted push in the Senate, the administration and also the House to try and repeal the language proposed by the House.

"Pakistan has done more for counterterrorism than anybody else," Durrani said in an interview. "It seems people tend to forget all our contributions. Since 9/11 we put our military where our mouth is, so to say — all our assets."

He said that Pakistan continues to support U.S. efforts in the region however it can. He cautioned that the issues arising between the United States, Pakistan and Afghanistan stem from poor coordination.

"We need to be clear on what we are expect[ing] from each other; we need to be clear about what each other's capabilities are and we need to sit across the table, roll up our sleeves and start discussing," he said.

Instead of following the spirit of the 9/11 Commission report, the House used the report to "bushwhack" Pakistan, Durrani told The Hill. "A bill like H.R. 1 is grossly unfair."

The legislation could backfire in Pakistan, where Musharraf is taking heat from those who think he is a puppet of the United States as well as from others who say that he has managed to strengthen the religious parties, the congressional source said.

In addition, there have been doubts about the loyalties of some members of Musharraf's intelligence service, and assassination attempts against him have been linked to al Qaeda.

"The House legislation sends a strong message that the status quo is not acceptable," said the congressional source. "But could we do something more? If our goal is to achieve greater cooperation, is this the most effective method?"

Instead of rushing to pass legislation of a symbolic nature, the Senate and Congress should develop a more comprehensive strategy that would secure cooperation, the source said.

Rather than being used to curry favor with the military elite, the source explained, more money should be allotted to non-military sectors to win the hearts and minds of the Pakistanis.

Pakistan's military, meanwhile, is boosting its presence at the border with Afghanistan and has increased the number of posts at passing points, Durrani maintained. Pakistan also is shutting down about 50 percent of the less-frequented border crossing points to better monitor those that will remain open.

The military also is toying with the idea of planting minefields approved under the Geneva Convention to enforce border control.

Durrani added that Pakistan is introducing biometrics systems to keep track of people without identification papers.

Pakistan has also placed security elements inside and outside refugee camps.

"We have appealed to top senators and representatives and have tried to give them the true picture to the best of our ability," he said.

Britain To Send 1,400 Troops To Afghanistan (FT)

By Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Britain will send 1,400 more troops into Afghanistan, along with aircraft, to bolster the fight against the Taliban in the south of the country, Des Browne, defence secretary, told parliament yesterday.

This will take the number of UK troops taking part in Nato's Afghanistan mission to 7,700, significantly more than in Iraq. The UK is also sending four more Sea King helicopters, four Harrier GR9 aircraft, and another Hercules C-130 transport aircraft.

Air Chief Marshal Sir Jock Stirrup, chief of the defence staff, acknowledged the forces would continue to operate at a high tempo, but said UK overseas troop commitments would fall. Tony Blair announced last week that the number of UK troops in Iraq would drop from 7,100 to 5,600.

Liam Fox, Conservative defence spokesman, said Nato partners were not doing enough to support the effort in Afghanistan. "It is scandalous that only four Nato nations . . . the UK, the US, the Canadians and the Dutch, surprise, surprise, are contributing by far the greatest to the security in the south, and the most dangerous parts of the country. We are taking a disproportionate burden."

Mr Browne said: "I have lobbied our partners consistently for more help but it is increasingly obvious that at present, when it comes to the most challenging parts of Afghanistan, only we and a small number of key allies are prepared to step forward."

Democrats Back Away From Iraq Plan (AP)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

AP, February 27, 2007

Democratic leaders backed away from aggressive plans to limit President Bush's war authority, the latest sign of divisions within their ranks over how to proceed.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said Monday he wanted to delay votes on a measure that would repeal the 2002 war authorization and narrow the mission in Iraq.

Senior Democrats who drafted the proposal, including Sens. Joseph Biden of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan, had sought swift action on it as early as this week, when the Senate takes up a measure to enact the recommendations of the bipartisan Sept. 11 commission.

Reid, who will huddle with Democrats Tuesday to discuss whether to postpone the Iraq debate, cited pressure from victims' families for quick action on the Sept. 11 bill as the reason for doing so.

"Iraq is going to be there — it's just a question of when we get back to it," Reid said, predicting it would be "days, not weeks" before the Senate returned to the issue. The war reauthorization legislation also appears to lack the 60 votes it would need to pass the Senate.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., meanwhile, said she doesn't support tying war funding to strict training and readiness targets for U.S. troops.

The comments distanced her from Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., who has said he wants to use Congress' spending power to force a change in policy in Iraq, by setting strict conditions on war funding.

Pelosi said she supports holding the administration to training and readiness targets, but added: "I don't see them as conditions to our funding. Let me be very clear: Congress will fund our troops."

Asked whether the standards should be tied to a $100 billion supplemental war spending measure — as Murtha has proposed — Pelosi demurred, saying it was up to the panel that drafts funding bills.

The developments on both sides of the Capitol reflected a new level of disarray in Democratic ranks on Iraq. Swept into power by voters clamoring for an end to the war, Democrats have seen their efforts falter under a reality more complicated than they found on the campaign trail.

While the public is fed up with Iraq, there is little consensus over what to do.

Internal divisions, Republican opposition and a president who — while weakened — still appears to have the dominant voice on the war have all left Democrats flailing for a way to change the war's course.

The Democrats' symbolic measure disapproving of Bush's troop buildup passed the House only to stall in the Senate. The House plan to place strict restrictions on war funding appears to lack enough support within Democratic ranks to succeed, and looks likely to be scaled back, considering Pelosi's latest comments. The Senate bid to narrow the 2002 resolution authorizing the war appears to lack enough votes to be approved, and action on it now is likely to be put off — at least for the week.

The first signs of impatience among Democrats' allies are sprouting.

"The public is saying, 'We hired you to get out of Iraq — now figure it out,'" said Tom Matzzie, Washington director of the anti-war group MoveOn.org. "There is a risk that without action, frustration boils over into anger."

Democrats argue that their failed efforts to thwart Bush's war plans will ultimately pay off by ratcheting up pressure for a change.

"The administration is increasingly isolated and they are increasingly at odds with where the American people are," said Jim Manley, a Reid spokesman. "We're going to keep on going at it until the administration changes course."

But Democrats also are worried about being at odds with public opinion as House and Senate leaders push divergent measures.

House Democrats, who enjoy a 32-seat majority, will try this week to determine if there is enough support among themselves to pass the Murtha plan. Senate Democrats will discuss whether to postpone action on the war reauthorization, as Reid suggested.

Bush told governors Monday that he looked forward to a "healthy debate" on Iraq, but warned Congress against limiting funding for the war or commanders' flexibility in waging it.

"I do not believe that someone is unpatriotic if they don't agree with my point of view. On the other hand, I think it's important for people to understand the consequences of not giving our troops the resources necessary to do the job," Bush said.

Democrats' troubles finding a strategy on the war reflect a wider lack of consensus among the public about what course to take in Iraq. AP-Ipsos polls show that while a clear majority are pessimistic about the war and oppose a buildup, most people do not support cutting funding for the troops.

Zbigniew Brzesinski, Jimmy Carter's former national security adviser, said Democrats "run the risk of losing momentum."

They would be better off pushing some simple policy statements that could garner Republican support — such as opposition to establishing permanent bases in Iraq or to further expansion of the war — than trying to find a way to tie Bush's hands, he said.

"One has to be very careful not to get involved in micromanaging a military engagement," Brzesinski added.

Bush still enjoys substantial advantage when it comes to trumpeting his message on the war, even though his image and clout suffered major blows in last fall's elections.

Democrats, by contrast, have a cacophony of voices — including several presidential candidates — weighing in on what to do next in Iraq.

"The party's not unified. Until you control the executive branch, you really don't have a party — you have all these independent actors," Lawrence Korb, a Reagan administration Defense Department official, said of the Democrats' plight.

Reid Looks For Edge On Iraq (RC)

By John Stanton And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) will huddle with his fellow Democrats today to gauge support for reworking the Iraq War authorization — and to bring a more united front to the debate with Republicans, Senate aides said Monday.

Although a number of top Democrats — including presidential hopeful Sen. Joseph Biden (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (Mich.) — have endorsed the plan and began publicly pushing for it during the Presidents Day recess, it has not yet been presented to the full Democratic Caucus, making it unclear whether Reid could even muster a majority of support within his own party.

Today's weekly Caucus luncheon marks the first time Reid will be able to meet with his rank-and-file membership to discuss the issue following the surprise announcement of the reauthorization strategy more than a week ago.

Reid spokesman Jim Manley reiterated Monday that the Majority Leader has not yet decided to pursue a new authorization. According to Manley, while "obviously the authorization is outdated and needs to be reformed," Reid will not decide whether to pursue a full-blown reauthorization until after he has met with Caucus members today.

Reid — despite polls showing Americans remain unhappy with President Bush's plan to boost troop levels and his own claims of victory following a rare Saturday vote earlier this month on a nonbinding Iraq resolution — finds himself in a difficult position politically this week.

Republicans went into the Presidents Day recess on a relative high note thanks to the House GOP leadership's success in limiting defections on the resolution to only 17 Members. GOP leaders also have been successful in amplifying divisions between Democrats' anti-war wing led by Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania and the bulk of the party's lawmakers who oppose the president's handling of the war but are fearful of moving to cut off funding for the conflict.

Republicans have used those competing interests to paint Democrats as being fractured and unable to settle on any sort of a substantive plan.

According to several sources familiar with the debate, there is mounting pressure on Reid from within his own party to avoid starting the debate this week. Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.) on Monday called on lawmakers to not turn this week's bill implementing the 9/11 commission's recommendations into a political grudge match over Iraq. Similarly, families of victims of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks wrote Monday to McConnell and Reid urging them to avoid mixing the politically charged debate over Iraq with the 9/11 bill.

Several Democratic aides also expressed frustration privately with the decision by Biden and Levin to announce their desire to reauthorize the war during the recess — thus increasing pressure on Reid to take it up during the 9/11 debate. A clean bill "would really be a win-win situation for all of us," one Democratic aide said, since both parties could claim victories.

Reid spokesman Manley said the two leaders are having ongoing discussions over whether Iraq will come up during the 9/11 debate and that a decision likely will wait until after both parties hold their luncheons today.

Manley also dismissed suggestions of divisions within the Democratic Party, arguing that "there is one thing all Democrats are united on and that is the absolute need to change course in Iraq."

But privately, Democratic aides argued that divisions have arisen, though not along substantive lines so much as over how best to proceed. Many Senate Democrats have supported much of Reid's political strategy over the past two years because of his slow and often-methodical approach to messaging and political trench warfare, which has allowed ample time for the Caucus to hash out internal differences.

For instance, Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) were able to defeat Bush's Social Security proposal in large part because they kept the focus on what both liberal and conservative members of their party could agree on — opposition to privatizing the program. Similarly on Iraq, Reid and Pelosi have maintained loyalty and a unified voice over the past two years by keeping their focus on a general sense that Bush has failed in his prosecution of the Iraq War.

And while Democrats acknowledge that they must produce their own proposals now that they are in the majority, that process has moved too quickly and no consensus position has been fully developed.

A GOP leadership aide agreed, arguing that "There's nothing for us to do. We just react to whatever proposal they're putting out today."

Senate Republican Conference spokesman Ryan Loskarn said Democrats largely have boxed themselves in over the past few weeks.

"Democrats are in a tailspin over Iraq funding. They are facing serious division within their ranks over troop funding and it has become impossible to keep that fact under wraps. The further along Congress gets in the Iraq debate the more difficult it gets for Democrat leadership to refuse a vote on funding support," Loskarn said.

Dems' Iraq Quagmire (HILL)

By Ron Christie

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Despite all of the talk on Capitol Hill that the Bush administration has failed to articulate a way forward in Iraq, congressional Democrats find themselves in real danger of over-reaching in their own zeal to score political points rather than demonstrate real leadership of their own.

This impotence in leadership only reinforces the perception that congressional Democrats are reflexively opposed to anything President Bush supports; the true test ahead will be to demonstrate they can put forth meaningful, binding legislation that will receive majorities in either body. The track record thus far with two failed attempts to pass non-binding resolutions in the Senate condemning the war and the iron-fisted manner in which the House majority pushed through a similar measure without allowing the minority to offer a resolution directly supporting the troops has been less than inspiring.

This week, watch for two key leaders in the Senate to take center stage as the Iraq war debate continues. The first is Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.). Later today, Byrd is expected to take up the president's $100 billion supplemental to fund ongoing operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Peter Pace, are all expected to testify on behalf of the president's request.

Will Byrd work constructively with senior administration officials to tackle tough questions about winning the war on terrorism under way in the Middle East, or will he and pointed Bush critics such as Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) use the opportunity to posture while appeasing the anti-war left that appears to have taken over the soul of the party in recent years? Things could get even more interesting should Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D-Conn.), a strong supporter of the war in Iraq, make good on veiled hints to become a Republican should Democrats overplay their hand to constrain the president's authority as commander in chief.

Byrd's Appropriations Committee hearing will garner particular interest this week given the recent criticism of House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John Murtha's (D-Pa.) plan — endorsed by Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) — to condition funding of the war supplemental to tactical decisions regarding troops on the battlefield. Blue Dog Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.) likened Murtha's plan as being as "risky as catching a falling knife" while former admiral and current Rep. Joe Sestak (D-Pa.) noted that Congress should refrain from making tactical war decisions. House Democrats have yet to find their voice in constructively addressing legitimate concerns about progress in Iraq without looking partisan.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) is also expected to take a prominent role in the Iraq deliberations this week. Author of a new resolution to curtail the 2002 authorization of force by the president in Iraq, Biden now favors a plan to withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq by March 31, 2008. A declared candidate for president himself, Biden now joins the chorus of fellow Democrats hoping to succeed President Bush as commander in chief as one who strongly supported the war in 2002 before expressing regret for their votes when currying favor with anti-war activists.

Cut off funds for the war? Work with the administration to put forth a bipartisan solution? When confronted with the most pressing issue facing the American people today, congressional Democrats appear to be in a quagmire of being unable to put the best interests of the country ahead of their own political aspirations.

Democrats Battle Over Policy On Iraq (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Democrats face a crucial question as an Iraq war-spending bill begins moving through the House: Can Congress continue to fault U.S. policy from a distance, or must lawmakers take hold of it and risk owning the outcome?

The new Democratic majority has followed the politically safer course of nonbinding resolutions and a Senate proposal to revisit the 2002 war authorization. But with action needed on a $93.4 billion Iraq-spending request, harping from the sidelines may no longer be enough to satisfy independent voters who looked to Democrats in the 2006 elections to effect real change.

The package includes $5.6 billion to help sustain a planned increase of at least 21,500 U.S. troops in Iraq, a commitment many in Congress opposed. About $14 billion would help replenish worn equipment, and, recognizing the strain on troops cycled in and out of Iraq, the Pentagon wants $3.6 billion to create two Army combat brigades and three Marine battalions to ease the load. "The rapid cycle is not sustainable," budget officials say.

In the wake of their election losses in November, Republicans have their own divisions over the president's policy. But Democrats face greater pressure, and the debate exposes internal politics and warring personalities, especially in the House.

After proposing restrictions on the funds, the bill's manager, Rep. John Murtha (D., Pa.), has been pummeled by Republicans and fellow Democrats eager to bring him down a peg or two. His friendship with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) and past rivalry with Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D., Md.) adds spice to the story. And fearing the entire bill could collapse, House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.) has sanctioned the drafting of waivers to the Murtha-backed provisions that would restore more flexibility to the administration.

"They want to end the war, but they want to fund the war," said Mr. Murtha, frustrated by his party's reluctance to exert its power over spending.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Democratic caucus chairman, is cautious about crossing this line and argues any conditions on funding should focus on the Iraq government, not U.S. forces. "Congress has the job of oversight and holding the administration accountable, but the war is owned and managed from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue," the Illinois Democrat said.

"Congress will fund our troops...as long as they're in harms way," said Ms. Pelosi yesterday. She has asked Mr. Murtha to speak to the full caucus this evening, and the 74-year-old lawmaker symbolizes how much the politics of the antiwar debate has changed since the Vietnam War, in which he fought in the 1960s.

Vietnam was a bigger, bloodier war than Iraq, but the burden was spread among many more, including draftees who served typically one-year tours. Iraq is the first prolonged test of the all-volunteer military, with a much smaller universe of soldiers and Marines bearing the burden and serving multiple tours.

That has fundamentally changed the debate, ushering in the likes of Mr. Murtha, a longtime Pentagon supporter who has come to fear that Mr. Bush's policy is wreaking havoc with the military. He said he believes the war is sacrificing not just troops but the military's long-term readiness. More than a year ago, he leapt the chasm between criticizing the war and offering a plan for early withdrawal.

Mr. Murtha predicts a full-fledged Iraq-spending debate won't come until Congress deals with the 2008 Pentagon budget this summer. And the timing of the supplemental spending bill now is a problem, both for the military and lawmakers.

Hoping to quell sectarian violence, the administration will focus the new troops on a set of mixed Shiite and Sunni neighborhoods accounting for about a third of Baghdad's population. But the Army is so short of combat-ready units, it will take until May to complete the "surge" of five brigades.

This makes it dicey for lawmakers to intercede in the midst of deployments; on the other hand, the continued shortage of personnel will make it harder for the administration to maintain the higher levels after May. The White House has been vague about how it will do this. The president asked for money only through Sept. 30, after which none is requested in his 2008 budget, even though military planners assume more time is required for the added troops to be effective.

Mr. Murtha recommends providing ample money for the military, but attaching restrictions that effectively create a cap allowing deployment of three or four brigades, not five. The bill would go beyond the president's request by adding money to build up strategic reserve units at home and require Marine and Army chiefs to certify in advance that any unit deployed be "fully mission capable" with personnel and equipment.

Most controversial, he would add provisions to make it harder for the administration to stretch personnel either by extending combat tours for units already in Iraq or sending them back faster to the war zone. The ban on extending tours would immediately affect the Army's plan to have 20 brigades in Iraq by May, and the problem would recur in June and July.

Republicans and the White House have attacked the limitations as a "slow-bleed" strategy that will endanger units in Iraq. "It's not me that bleeds the troops," Mr. Murtha said. "It's the president who is bleeding the military by overdeploying them."

He remains opposed to allowing the administration to waive the requirement, but appears resigned to see amendments that would weaken the bill added in the Appropriations Committee next week by fellow Democrats. "They can always offer amendments," he said.

Majority In Poll Favor Deadline For Iraq Pullout (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

With Congress preparing for renewed debate over President Bush's Iraq policies, a majority of Americans now support setting a deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces from the war-torn nation and support putting new conditions on the military that could limit the number of personnel available for duty there, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll.

Opposition to Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq remained strong. Two in three Americans registered their disapproval, with 56 percent saying they strongly object. The House recently passed a nonbinding resolution opposing the new deployments, but Republicans have blocked consideration of such a measure in the Senate.

Senate Democrats, led by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.) and Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.), are preparing another resolution that would have the effect of taking away the authority Bush was granted in 2002 to go to war. The measure would seek to have virtually all combat forces withdrawn from Iraq by the end of March 2008.

The Post-ABC poll found that 53 percent of Americans favored setting a deadline for troop withdrawals. Among those who favored a deadline, 24 percent said they would like to see U.S. forces out within six months and 21 percent called for the withdrawals to be completed within a year. The rest of those who supported a timetable said they do not support withdrawing all troops until at least a year from now.

This is the first time a Post-ABC News poll has found that a majority of Americans supported establishing such a timetable for withdrawal, which has long been resisted by the president and even some Democrats.

Growing numbers of Americans also favored withdrawing U.S. forces even if civil order in Iraq has not been restored. The poll found that 42 percent favored keeping troops there until order is reestablished, while 56 percent said the troops should be redeployed to avoid further U.S. casualties, even if the sectarian violence is continuing.

Some Democrats have called for cutting off money for the war. The Post-ABC News poll found that 46 percent of Americans supported restricting funding while a bare majority, 51 percent, opposed doing so.

There was clear support, however, for the kinds of conditions proposed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), who wants to establish requirements for the training and resting of military units that would have the effect of limiting the number of troops available to send to Iraq.

Murtha's plan has drawn fire in the House, including from some of his Democratic colleagues, after it was announced on a liberal Web site. The Post-ABC News poll, which did not associate the plan with Murtha, found that 58 percent of Americans said they support such new rules. Even some Americans, 21 percent, who supported the president's troop increase said they would favor rules for training and resting troops.

On questions relating to withdrawing troops or setting conditions on the military, there was a substantial gender gap. For example, 51 percent of men said they favored keeping troops in Iraq until civil order is restored, while 35 percent of women supported such a course.

Nearly seven in 10 women supported establishing some rules for training and rest time for troops to limit the number available for duty in Iraq, and 47 percent of men favored those limits. Similarly, a majority of men opposed setting any deadline for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, while an even larger majority of women would like to see a deadline established.

The poll also registered a new low on the question of whether the Iraq war was worth fighting. Thirty-four percent responded that it was, while 64 percent said it was not -- 51 percent strongly. On this question, 51 percent of military veterans and 53 percent of veteran households said they strongly believe that the war was not worth fighting.

Seventy percent placed primary blame for failing to control the violence in Iraq on the Iraqi government, while just 18 percent said the United States is more at fault.

Bush's overall approval rating stood at 36 percent, up slightly from 33 percent last month. Sixty-two percent disapproved of the way he is handling his job, with 49 percent of those indicating they strongly disapproved.

Approval of his handling of the Iraq war remained near its all-time low. Thirty-one percent said they approved and 67 percent said they disapproved, a slight improvement from December, when 28 percent approved.

Bush also received negative marks on the campaign against terrorism (52 percent disapproved) and on his handling of the economy (55 percent disapproved).

By wide margins, Americans said they trust Democrats in Congress more than Bush to deal with Iraq, health care, the budget, the economy and terrorism. The Democrats' advantage on health care was 37 percentage points, on the budget 27 points, on Iraq and the economy 20 points and on terrorism 13 points.

Overall, however, 41 percent said they approved of the way Congress is doing its job, while 54 percent disapproved.

The disapproval level was marginally higher than it was a month ago. The low point for congressional approval in the past year came a few weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm elections, which resulted in Republicans losing their House and Senate majorities, when 31 percent gave Congress positive marks.

Asked about the performance of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), 50 percent said they approved and 31 percent said they disapproved.

Her disapproval rating a month ago was 25 percent.

On another issue, the poll found that a majority of Americans now distrust the Bush administration on its handling of intelligence. Thirty-five percent said they can trust the administration to report potential threats from other countries honestly and accurately, and 63 percent said they cannot.

The administration has been challenged on the quality of the intelligence underpinning its assertions that Iran is helping insurgents in Iraq.

Forty-seven percent of those surveyed said they believed that the administration has solid evidence to support those claims, and 44 percent disagreed.

At the same time, 41 percent expressed confidence that the administration will do a good job of handling current tensions with Iran, compared with 58 percent who said they were not confident.

The Post-ABC News poll is based on telephone interviews with 1,082 adults and was conducted between last Thursday and Sunday. The margin of sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

A Democrat On Everything But Iraq (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

The not-so-nice words for Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman keep coming.

Evil incarnate, according to the liberal blogosphere.

Barely a Democrat, concludes conservative columnist Robert Novak.

Glenn Close in "Fatal Attraction," a taunting lunatic who will "boil our bunny" if upset by the party, writes a Vermont blogger.

But a review of the Connecticut senator's voting record since his return to Congress as a self-styled independent suggests another label: Dependable Democrat*.

The asterisk, of course, refers to Iraq. Lieberman has fought Democrats with the pluck of a third-grader in a dodge-ball tournament, advancing the view of him as a rogue ready to bolt the Democrats, where he caucuses, for the Republicans. And in a Politico interview last week, he once again refused to rule out the possibility.

Yet, his newfound freedom hasn't reshaped his voting patterns. He broke with the majority of Democratic senators on only five of 52 votes he's cast in the last two months.

By this measure, Lieberman is more true-blue than Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), who split from the party more often but generated a fraction of the blog traffic on Technorati and far more glowing descriptions. Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) diverged from the Democratic majority on four votes, yet, like Nelson, never on Iraq.

The different perceptions underscore how indelible Iraq has become as the base line for determining party loyalty. Lieberman emerged as a decisive vote last month in the minimum-wage debate -- twice giving Democrats a one-vote edge in defeating Republican amendments -- but that party fidelity on domestic issues gets lost in his disobedience on Iraq, where he twice sided with the GOP to block a rebuke of the president.

"There are Democrats in recent years that have been quick to criticize Republicans who apply a litmus test: If you are not with us 100 percent, you are not with us," Lieberman said. "That is what I feel has happened too much within the Democratic Party."

Lieberman "doesn't digress from the party that much," acknowledged Jane Hamsher, the Connecticut-based author of firedoglake.com who worked for Lieberman's 2006 opponent, Democrat Ned Lamont. But, she said, it is Iraq that matters.

"The damage he does is fragging Democrats from behind party lines on Iraq," Hamsher said. "He gives the administration bipartisan cover."

Lieberman aides dismiss speculation that the senator will eventually go Republican -- an extraordinary move that would flip control of the Senate. Simply put, Lieberman would be out of place among Republicans, aides say.

Yes, he looked awfully cozy nestled between Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) in the Senate press gallery this month, talking up their counterproposal to Democratic legislation critical of President Bush's troop surge in Iraq.

"Reid doesn't want to create holy hell in the Democratic blogger world," Graham said, speculating why Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) was refusing to allow votes on certain Republican amendments.

The dig at Lieberman's Internet nemeses hit his funny bone. The trio giggled in unison.

And yes, despite pre-election promises to caucus with Democrats, Lieberman frequently fans the divorce talk by holding it out as a possibility, even laying down markers last week on what could provoke proceedings: A move by the party to cut funding for the war.

"We will see how that plays out in the coming months," Lieberman said.

Republicans don't hide their thirst. Lieberman hears from them -- "mostly joking, lately. 'We would love to have you,' " he said. "I have no desire to change parties."

A warm post-election welcome for Lieberman -- Democrats gave him a standing ovation -- has cooled as the Iraq debate grinds on, aides acknowledge.

"Since the debate on the surge, it has been hard," said Dan Gerstein, a former Lieberman aide who continues to serve as a paid adviser. "It is definitely putting some strain on his relations within the caucus.

"But when he spoke out against President Clinton (during the impeachment debate), it put some strains on his relations with the caucus," Gerstein added. "Over time, when you have friendships with family, not every day is a love fest. Sometimes people get a little too fixated on the hints of discord. The truth is there are a lot of friends in the caucus."

Aides take cues from Lieberman's actions. He voted with Democrats 90 percent of the time before the November election -- a point he raised on the primary campaign trail -- and continues to hold that average in his first two months as an independent.

"If he was seriously thinking about becoming a Republican, the last thing he would do is propose a new tax," Gerstein said.

That's a war-on-terrorism tax, proposed early this month to ease the pressure that military budgets are placing on domestic programs. Hardened critics went squishy -- for about a half a second.

"This may come off as blasphemy, but I support the latest idea of Joe Lieberman," Democratic consultant Cliff Schecter wrote on his blog.

Lieberman also lined up against every Republican amendment to the minimum-wage bill that would have tinkered with tax policy. Nelson, by contrast, backed several of the Republican tax-cut initiatives. But his Democratic disobedience earned little of the scorn heaped on Lieberman.

"Ben Nelson votes his conscience and keeps his mouth shut," Hamsher explained. "Nobody has any gripe with Ben Nelson."

Rep. Marshall's Iraq Vote Could Help Inoculate Him For 2008 House Race (HILL)

By Sam Youngman

The Hill, February 27, 2007

When Rep. Jim Marshall (Ga.) voted against the House non-binding resolution on the Iraq war, he stood out as one of only two House Democrats who bucked their party. But that vote could bolster his chances for reelection in 2008, when he will undoubtedly find himself running against the wind as a Democrat in a conservative district.

Marshall and Rep. Gene Taylor (Miss.) were the only two Democrats to oppose the measure. By contrast, 17 Republican members voted in favor of the resolution, which passed 246-182.

Marshall narrowly defeated former Rep. Mac Collins (R) last year in a race so close that Collins has yet to concede defeat. Collins is widely expected to challenge Marshall again in 2008, in a district that President Bush won with 61 percent in 2004.

Marshall's office said his vote had nothing to do with his reelection prospects and everything to do with his military background and desire to support troop morale.

"It's not something that Jim looked at in terms of elections or reelections," said Marshall spokesman Doug Moore.

In his floor speech, Marshall said a "yes" vote on the non-binding resolution is like "sitting on the sidelines and booing in the middle of our town team's play because we don't like the coach's call."

But former Rep. Buddy Darden, another Georgia Democrat all too aware of the political realties facing a Democrat in the Deep South, said Marshall's vote was "consistent" with the congressman's unwavering support of the military and his district's politics. It also has the added benefit of bolstering his conservative credentials in a district he won by just more than 2,000 votes.

Moore said they have no way to measure how people in Georgia's 8th district have reacted to the vote.

"I'm not sure if it hurts or helps," he said. "There are a lot of folks who are upset about it. Some folks are happy about it. Jim really didn't even consider that."

But Darden was less sanguine, noting that the district, redrawn in 2005 with a much heavier Republican make-up, will always be a tough district for Marshall.

During the midterm elections, President Bush traveled to the districts of both Marshall and Georgia Rep. John Barrow (D), and both men barely survived. Barrow defeated former Republican Rep. Max Burns by fewer than 1,000 votes.

Ron Moon, chairman of the Republican Party in Butts County, a conservative stronghold, said Collins is a "good conservative," but he doesn't know whether he will run again. Collins did not return calls left at his home.

Moon did say he thought Marshall's Iraq vote "helps him" in his quest for reelection, but he called it typical political maneuvering on Marshall's part. Moon added that Marshall often votes with conservatives when Democrats don't need his vote.

"That's a pattern of his," Moon said. "People don't keep up, and they think he's a conservative."

Marshall spokesman Moore said the office had not heard much angry feedback from the party leadership despite the congressman's decision to break ranks on the largest symbolic vote in the new Congress.

"I know [the leadership] wanted 100 percent support, so they're probably disappointed they didn't get that," Moore said, adding, "I think they know where he's coming from."

Darden compared the current climate to the years when Democrats were in the minority or to the early 1990s, when breaking ranks like Marshall did on this vote would have been "problematic."

As Darden put it, the party leadership now demonstrates a "cohesiveness and understanding that every vote counts" when it comes to reelection contests, and Democrats in conservative districts do have to break party ranks from time to time.

Taylor, the other Democrat to vote against the resolution, won reelection last year with almost 80 percent of the vote.

Gen. Pace: Military Capability Eroding (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

DOJ_NMG_0137338

AP, February 27, 2007

Strained by the demands of wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, there is a significant risk that the U.S. military won't be able to quickly and fully respond to yet another crisis, according to a new report to Congress.

The assessment, done by the nation's top military officer, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, represents a worsening from a year ago, when that risk was rated as moderate.

The report is classified, but on Monday senior defense officials, speaking on condition on anonymity, confirmed the decline in overall military readiness. And a report that accompanied Pace's review concluded that while the Pentagon is working to improve its warfighting abilities, it "may take several years to reduce risk to acceptable levels."

Pace's report comes as the U.S. is increasing its forces in Iraq to quell escalating violence in Baghdad. And top military officials have consistently acknowledged that the repeated and lengthy deployments are straining the Army, Marine Corps and reserve forces and taking a heavy toll on critical warfighting equipment.

The review grades the military's ability to meet the demands of the nation's military strategy — which would include fighting the wars as well as being able to respond to any potential outbreaks in places such as North Korea, Iran, Lebanon, Cuba or China.

The latest review by Pace covers the military's status during 2006, but the readiness level has seesawed back and forth during the Iraq war. Officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because the risk levels are classified, said the risk for 2005 was moderate, but it was assessed as significant in 2004.

His assessment was submitted to Defense Secretary Robert Gates at the beginning of this year, and therefore does not reflect the latest move to pour 21,500 more troops into Iraq over the next few months.

Gates delivered Pace's assessment to Congress, along with a six-page report on steps the Pentagon is taking to address the problem — including new efforts to increase the size of the Army and Marine Corps, and requests for more money to repair and replace equipment. On Monday, the Pentagon released most of Gates' report, except for a few sections that were classified as secret.

That report concluded that "world events and regional trends add up to increased challenges to our nation's security." And it said the decline in readiness is also affected by whether other federal agencies and other nations are fulfilling their commitments.

There have been long-standing complaints that the State Department has not met its responsibilities in Iraq, particularly in reconstruction and rebuilding efforts, as well as buttressing the political development of the Iraqi government.

In his report, Gates also discussed efforts to repair and replace equipment worn out in combat, beef up recruiting and retention, and make better use of the National Guard and reserve forces. It also details how the Pentagon will use billions of dollars in the proposed budget, including plans to modernize aircraft and weapons, develop better detection and countermeasures for weapons of mass destruction, increase the size of the special operations forces, and boost the nation's missile defense.

Bomb Inside Iraqi Ministry Kills 5 (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

BAGHDAD -- A bomb planted at an Iraqi ministry where one of the nation's most senior politicians was making an official appearance today killed five people and injured dozens, raising the possibility that attackers infiltrated the government to plan and carry out the assault and prompting serious questions about Iraq's ability to ensure its own security.

The bombing targeted Adil Abdul Mehdi, one of two Iraqi vice presidents and a senior leader in the largest Shiite voting bloc in parliament, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq. It was detonated as he attended a morning ceremony for employees of the Ministry of Labor and Municipalities who had been honored for their hard work.

The incident was the most serious of many on a day when attackers appeared to have directly focused their strikes on government and police targets, rather than soft civilian targets such as marketplaces and universities that have been besieged in recent weeks. On Sunday, a suicide bomber at an Iraqi school killed 40 people, most of them students coming and going to mid-term exams.

Earlier today, a roadside bomb killed three Iraqi police officers and injured four others as their convoy passed through East Baghdad. A suicide bomber detonated a car bomb at a military checkpoint near the northern city of Kirkuk, killing one civilian. In the south, British forces said 15 gunmen attacked a British military patrol in Basra; three attackers were wounded in the battle, but the British did not say if any of its soldiers were harmed.

The ministry bombing served as a chilling reminder of how far U.S. and Iraqi officials have to go to in order to establish security here -- in the halls of government, not to mention the lawless and bloody streets of the capital -- as attacks continue largely unabated two weeks into a new effort to halt sectarian conflict.

The bomb went off inside the hall where the ceremony was taking place, in an affluent area of west Baghdad dominated by Sunnis, just after minister Riyadh Gharib completed a speech and returned to his seat next to Mehdi on the stage.

Witnesses said the bomb appeared to have been planted two to three yards from the stage and was packed with ball bearings that pierced skin. Thick, dark smoke filled the room and the ceiling caved in.

Mehdi was not seriously injured, but two ministry department heads were among those killed. Mehdi and Gharib were taken for treatment to the Ibn Sina hospital in the Green Zone, which is staffed with American military medical personnel.

Lt. Col. Christopher Garver of the U.S.-led military coalition said the incident was "unfortunate" but had no further comment, and said Mehdi was treated and released. A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy could not be reached.

Iraqi Vice President Injured In Blast At Government Office (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraq's Shiite vice president narrowly escaped assassination Monday as a blast ripped through a government hall just hours after it was searched by U.S. teams with bomb-sniffing dogs.

Adel Abdul-Mahdi was slightly hurt in the explosion, which killed at least 10 people.

As U.S. forces sealed off the area around the Iraqi Ministry of Public Works, investigators sought to figure out how the bomb was smuggled into the municipal building.

The building is a seven-story structure with crack surveillance systems from its days as offices for Saddam Hussein's feared intelligence service.

The bomb went off moments after the minister for public works finished a speech, witnesses told the Associated Press. Among those killed were several ministry employees, police said. More than 25 were wounded, including the public works minister, Riyad Gharib.

Abdul-Mahdi suffered minor leg injuries and was hospitalized for tests, his office said. He was later released. Adbul-Mahdi is one of two vice presidents. The other, Tariq al-Hashemi, is Sunni. Also Monday:

His physician, Yedkar Hikmat, would give no timetable on his discharge, saying only that Talabani did not have a heart attack.

·In Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, a suicide car bomber struck outside a police station, killing at least 13 people and wounding 10, police said.

·Iraq's Cabinet signed off on a proposed oil law that would divide revenue among all Iraqi factions. It now moves to the parliament for a final vote.

Bombing At Iraqi Ministry Wounds 2 Top Officials (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — An explosion inside the Ministry of Public Works on Monday wounded an Iraqi vice president and the public works minister and killed at least five people, in what officials described as a possible assassination attempt.

Though it was unclear where in the building the bomb was hidden or who the target was, the attack was the most serious breach of an Iraqi government building since November, when dozens of employees at the Ministry of Higher Education were kidnapped by gunmen dressed in police commando uniforms.

Adel Abdul-Mahdi, one of Iraq's two vice presidents, was approaching a conference room lectern to address ministry employees at the time of the blast, which tore through walls and hurled him to the ground, witnesses said. His guards threw themselves on top of him, and he was immediately taken to an American-run hospital inside the Green Zone where witnesses said he was received in a wheelchair, covered in dust but smiling.

Statements from several offices of the Shiite-led Iraqi government later said he was released and had returned to work.

The public works minister, Reyad Ghareeb, was seriously wounded, news agencies reported. It was not clear if his wounds were life-threatening.

The Ministry of Public Works is in the Sunni neighborhood of Mansour. Like nearly all government buildings in Baghdad, it is surrounded by 10-foot concrete blast walls and dozens of guards. Visitors to the building pass through metal detectors and are then searched by hand.

Witnesses and Iraqi officials said it was unclear whether a bomb had been carried in by an employee or had been slipped past security by a visitor.

Assassination attempts on Iraqi officials are not uncommon, and members of all sects have been singled out. Mr. Abdul-Mahdi and Mr. Ghareeb are both Shiites, and the Public Works Ministry is run by one of Iraq's leading Shiite parties, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

Last fall, a car bomb exploded in the Green Zone near the convoy of the speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashadani, a Sunni. Nasreen Barwari, a Kurd and the former public works minister, said three attempts were made on her life during her tenure from 2003 to 2006.

She said satellite offices of the ministry were regularly singled out as well.

"I believe all governmental offices are a target all the time," she said. "And the main objective is to undermine the government as a whole, and discredit its security measures or plans."

Witnesses said the vice president, the minister and several senior ministry officials had gathered in a conference room on the third floor to give employees awards when the blast shredded rows of chairs and collapsed part of the roof onto the victims.

"While Dr. Abdul-Mahdi was trying to deliver his speech, the explosion took place," said a ministry employee, also wounded in the attack, who had been sitting next to the vice president. If it was a suicide bomber, the employee said, "there would have been more people killed."

Interior Ministry officials said three of the five people killed were women. Four of the dead held the rank of director general in the Public Works Ministry — the middle managers who run the organization on a daily basis.

On Monday, a roadside bomb in southern Baghdad killed two policemen. A mortar shell exploded in central Baghdad, where security forces have set up blast walls around open-air markets, killing two people and wounding four. Gunmen attacked a fire station in Mansour, in western Baghdad, killing three firemen and wounding three others.

Authorities found 25 bodies throughout the city.

Also on Monday, the political bloc loyal to anti-American cleric Moktada al-Sadr clarified the cleric's stance on the new Baghdad security plan, saying that Mr. Sadr still supported the plan despite a statement attributed to him on Sunday saying that the effort to pacify the capital was doomed to failure because it relied on American troops.

Saleh al-Ugaili, a member of Parliament and a spokesman for Mr. Sadr's political movement, said the statement was meant to emphasize a need for more Iraqi control.

"Everybody knows that the American intervention in the duties of the army and Iraqi police confuses their work and creates opportunities for breaches," he said.

The American military said in a statement on Monday that elements of Mr. Sadr's Mahdi Army militia "seem to be practicing a policy of noninterference," with many senior leaders leaving the country and others adopting a "wait-and-see" attitude.

The military also announced the death of a marine killed Monday during combat in Anbar Province.

President Jalal Talabani's office said Monday that he was recovering from exhaustion at a hospital in Jordan and denied reports that he had heart surgery. <NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Insurgents Aim For Wider-scale Attacks (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD — Troops from Maj. Jeremy Siegrist's battalion were following up a tip recently when they came across something odd: two restaurant-sized freezers sitting in the middle of a palm grove.

The freezers' contents were even more surprising. Inside, the troops found 150 copper plates, C-4 plastic explosive and plastic tube sections — key ingredients in making the deadly, armor-piercing roadside bombs known as explosively formed projectiles, or EFPs.

The amount of Iran-made material suggested Iraqi militants have learned how to mass-produce EFPs, rather than only import them pre-made from Iran, Siegrist said Monday. "It's a huge step" for the militants, he said.

The increased use of EFPs, which can shoot molten metal through tanks and cause heavier casualties than normal bombs, may be part of a broader tactical shift by Iraqi insurgents, U.S. military officials and analysts say. Since an increase in U.S. troops patrolling Baghdad under President Bush's new security plan, extremists have launched fewer but deadlier attacks to kill Americans and terrify the Iraqi population.

The number of roadside bombs has dropped by 20% since the security plan began this month, the U.S. military said in a report Monday. Sectarian murders have dropped to their lowest levels in a year, the report said.

However, the scale of recent attacks threatens to overshadow any relative progress. Since the security plan started, insurgents have grabbed headlines with suicide bombs in crowded markets, the downing of U.S. helicopters and an assassination attempt Monday against Iraqi Vice President Adel Abdul-Mahdi.

Three recent explosions of trucks laden with chlorine tanks were especially illustrative of insurgents' tactics, said Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Iraq. Most of the chlorine burned off in the blasts, but the mere use of the gas — used as a weapon in World War I — had a psychological impact, Garver said.

"It's more of a terror weapon," he said. "It's used to get the attention of the people. And it gets our attention, too."

As a result, some Iraqis' patience may be waning. According to a statement attributed to Muqtada al-Sadr on Sunday, the influential Shiite cleric called on Iraqis to take security into their own hands rather than trust Americans.

The number of U.S. troops in Baghdad is set to increase by 17,500 in coming months, so insurgents realize they must act now to destabilize the U.S.-backed government, said Andrew Krepinevich, a counterinsurgency expert at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "Just as the administration is pushing poker chips to the middle of the table, insurgents are doing the same," Krepinevich said.

The Pentagon's emphasis on Baghdad may also open opportunities for insurgents to stage dramatic attacks outside the capital. On Feb. 19, a suicide car bomber rammed into two fuel trucks outside a U.S. outpost north of Baghdad, causing a fiery explosion. Insurgents then lobbed mortars and launched rockets from nearby trucks, killing two U.S. troops and injuring 29.

"We hadn't seen that sort of complex attack on a coalition outpost before," said Siegrist, the executive officer of the Army's 1st Battalion, 12th Calvary Regiment, based in nearby Baqouba. "As we crank down on Baghdad, the insurgents will be pushing into the outskirts."

U.S. forces are trying to stay one step ahead of the insurgents. To thwart car bomb attacks, troops funnel traffic away from large targets such as markets and mosques, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters recently.

"Though there may be good days during that time, we are also going to have tough ones," he said. "The terrorists will adjust and react to our tactics."

US Task: Fight To End Four Wars In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

Iraq may be not one war, but four or five – an assemblage of different, crosscutting conflicts.

Think of it this way: In Iraq, the US simultaneously is playing several different games of chess against several different opponents. Meanwhile, some of those opponents are conspiring together. Some are trying to blow each other up.

This multiplicity of adversaries makes the US military's job all the harder – in intelligence terms, if nothing else. A main tenet of counterinsurgency theory is "thoroughly understand your enemy," and in Iraq there are lots of enemies to know, from factions of Sunni insurgents to competing Shiite militias to foreign Al Qaeda fighters, intelligence agents of surrounding states, and old-fashioned criminal thugs.

"Iraq is an extremely complex theater," said Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commanding general of coalition forces in Iraq, at a briefing on Thursday. "Its stability is threatened by a number of different factors every day."

US officials in the past have been reluctant to publicly acknowledge changes in the nature of the Iraq war.

Thus in the months after the toppling of Saddam Hussein in 2003, then-Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and other administration officials resisted labeling Iraq's continued violence as an anti-US insurgency. The White House similarly has been slow to hang the phrase "civil war" on Iraq's Sunni-Shiite divide.

But since Robert Gates took over at the Pentagon in December, a new specificity has marked the US descriptions of Iraq fighting. At a Feb. 2 press conference with Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Secretary Gates said he thought the words "civil war" oversimplified Iraq's situation.

Four wars in Iraq

Gates said there are "essentially four wars in Iraq." One is Shiite versus Shiite, principally for control of Basra and other areas in Iraq's oil-rich south. The second is Shiite-versus-Sunni sectarian warfare. Third, in Gates's listing, is the insurgency, the native Sunni anti-US violence. Fourth is Al Qaeda, which both aids and directs the Sunni insurgency and foments Sunni-Shiite violence.

To this list the recently released unclassified summary of the National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq adds "widespread criminally motivated violence."

DOJ_NMG_0137342

The NIE, which represents the consensus judgment of US intelligence agencies, holds that Iraq does show some signs of being a civil war. It's causing a hardening of ethnosectarian identity among Iraqis, for instance, and is resulting in the displacement of populations.

Nevertheless, "the Intelligence Community judges that the term 'civil war' does not adequately capture the complexity of the conflict in Iraq," concludes the NIE – a finding that matches Gates's view.

The strategy of perseverance

Does President Bush's new strategy for Iraq address this complexity?

Just by persevering in its attempts to establish security in Iraq, the US is in many respects countering all its adversaries, says William Martel, an associate professor of international security studies at the Fletcher School at Tufts University in Medford, Mass.

"The unifying principal for these groups is that their strategic objective is to push us out of Iraq. Victory for them is anything other than success for the US," says Dr. Martel, author of "Victory in War: Foundations of Modern Military Policy."

US intelligence does have the difficult job of trying to understand the nature and motives of many different adversaries and alleged friends alike, notes Martel. As military operations this year in Baghdad have shown so far, one group – Shiite militias – may fade into the shadows, while another – Sunni insurgents – steps up its attacks.

US operations then become "a whack-a-mole game," says Martel.

US approach too simple?

Other analysts hold that the chaos of Iraq's conflict means that the current US effort to establish security in Baghdad will, at best, achieve only a temporary calm there. The divides that fuel the current conflict – both between sectarian groups, and within them – won't be resolved merely by an absence of fighting, they say. Likewise, they hold out little hope that the political components of US strategy will be able to stabilize Iraq.

"Why won't we see the same problems again if we try to withdraw?" asks James Fearon, a Stanford University political scientist and author of an analysis of the nature of Iraq's civil war in the current issue of the journal Foreign Affairs.

The term "civil war" is indeed apt for Iraq, argues Dr. Fearon. It is often applied to conflicts marked by factionalism and chaos, such as the multisided Lebanese civil war of the late 1970s and 1980s.

History shows that the majority of civil wars have ended when one side wins. Power-sharing agreements, similar to the national reconciliation the US is pushing for in Iraq, are far less common, according to Fearon.

Two factors can make power-sharing feasible: cohesion among the warring parties and a period of fighting that makes obvious the relative military capabilities of both sides – in Iraq's case, Sunni and Shiite forces. Neither of these currently exists in Iraq, says Fearon.

From the vantage point of the US, the immediate task is to stop bullets flying, from whomever they come. "The question is ... how do we get from where we are to where we are supposed to be?" said General Pace at the Feb. 2 briefing. "And that is what the new plan is about."

Oil Plan Includes More Production, Sharing (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen And Tina Susman

Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- After months of negotiations over the post-war spoils of Iraq's most valuable natural resource, the government announced Monday night that it had approved a draft plan to ramp up oil production and share the proceeds.

The agreement on the terms by Iraq's cabinet was touted as a major breakthrough. It must still be approved by Parliament, but because all of Iraq's vested ethnic and regional interests are represented in the Cabinet, the deal was viewed as having overcome a significant hurdle.

The United States has long wanted to capitalize on Iraq's oil resources, especially as a means of paying for the country's reconstruction since the 2003 invasion. Oil's importance was reiterated in the Iraq Study Group report released in December.

The agreement not only will open international investment in Iraq's oil industry -- a bonanza for foreign oil companies -- but will produce revenue for a nation badly in need of cash to finance its reconstruction.

Iraq's oil riches predominantly lie in the Kurdish-controlled north and the Shiite-controlled south. Reaching an agreement essentially required both parties to be willing to share their bounty with Sunnis in the middle -- a particularly painful prospect as Sunnis under Saddam Hussein controlled the entire government.

In addition, Kurds, who are pushing a referendum on withdrawal from Iraq, wanted more control over their ability to strike contracts with foreign firms and spend profits as they see fit.

According to the statement from the office of U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, all revenues from oil sales will go into a single national account, but all regions and provinces will have a seat on an energy policy-making body, and provinces will receive shares of revenue and have control over how they spend it.

In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow called a new oil law the "key linchpin" in Iraq's recovery because it gives "everybody a shared economic interest in working together."

During a visit to Baghdad earlier this month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged Iraqi leaders to pass the law, saying "it's really critical" to show signs of national reconciliation.

The oil sector in Iraq has not been in full-scale development since the 1980s. Fewer than a quarter of its fields have been developed; production volume fell by 8 percent in 2005.

And yet it is the overwhelming source of revenue in Iraq and is expected to bring in $31 billion this year, based on projected exports of 1.7 million barrels a day at a price of $50 a barrel.

It was unclear what concessions led to the compromise, and the precise terms of the deal were not immediately available. The U.S. has been exerting considerable pressure on Iraqi leadership for months to reach the accord, and one Sunni politician said Monday night that the deal had been brokered by Khalilzad himself.

Iraqi parliament members were cautious to embrace the plan. Still, most agreed that a cabinet compromise was a good sign.

"Definitely, if there is a cabinet accordance, this would be a good key for a future accordance in the Parliament," said Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a Shiite member of Parliament.

Others predicted a tougher battle for the proposal on its way to becoming law.

"I think there will be great opposition to it in the Parliament," said Rashid al-Azzawi, of the Sunni Parliamentary bloc known as the Iraqi Accordance Front.

Some analysts say the law also will be viewed dimly as another tool of the United States to get its hands on the country's oil.

Antonia Juhasz, an analyst at the Institute for Policy Studies in Washington, D.C., who has written extensively on the economic aspects of the U.S. invasion of Iraq, said throwing open the oil industry to foreign investment -- which no doubt would include U.S. oil interests -- would only heighten Iraqis' distrust of the United States.

"Most people in Iraq assume the U.S. invasion was about oil," she said. "When the people of Iraq learn that the majority of their oil fields are being turned over to foreign private production ... it worries me. I wouldn't want to be a soldier on the ground when the law passes."

Iraq's Cabinet Backs Contentious Oil Measure (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 -- Iraq's cabinet approved draft legislation Monday that would enable the government to manage the country's vast oil resources and distribute revenue throughout the country, a step toward meeting a U.S. demand that the country's parliament pass such a law.

But in a reminder of Iraq's continuing instability, Adel Abdul Mahdi, one of the country's two vice presidents, narrowly avoided assassination Monday morning when a bomb exploded inside a crowded third-floor conference room at a government ministry in Baghdad's Mansour district.

Abdul Mahdi, one of Iraq's most influential Shiite politicians, was walking toward the podium at an awards ceremony at the Public Works Ministry when explosives detonated beneath the seats, striking him with shrapnel but causing only minor wounds, according to Zuhair Hamadi, an adviser to the vice president.

The harrowing security breach, in which at least five people were killed and more than 15 wounded, police said, illustrated the perils of political life in Iraq even as U.S. and Iraqi forces attempt to pacify the capital. Abdul Mahdi's brother was killed in 2005, and last year a bomb exploded outside his house in Baghdad.

"I'm sure people knew he was coming to the ceremony maybe three or four days ahead of time, and they planned it," Hamadi said.

The draft oil law, approved by Iraq's cabinet after months of intense negotiations, must still be approved by parliament. Ministers agreed to a goal of enacting the legislation by May, a senior Iraqi official said on condition of anonymity.

"If this law is enacted, it is truly an important breakthrough to establishing the political economy of what we want to see: an Iraq that is democratic, federal and united," Barham Salih, one of Iraq's two deputy prime ministers, said in an interview. "These vital resources, and these revenues, are understandably among the most difficult and most contentious issues faced by Iraqis."

The draft law calls for oil revenue throughout the country to be deposited in a federal government account and redistributed to Iraq's 18 provinces, most likely on a per capita basis, said Salih, the chairman of the negotiating committee working on the legislation. A secondary piece of legislation will address in more detail the mechanisms of revenue distribution, he added.

The law would establish a Federal Council on Oil and Gas to oversee energy policy and determine procedures for negotiating contracts with oil companies and managing oil exploration and production. The law also would revamp the Iraqi National Oil Co. and give regulatory oversight to the Oil Ministry.

"All Iraqis, irrespective of their geographic location, will benefit from these revenues. There will be no segregation or sectarian division," said Thamir Ghadban, a former oil minister serving as a consultant to the negotiating committee.

The negotiators wrangled in part over how much autonomy regional authorities, especially the Kurdish territories of northern Iraq, would have to sign contracts with energy companies and manage oil fields in their areas. While the draft law would consolidate much decision-making authority in Baghdad, regional officials hailed the agreement and said they would still have certain independent powers over their resources.

"The Kurdistan region will voluntarily share some of its constitutional powers to manage petroleum exploration and development in Kurdistan with the federal government," said Ashti Hawrami, the Kurdish region's minister of natural resources, in a statement on the regional government's Web site.

In particular, the Kurdish regional government will allow a panel of experts to review the region's oil contracts and pool its revenue with the central government. "In return, Kurdistan will be guaranteed a share of pooled revenues proportionate to its population," the statement said. "The Kurdistan Regional Government will, of course, retain the power to sign contracts for petroleum exploration and development in the Kurdistan Region."

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, issued a statement praising the cabinet for reaching an agreement. U.S. officials have pressured the Iraqi government to approve the law in the hope that an equitable mechanism for managing oil resources would remove a source of conflict. Most of Iraq's oil fields are in the predominantly Shiite south and the mainly Kurdish north, prompting fears among Sunni Arabs that they will be left out of revenue-sharing arrangements devised by a Shiite-led government.

Given that the cabinet represents all major parliamentary blocs, "prospects for the draft legislation becoming the law of the land are excellent," Khalilzad said. "There is still much work that needs to be done in the hydrocarbon sector. But a vital step was taken today."

Also on Monday, U.S. officials announced the seizure of what they described as a large cache of Iranian-made parts for powerful armor-piercing roadside bombs, known as explosively formed projectiles, that officials say have killed more than 170 members of U.S.-led coalition forces over the past two years. U.S. soldiers, following a tip from an Iraqi, found the weapons parts, along with rockets and mortars, on Saturday, hidden in two large freezers concealed by palm fronds.

"This was a great find for us," said Capt. Clayton Combs, the commander of the company that made the discovery in a village near Baqubah, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. "This is a significant amount. It probably saved a lot of lives."

The roadside bombs are fashioned with plastic cylinders packed with explosives, and an attached copper plate turns into a smoldering projectile that penetrates armored vehicles. The cache included 150 of the plates in various sizes.

Earlier this month, U.S. military officials briefing reporters in Baghdad on condition of anonymity said without offering evidence that high-ranking Iranian government officials were involved in supplying the deadly explosives to Iraqi militants. But at a briefing Monday, officials said they had no evidence of who supplied the weapons. A military explosives expert, Maj. Marty Weber, said Iran is the only known country where these types of components are manufactured.

Military officials involved in the recent discovery said they were not sure to whom the weapon parts belonged or how they got to the village of al-Jedidah, where the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia, has a strong presence. They said the fact that they found parts, rather than complete devices, suggests that some are being assembled in Iraq.

The U.S. military said a Marine was killed Monday in Anbar province in western Iraq.

Meanwhile, aides to Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, who was hospitalized Sunday in Jordan, said he is in stable condition. His office said Monday that the president was "fully conscious and in high spirits." He will remain in Amman to undergo more tests. Talabani reportedly lost consciousness Sunday after what his staff described as a series of stressful days.

Iraq Cabinet Backs Oil Proposal (WSJ)

By Hassan Hafidh And Chip Cummins

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Iraq's cabinet approved a draft law laying the groundwork for oil-field development contracts, a move that eventually could lift its battered economy and help allay the country's sectarian divisions.

DOJ_NMG_0137345

The legislation now goes to parliament. If the law is approved, it would green-light negotiations between central-government and regional officials and foreign oil-company executives, though oil companies aren't likely to rush into the country anytime soon.

The legislation would provide foreign executives with a legal foundation for any oil-field development contracts they may one day sign with government officials. The lack of such a framework after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003 has prevented most oil companies from entering into detailed negotiations.

Typically, in countries with nationalized oil industries, foreign oil companies negotiate a contract with the government itself. That was the case in Iraq before Mr. Hussein's fall. The new law would clear the way for oil companies to negotiate with Iraq's current central government, along with the regional authorities.

Iraq is home to some of the world's largest crude-oil deposits, and much of the country remains relatively unexplored. Decades of war and underinvestment have left the oil industry in shambles. U.S. officials have long encouraged Iraqi counterparts to hammer out a petroleum law in the hopes of encouraging foreign investment and jump starting Iraq's economy.

A petroleum law could also provide some relief from the political fighting by holding out the promise of new revenue streams.

Iraqis Reach An Accord On Oil Revenues (NYT)

By Edward Wong

New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — The Iraqi cabinet approved a draft of a law on Monday that would set guidelines for nationwide distribution of oil revenues and foreign investment in the immense oil industry. The endorsement reflected a major agreement among the country's ethnic and sectarian political blocs on one of Iraq's most divisive issues.

The draft law approved by the cabinet allows the central government to distribute oil revenues to the provinces or regions based on population, which could lessen the economic concerns of the rebellious Sunni Arabs, who fear being cut out of Iraq's vast potential oil wealth by the dominant Shiites and Kurds. Most of Iraq's crude oil reserves lie in the Shiite south and Kurdish north.

The law also grants regional oil companies or governments the power to sign contracts with foreign companies for exploration and development of fields, opening the door for investment by foreign companies in a country whose oil reserves rank among the world's three largest.

Iraqi officials say dozens of major foreign companies, including ones based in the United States, Russia and China, have expressed strong interest in developing fields or have done some work with the Iraqi industry. The national oil law would allow regions to enter into production-sharing agreements with foreign companies, which some Iraqis say could lead to foreigners reaping too much of the country's oil wealth.

Iraqi officials say all such contracts will be subjected to a fair bidding process, but American inspectors have reported that the upper echelons of the government, including the senior ranks of the Oil Ministry, are rife with corruption. There are also fears among non-Americans that American companies could be favored.

But oil industry analysts in the United States say it is unclear whether companies will rush to sign contracts because the law is vague about what legal protections investors would be given.

The oil law and several related measures must still be approved by Parliament before they are enacted. Since the American-led invasion in 2003, Iraqi politics have often been split bitterly along ethnic and sectarian lines, and that kind of conflict could stall the law's passage. Drafts were debated for months by a committee before the cabinet finally approved one.

"At the end of the day, we all supported this thing because it's workable for all the parties," said Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister and the head of the committee.

Distributing revenue by population is not guaranteed to placate the feuding parties because no accurate census exists. There is intense disagreement over demographics in Iraq — many Sunni Arabs insist they are the majority of Iraqis, even though Sunni Arabs are generally estimated to be 20 percent of the population, Kurds 20 percent and Shiite Arabs 60 percent.

If the law is passed, its effect on the oil industry could be enormous, assuming that foreign companies would be willing to work here despite the violence. Iraq has 80 known oil fields, 65 of which will be offered for bids for development contracts, said Hussain al-Shahristani, the oil minister.

Iraqi leaders say they want the 275-member Parliament to approve the law before May. The legislature is in recess but is expected to reconvene next month. American and Iraqi leaders had tried to get the law approved last year, but the effort bogged down at the drafting level. Before the cabinet vote on Monday, the main Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish political blocs agreed to work together to ensure that the law passes Parliament in an expeditious manner, Mr. Shahristani said.

Since last year, senior Bush administration officials and top American commanders here have said a new oil law is crucial to the country's political and economic development, and they have pressured Iraqi leaders relentlessly to make passage of the law a priority.

In recent weeks, Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the senior American envoy here, has been in intense talks with Kurdish leaders in the north to overcome their objections to the draft, which centered on the contracting powers given to the central government versus the regions. Iraqi officials say Mr. Khalilzad's negotiations were crucial to winning unanimous cabinet approval on Monday.

"This is a significant political achievement because leaders representing all of Iraq's communities have demonstrated that they can pull together to resolve difficult issues of vital national importance," Mr. Khalilzad said in a written statement on Monday evening. "The drafting of this framework law was not easy. It presented special challenges for the Iraqi and Kurdistan regional governments, and the leaders of key political blocs."

Several members of the committee overseeing the drafting said in interviews that they were confident that Parliament would ultimately endorse the law, but perhaps only after heated debate.

"It will be tough," Mr. Salih said. "I want to admit it and I want to recognize that. It will be an interesting roller coaster, my friends."

The writers of the draft law tried to balance the powers of regional and central governments, an issue that goes directly to the heart of the Iraq war.

The minority Sunni Arabs, who ruled Iraq for decades before the toppling of Saddam Hussein and are now leading the insurgency, have chafed at rule by the Shiites and Kurds partly because they fear that those two groups might hoard oil wealth for themselves. Sunni Arab leaders have resisted attempts by the Kurds and some Shiite politicians to create laws allowing for greater regional autonomy.

The draft law says that all revenues from current and future oil fields will be collected by the central government and redistributed to regional or provincial governments by population, in theory ensuring an equitable distribution of profits. That method could help assuage Sunni Arabs hostile to Kurdish and Shiite autonomy.

The attitudes of Sunni Arabs could also soften if more oil exploration is done on their land. Iraqi officials recently increased their estimates of the amount of oil and natural gas deposits in Sunni Arab territory after paying tens of millions of dollars to foreign oil companies to re-examine old seismic data across the country and retrain Iraqi petroleum engineers.

Industry and government analysts in and outside Iraq estimate the proven oil reserves at 115 billion barrels. Oil production peaked at 3.7 million barrels a day in 1979, according to the United States Department of Energy. Production stood at 2.6 million barrels a day before the 2003 invasion, but has dropped since.

The oil law's drafters reached agreement on the principle of revenue sharing fairly early in the process. Much more contentious was the issue of signing oil contracts. The Kurds, who have enjoyed de facto independence in the mountainous north since the end of the Persian Gulf war in 1991, argued strongly for regional governments or companies to have full power in signing contracts with foreign companies to develop oil fields. Sunni Arab leaders insisted on keeping this power in the hands of the Oil Ministry. The Shiites fell somewhere in the middle.

The draft law has a compromise: regions can enter into contracts, but a powerful new central body, the Federal Oil and Gas Council, would have the power to prevent the contracts from going forward if they do not meet certain prescribed standards, Mr. Salih said. A panel of oil experts from inside and outside Iraq would advise the federal council on the contracts.

The draft law also re-establishes the state-run Iraq National Oil Company, which was founded in 1964 to oversee oil production but was shut down by Mr. Hussein in 1987. The company would operate separately from the Oil Ministry and use a business model. In addition, any region that can produce at least 150,000 barrels of oil a day can create its own operating company.

Energy analysts said the new law is unlikely to lead to a stampede by foreign companies anytime soon because it leaves too many unresolved issues, including the lack of a mechanism to settle potential disputes between the federal authority and local governments.

"I think the devil is going to be in the details," said Fadel Gheit, an analyst with Oppenheimer & Company in New York. "Oil companies need governments that will honor the contracts they sign and they need a safe environment to operate," he added.

While Mr. Gheit said he expected American and British oil companies to receive preferential treatment in the awarding of contracts, other analysts said Iraqis would be suspicious of awarding preferential deals to American companies.

"Iraqis are extremely protective of their resources," said Rochdi A. Younsi, an analyst at Eurasia Group, a political risk consulting firm. "Given the level of anti-American sentiment, any major American oil company perceived to take advantage of their relations in government would be seen as being part of the so-called conspiracy to take over Iraq's natural resources."

Iraq Approves Draft Oil Legislation (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Iraq's cabinet on Monday approved the draft of a law governing the country's oil industry that would open the door to much-needed investment, officials said.

The law has to be approved by parliament, and several documents need to be written to complete the legislative package governing the oil industry.

But approval by the cabinet, which includes members of the country's three main sectarian-political blocs, the Shia, Sunni Arabs and Kurds, is a step towards ending a months-long stalemate over the powers of Iraq's federal and regional governments.

The US has pressed both Baghdad and the autonomous Kurdistan Regional Government in northern Iraq to produce a law, the absence of which is holding back the foreign investment deemed critical to boosting oil production. Output has fallen to less than 2m barrels per day – down from 2.5m bpd before the war – in a country with the world's third largest reserves.

"This draft law, the endorsement of the cabinet of this legislation, represents a breakthrough for Iraq's political and economic transition," said Barham Salih, Iraq's deputy prime minister. He said that the parties in government were committed to enacting the entire oil legislation package by the end of May.

Zalmay Khalilzad, US ambassador, welcomed the approval of the draft, declaring that it was the "first time since 2003 that all major Iraqi communities have come together on a defining piece of legislation".

It was unclear whether there had been any changes to a draft which the leaders of Iraq's Kurdish parties, who had championed regional control of oil, had approved at the weekend.

But it is unlikely, given months of wrangling, that ministers of the Kurdistan Alliance bloc would have agreed to legislation that seriously diverged from what their leadership had approved.

With Iraqi Boy's Surgery, A Time For Healing (WP)

By Robin Shulman

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

NEW HYDE PARK, N.Y., Feb. 26 -- In a light-filled lobby of a hospital for sick children, an American mother talked on Monday with an Iraqi father about how their lives had been altered and entwined by a war thousands of miles away.

Charlotte Freeman's husband, Capt. Brian Freeman, had been stationed in Iraq, where he worked to bring an 11-year-old Iraqi boy born with a rare heart defect to the United States for lifesaving surgery. That boy is Abu Ali's son.

Last week, the boy, Ali, had the surgery. It was successful, but the occasion turned out to be as painful as it was sweet.

On Jan. 20, the day Abu Ali learned that his long-awaited visas to the United States were likely to come, Freeman, 31, was kidnapped from his office by insurgents and later killed.

Ali has recuperated enough after his Feb. 20 surgery at Schneider Children's Hospital on Long Island to walk around in sandals. A gentle, shy, skinny boy with a megawatt smile, he says he wants to be a soccer star.

"This has been a gift for me," said Charlotte Freeman, 31, who flew in from California with her family this weekend to meet Abu Ali and his son and stay with them at the Ronald McDonald House. She smiled through tears at the boy. "Through Ali, Brian lives," she said.

Ali, the second of five children, was born with a hole between the two upper chambers of his heart, said Fred Bierman, the cardiology chief overseeing Ali's care. Ali's condition was diagnosed in 2005 in Iraq, his father said. Doctors said he would need surgery to survive into adulthood.

But the Iraqi medical system had collapsed, and this surgery was not available.

There was danger in asking for help from Americans and being branded "traitor" or "spy," said Abu Ali, 37, a stocky, gentle man with jet-black hair. He would not reveal his full name for fear of reprisals; his friends believe he is now in Amman, Jordan.

An athlete who trained with the U.S. Olympic bobsled team, Brian Freeman graduated from West Point in 1999. Then in fall 2005, a shortage of officers prompted a call-up of Brian's reserve section, even though many members had only a few months of service remaining.

Brian did not support the war in Iraq and had little desire to participate, Charlotte said. But he felt an obligation to carry the same burden as his West Point classmates.

When he left their home in Temecula, Calif., son Gunnar was nearly 3 and daughter Ingrid was a newborn. From Iraq, he would contact Charlotte every other day with a webcam. He loved it when she put Ingrid in front of the camera so he could watch her face change as she grew.

He didn't talk much about the dangers, Charlotte said; she learned about his close calls only later when she read his e-mails to friends.

As The Washington Post previously reported, he told Charlotte that the Iraqis "didn't want us there." And she knew in December when he cornered Sens. Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.) and John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) at a Baghdad helicopter landing zone and told them that the war was going badly.

But, as a civilian affairs officer, Freeman mainly concerned himself with purifying water and paving roads -- and his private, off-duty cause, a young boy named Ali.

Freeman arranged for sponsorship from Gift of Life International, a New York-based nonprofit that brings poor children with heart ailments to top hospitals.

Freeman also talked to Charlotte about long-term plans of starting a nonprofit to help Iraqi children seeking medical care abroad, a project she hopes to pursue.

On Monday, Ali's doctor said that the boy still has heart-rhythm problems but that his major trouble has been solved and he should be able to travel home in a few weeks.

Ingrid Freeman toddled to Abu Ali and offered a handful of Cheerios. He scooped her up and kissed her wispy hair.

Abu Ali hopes that his son will someday do humanitarian work of his own. But Ali's dreams for now are simple: "I want to stay in America."

Billions Over Baghdad (NYT)

By John B. Taylor

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Stanford, Calif.

EARLIER this month, the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform held a hearing that criticized the decision to ship American currency into Iraq just after Saddam Hussein's government fell. As the committee's chairman, Henry Waxman of California, put it in his opening statement, "Who in their right mind would send 360 tons of cash into a war zone?" His criticism attracted wide attention, feeding antiwar sentiment and even providing material for comedians. But a careful investigation of the facts behind the currency shipment paints a far different picture.

The currency that was shipped into Iraq in the days after the fall of Saddam Hussein's government was part of a successful financial operation that had been carefully planned months before the invasion. Its aims were to prevent a financial collapse in Iraq, put the financial system on a firm footing and pave the way for a new Iraqi currency. Contrary to the criticism that such currency shipments were ill advised or poorly monitored, this financial plan was carried out with precision and was a complete success.

The plan, which had two stages, was designed to work for Iraq's cash economy, in which checks or electronic funds transfers were virtually unknown and shipments of tons of cash were commonplace.

In the first stage, the United States would pay Iraqi government employees and pensioners in American dollars. These were obtained from Saddam Hussein's accounts in American banks, which were frozen after he attacked Kuwait in 1990 and amounted to about $1.7 billion. Since the dollar is a strong and reliable currency, paying in dollars would create financial stability until a new Iraqi governing body was established and could design a new currency. The second stage of the plan was to print a new Iraqi currency for which Iraqis could exchange their old dinars.

The final details of the plan were reviewed in the White House Situation Room by President Bush and the National Security Council on March 12, 2003. I attended that meeting. Treasury Secretary John Snow opened the presentation with a series of slides. "As soon as control over the Iraqi government is established," the first slide read, we plan to "use United States dollars to pay civil servants and pensioners. Later, depending on the situation on the ground, we would decide about the new currency." Another slide indicated that we could ship $100 million in small denominations to Baghdad on one week's notice. President Bush approved the plan with the understanding that we would review the options for a new Iraqi currency later, when we knew the situation on the ground.

To carry out the first stage of the plan, President Bush issued an executive order on March 20, 2003, instructing United States banks to relinquish Mr. Hussein's frozen dollars. From that money, 237.3 tons in $1, $5, $10 and $20 bills were sent to Iraq. During April, United States Treasury officials in Baghdad worked with the military and the Iraqi Finance Ministry officials — who had painstakingly kept the payroll records despite the looting of the ministry — to make sure the right people were paid. The Iraqis supplied extensive documentation of each recipient of a pension or paycheck. Treasury officials who watched over the payment process in Baghdad in those first few weeks reported a culture of good record keeping.

On April 29, Jay Garner, the retired lieutenant general who headed the reconstruction effort in Iraq at the time, reported to Washington that the payments had lifted the mood of people in Baghdad during those first few confusing days. Even more important, a collapse of the financial system was avoided.

This success paved the way for the second stage of the plan. In only a few months, 27 planeloads (in 747 jumbo jets) of new Iraqi currency were flown into Iraq from seven printing plants around the world. Armed convoys delivered the currency to 240 sites around the country. From there, it was distributed to 25 million Iraqis in exchange for their old dinars, which were then dyed, collected into trucks, shipped to incinerators and burned or simply buried.

The new currency proved to be very popular. It provided a sound underpinning for the financial system and remains strong, appreciating against the dollar even in the past few months. Hence, the second part of the currency plan was also a success.

The story of the currency plan is one of several that involved large sums of cash. For example, just before the war, Saddam Hussein stole $1 billion from the Iraqi central bank. American soldiers found that money in his palaces and shipped it to a base in Kuwait, where the United States Army's 336th Finance Command kept it safe. To avoid any appearance of wrongdoing, American soldiers in Kuwait wore pocket-less shorts and T-shirts whenever they counted the money.

Later, American forces used the found cash to build schools and hospitals, and to repair roads and bridges. Gen. David Petraeus has described these projects as more successful than the broader reconstruction effort.

But that wasn't the only source of dollars. Because the new Iraqi dinar was so popular, the central bank bought billions of United States dollars to keep it from appreciating too much. As a result, billions in cash accumulated in the vaults of the central bank. Later, with American help, the Iraqi central bank deposited these billions at the New York Federal Reserve Bank, where they could earn interest.

Finally, when Iraq started to earn dollars selling oil, the United States transferred the cash revenue to the Finance Ministry, where it was used to finance government operations, including salaries and reconstruction. Many of these transfers occurred in 2004, long after the financial stabilization operation had concluded. Iraqi Finance Ministry officials had already demonstrated that they were serious about keeping the controls they had in place. The 360 tons mentioned by Henry Waxman includes these transfers as well as the 237.3 tons shipped in 2003 in the stabilization.

One of the most successful and carefully planned operations of the war has been held up in this hearing for criticism and even ridicule. As these facts show, praise rather than ridicule is appropriate: praise for the brave experts in the United States Treasury who went to Iraq in April 2003 and established a working Finance Ministry and central bank, praise for the Iraqis in the Finance Ministry who carefully preserved payment records in the face of looting, praise for the American soldiers in the 336th Finance Command who safely kept found money, and yes, even praise for planning and follow-through back in the United States.

"Allies" (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

On Oct. 2, 2001, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization took the unprecedented step of formally invoking Article 5 of its 1949 Charter, which says that "an armed attack against one or more of them. . . . shall be considered an attack against all of them." Lord Geoffrey Robertson, then NATO's secretary-general, gave a press conference saying he wanted to "reiterate that the United States of America can rely on the full support of its 18 NATO Allies in the campaign against terrorism."

In recent weeks, we've been reminded once again just how cheap those promises were. On Thursday, Stéphane Dion, who leads Canada's Liberal Party, announced that as prime minister he would bring an end to the country's 2,500-strong military commitment to southern Afghanistan. "Neither Canada, NATO nor the Americans anticipated how violent and dangerous Kandahar would become in 2006," he said, adding that the proper role for Canadian forces is "to win the hearts and minds of the Afghan people."

Also in recent weeks, the Italian government of Romano Prodi briefly collapsed after it was unable to muster the votes to approve the enlargement of a U.S. Army base in Vicenza along with the continuance of Italy's 2,000-man deployment in Afghanistan. George W. Bush has had to plead publicly with NATO nations to increase their troop commitments and -- would it be too much to ask? -- deploy them in areas where they are likely to see combat. To make up for the NATO shortfall, Britain is sending in another 1,400 soldiers, while the U.S. is extending the tour of the Tenth Mountain Infantry Brigade and sending in troops from the 82nd Airborne.

It is a statistical certainty that American and British soldiers will pay a price in blood this spring because their French, Spanish, Italian, German and -- if Mr. Dion has his way -- Canadian counterparts mean to keep their moral slates clean. A century ago that would have been a mark of martial and national dishonor, of "letting the side down." Today, it is a concession to the political reality that most NATO governments cannot muster political support for anything except a "peace mission" in Afghanistan. "If you are non-U.S., implicitly there is a political calculus," says a senior U.S. Army officer about his NATO colleagues. "You are looking over your shoulder to Ottawa. You're asking: 'Will getting five killed-in-action mean a phone call about the wisdom of this particular operation?'"

Afghanistan, of course, was supposed to have been the "good war" -- the war that, unlike Iraq, everyone was willing to fight. Now the best that can be said for France, Germany, Italy and company is that they will not actively stand in the way of its being fought, so long as they're not fighting.

But even that is an improvement over the way some European governments are conducting themselves in the war on terror closer to home. Earlier this month, an Italian court named and indicted 25 CIA officers and five Italian officials for the rendition to Egypt of a cleric named Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr, aka Abu Omar. Germany, too, has issued arrest warrants for 13 CIA officers involved in the abduction (in Macedonia) of a German man of Lebanese descent named Khaled al-Masri. Mr. Masri has since become a cause célèbre back home -- a living indictment of the Bush administration's perfidious approach to fighting terrorism.

In Sheikh Omar's case, even the Italians don't dispute the Egyptian was a dangerous actor: He is believed to have recruited terrorists and plotted an attack on the U.S. embassy in Rome. Mr. Masri, by contrast, is usually depicted as an innocent caught up in a web of CIA intrigue. But as John Rosenthal of the invaluable Transatlantic Intelligencer blog notes, it was German, not American, intelligence that first became intensely concerned about Mr. Masri's activities.

Not two weeks after 9/11, Mr. Masri was already being investigated by authorities in Baden-Württemberg as a "follower of Bin Laden." A classified report from Germany's Federal Bureau of Criminal Investigations notes that Mr. Masri maintained "numerous contacts to dangerous persons and accused suspects in the domain of Islamist terrorism." He had a friendship with a militant Islamist named Reda Seyam, suspected of involvement in the 2002 Bali bombings. He frequented an Islamic Cultural Center known for distributing audiocassettes with such charming messages as "Whoever fights against the Christians, the Jews and their allies is a martyr." It was shut down by Bavarian officials in December 2005 and the organization that ran it was banned.

For all this, Mr. Masri may be guilty of nothing more than fellow-traveling. The same might be said of the German government, which at a minimum involved itself in the abduction it now means to prosecute by agreeing to keep the whole matter secret. "The German government, witness to the entire incident, pretended not to know anything," the German newsweekly Der Spiegel reported in 2005. "In a court of law, such behavior amounts to the suppression of evidence."

The German government also involved itself in another apparent CIA kidnapping in December 2001 of a German citizen and terrorist suspect named Mohammed Haydar Zammar, who was later rendered to his native Syria. Rather than demand his instant repatriation, however, the government of Gerhard Schröder arranged for investigators to interview Mr. Zammer in Syria, in exchange for which it dropped charges against two Syrian agents in Germany. Mr. Zammar remains in a Syrian prison.

None of this need shame the German government: Mr. Zammar is reported to have recruited some of the 9/11 hijackers and his fate is richly deserved. What is shameful is that the same governments that actively colluded with the U.S. to bring the worst terrorist cases to some kind of justice are now bending to the demands of activist prosecutors and the prevailing anti-American mood, and again allowing the U.S. to take the flak for what were often joint operations. For the indicted CIA officers, that flak is less deadly than what the GIs in Afghanistan can look forward to this spring. But the principle is the same.

Asked what he worried about most in wartime, Napoleon is said to have replied, "Allies." Plus ça change.

Sen. Feinstein Seizes On DoJ Documents (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Justice Department performance evaluations released to senators over the weekend further validate concerns that six dismissed U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for political purposes, Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) said yesterday.

Feinstein forwarded the six evaluations to Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) along with a letter urging floor time for her bill, which would reverse a statutory change last year that allows the Bush administration to indefinitely install federal prosecutors without seeking Senate confirmation.

Several of the fired attorneys were involved in political corruption probes in the months before their departures were sought by Justice, including San Diego's Carol Lam, who secured three indictments in the investigation of former GOP Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.). Judiciary Committee Democrats had vowed to subpoena the performance evaluations if the administration did not furnish copies, but the reports only heightened Feinstein's skepticism about Justice's explanation that the dismissed attorneys had performance problems.

"Indeed, contrary to the department's rationalizations to explain their dismissals, in every case the fired U.S. attorney was judged to have a strategic plan and appropriate priorities to meet the needs of the Department and their districts," Feinstein wrote in yesterday's letter, reminding leaders of her bill, which is cosponsored by Judiciary ranking member Arlen Specter (R-Pa.).

U.S. Attorneys Should Be Confirmed (SCRIPPS)

By Dale McFeatters, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard News Service, February 27, 2007

Congress clearly didn't take much notice of an obscure provision the Bush administration slipped into the USA Patriot Act last year. But now it seems clear that the measure is being used to conduct a political purge of U.S. attorneys' offices.

So far, at least eight are known to have been forced out by the Justice Department, and there may be others. The departures were facilitated by a provision that allows the president to appoint interim U.S. attorneys for an indefinite period without the usual Senate confirmation.

The ouster that raised the biggest stink was that of Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney for San Diego, who nailed Randy "Duke" Cunningham, then a senior House Republican, for accepting over $2 million in bribes. The suspicion was that the White House acted because her investigation was still ongoing and widening.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate committee that the firings were all for "performance-related" reasons, although he conceded that the highly respected U.S. attorney in Little Rock, Ark., was forced out so the job could be given to a protege and former aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove.

The "performance-related" defense began to crumble when the department's internal evaluations started to leak out and it turned out that most of the ousted attorneys had been capable, competent and well regarded.

Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee are threatening to summon the dismissed prosecutors to testify and to subpoena their performance evaluations. It would be an opportunity for the eight to rebut a gratuitous slap at their reputations.

Better yet would be to repeal the offending provision. A bill to do that has bipartisan support in the Senate, but is being held up in a procedural wrangle. Let's hope the lawmakers unsnarl the obstacle quickly, because this provision has the potential to give us a badly flawed criminal-justice system.

Congress Wary Of Justice Department Firings (PBS)

PBS News Hour, February 27, 2007

Evaluations of the U.S. attorneys recently dismissed by the Justice Department under a little-known USA Patriot Act provision described them as "well regarded" and "very competent." Analysts discuss the firings and congressional charges of political tampering.

RAY SUAREZ: Margaret Chiara, the U.S. attorney for Western Michigan, suddenly announced her resignation on Friday after five years in the post. Although Chiara herself wouldn't comment, several news accounts report she was forced out by Justice Department officials over differences of views on capital punishment, among other things.

Chiara is the eighth U.S. attorney to resign since December at the government's request. The others: Bud Cummins, from Arkansas; Paul Charlton, of Arizona; Daniel Bogden, Nevada; David Iglesias, New Mexico; John McKay, Seattle; Kevin Ryan, San Francisco; and Carol Lam in San Diego.

Lam recently had won praise for indicting the number-three official at the CIA on corruption charges and for successfully prosecuting former Congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who took $2 million in bribes from defense contractors.

In fact, in recent years, all had received positive job evaluations. However, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has insisted that the prosecutors were replaced because they performed inadequately.

At a Senate hearing last month, California Democrat Dianne Feinstein took issue with that assertion. She's pushing to repeal the law allowing the attorney general to replace sitting U.S. attorneys with temporary replacements indefinitely and without Senate approval.

SEN. DIANNE FEINSTEIN (D), California: I'm very concerned. I've had two of them asked to resign in my state, from major jurisdictions, with major cases ongoing, with substantially good records as prosecutors.

ALBERTO GONZALES, U.S. Attorney General: I would never, ever make a change in a United States attorney position for political reasons or if it would in any way jeopardize an ongoing serious investigation. I just would not do it.

RAY SUAREZ: But in the case of Bud Cummins in Arkansas, the Justice Department did admit he was removed to make way for a former aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove.

Stuart Gerson

DOJ_NMG_0137352

Former Acting Attorney General

Is there any impedance of ongoing investigations or other initiatives so that the public isn't getting effective law enforcement? And I don't see any evidence of that being the case.

Questions raised by the firings

RAY SUAREZ: For more, we're joined by Stuart Gerson. He served as assistant attorney general during the first Bush administration and as acting attorney general under President Clinton. He's now in private practice in Washington.

And Laurie Levenson, she spent eight years as an assistant U.S. attorney in Los Angeles. She's now a professor of criminal law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. Both guests testified on this issue before the Senate Judiciary Committee earlier this month.

And, Prof. Levenson, there are more than 90 federal districts around the country served by U.S. attorneys. Why should the firing of eight attract so much attention?

LAURIE LEVENSON, Loyola Law School: Because it's quite unusual. Although it's not unusual to have the president put in his own appointees, at this stage of the game, midterm, with interims going in, in their place, that is not business as usual, especially when, all of a sudden, we're hearing it's performance-related, and yet the documentation indicates that it may not be.

Big red flags are going on as to whether they're politicizing these U.S. attorneys' offices or trying to centralize power back in Washington. It's just a question mark, because it's so different from what's been done before.

RAY SUAREZ: Mr. Gerson, not business as usual?

STUART GERSON, Former Acting Attorney General: Well, it's unusual, but I think the starting point needs to be, when you're looking at a process that's inherently political, and you're looking at individuals who all of whom have served more than four years, the real question that you need to be asking is: Is there any impedance of ongoing investigations or other initiatives so that the public isn't getting effective law enforcement? And I don't see any evidence of that being the case.

Laurie Levenson

Loyola Law School

[I]f this isn't political, why is it happening now? Why is it happening after the new Patriot Act that allowed the Justice Department to put in interim appointments without having to go through the regular confirmation process?

The impact of the firings

RAY SUAREZ: In several cases, Mr. Gerson, these people were told they were doing a good job in the way that political appointees are told, by performance reviews. And the first time they heard anything negative was when they read it in the newspapers as an explanation for their being forced out.

STUART GERSON: Well, I don't doubt that that's the way that this news was transmitted. And if that's so, perhaps the process was clumsier than it needed to be.

But in the case of at least one of those individuals, who clearly got a favorable report, at least 19 members of Congress felt otherwise, with respect to the level of enforcement of the immigration laws. Now, one can discuss that, but clearly some of the critics of the administration, including Sen. Feinstein, wrote letters to the department, which apparently had influence.

I just don't see any evidence that any case, any investigative initiative has been impaired in any way. Moreover, as I visit U.S. attorneys' offices around the country -- and I do it in connection with my work, sometimes they're my adversaries -- I really don't see any great falloff.

Of course, there are probably some people in some places who are concerned. That's understandable. It's almost always the case. But generally it's business as usual.

The career people who run 95-plus percent of what's going on are working assiduously at what they do. They're not avoiding corruption cases; they're not avoiding the hard cases. They're doing their job. The public is being well-served.

RAY SUAREZ: Prof. Levenson, what's your concern then?

LAURIE LEVENSON: Well, my concern is, frankly, that the offices aren't taking it this way; that is, there is a significant morale issue that's going on here.

Because for the troops -- and they are apolitical, for the most part, who are trying to do the right job -- they have big question marks. Why are their leaders being dismissed?

Likewise, for the judges in those districts, especially, for example, up in Seattle where John McKay was dismissed, they don't understand at all why somebody who has an office that's working well with the courts, is being very successful, is all of a sudden being dismissed.

So I think there is the question about, if there are these new priorities that all of a sudden the Justice Department has to put in, what are they? Are they going to be compatible with what the district needs are?

And, frankly, if this isn't political, why is it happening now? Why is it happening after the new Patriot Act that allowed the Justice Department to put in interim appointments without having to go through the regular confirmation process?

Stuart Gerson

Former Acting Attorney General

The administration has pledged itself to seek the advice and consent of the Senate on every single permanent appointment and to consult with the senators of that state. We'll see if that happens, but that's the pledge.

The new Patriot Act provisions

RAY SUAREZ: Why is it happening now? And has the change in the way replacements are appointed sort of brought attention to these firings?

STUART GERSON: Well, clearly it's brought attention to it, and it's had an affect. The administration has pledged that there will be no permanent appointment that takes place without consultation with the home state senators. That is the usual process.

This Patriot Act change that Prof. Levenson cites is clearly something that members on both sides of the aisle didn't pay sufficient attention to, but the initial reaction of the Feinstein proposal to take this away from the Justice Department and have it reside completely in the judiciary -- a bad idea, it's constitutionally inconsistent with the judicial function -- is now a bill that's been withdrawn, and we're going to return to the old system that worked well enough.

RAY SUAREZ: But let's be clear on what the Patriot Act amendment said. This little change in the reauthorization allows the attorney general to appoint replacements without Senate review, correct?

STUART GERSON: Well, indeed, that has always been the case, originally for 120 days. Now, it was argued that the administration was somehow trying to get around Congress and appoint interim people who would stay there forever.

Well, I think you need to put that in perspective. First, we're dealing with relatively few United States attorneys. It's no more than eight out of 93, so we begin with that. There's no massive effort.

Nor is any of these in a place where there's some critical matter going on that somehow is going to be interrupted. Almost all of the people who have been appointed interims are the same kind of people who have always been appointed interims.

The administration has pledged itself to seek the advice and consent of the Senate on every single permanent appointment and to consult with the senators of that state. We'll see if that happens, but that's the pledge. It's certainly being done in a way that should be transparent.

Laurie Levenson

Loyola Law School

[Y]ou get worried when things like what happened in Arkansas occur, when you have Bud Cummins, who even the Justice Department admits was doing a very good job, he's replaced all of a sudden with somebody who has comparatively little experience...

Selecting replacements

RAY SUAREZ: Professor, you noted that the administration can now make those replacement appointments in perpetuity. But as Mr. Gerson mentioned, the attorney general says he is going to go to the Senate. Does that satisfy you?

LAURIE LEVENSON: It doesn't really satisfy me, because the proof is in the pudding. And you get worried when things like what happened in Arkansas occur, when you have Bud Cummins, who even the Justice Department admits was doing a very good job, he's replaced all of a sudden with somebody who has comparatively little experience at this stage in his career, somebody who worked for Karl Rove, and then, realizing that if they have to put him up permanently he's not going to fly, they withdraw him, makes you wonder, why was he the interim?

Ordinarily I agree with Stuart Gerson that the interim, it would be somebody out of the same office, who's familiar with the operations of the office. But, for example, in San Francisco, Washington is sending out somebody from main Justice, from the Washington, D.C., office, the executive office, not somebody from within the office who knows the office's operations.

RAY SUAREZ: Wasn't the tradition, Mr. Gerson, to take a great deal of advice from the home state, that understands local conditions?

STUART GERSON: Absolutely, Ray. But what Prof. Levenson just cited is an interesting case, because the current director of the FBI, Bob Mueller, was, at one point in his career, sent from Washington to be the United States attorney in San Francisco to put an office that lacked sufficient direction, in the view of the main Justice Department, get it going in a stronger, more vigorous way.

And my understanding is that's the intention this time, as well, with respect to San Francisco. And there have not been great criticisms that have been leveled, at least with respect to that particular office.

San Diego has been a little bit noisier situation. But, again, it doesn't appear that it's reflective of anything other than, in that case, succumbing to criticism from the outside.

Prof. Levenson does cite one case, where Paul McNulty agreed that it was a political motivation. The fellow who was made the interim United States attorney was somebody who I think was considered to be a political future who they wanted to give a little exposure to. He had certainly more experience starting out than the incumbent had when he started out. And the process and the dispute of this probably has cost that gentleman any real shot at a permanent position.

So it's politics. I don't know that it's healthy or unhealthy politics. This is something that's committed to the executive branch. It is a political decision; it can be debated.

And I think, when you really get down to it, that's the season that we're in with the new congressional majority. They're certainly entitled to take a look at this. There ought to be oversight; there will be. But I can guarantee you, this is not going to be an issue come election time.

RAY SUAREZ: Professor, what would you be looking out for in these various federal districts, as these attorneys' offices change hands, to know whether this is malign or benign, if your worst fears are being realized?

LAURIE LEVENSON: That's a great question. I think a couple of things. One is that there are some of these offices who have some high visibility political corruption cases, and whether those continue or whether those are downplayed under a new administration is a big question.

The second thing is whether the Justice Department holds true to its word, whether they put up people who they're ready to put through the confirmation process, and also whether they paused to ask, "Well, maybe we should start that process rather than just going the interim route. Maybe we should see if we can get our priorities in place, without taking people who have a well-operating office, removing them, and creating these questions among the AUSAs who work for them."

RAY SUAREZ: Prof. Levenson, Stuart Gerson, thank you both.

LAURIE LEVENSON: Thank you.

Ashcroft Pizza Party Raises Ethics Eyebrows (USNEWS)

By Chitra Ragavan

U.S. News and World Report, February 27, 2007

A pizza luncheon to be hosted this Wednesday by former Attorney General turned consultant John Ashcroft for some of his old political appointees has raised eyebrows in the Justice Department's ethics office, U.S. News has learned. The ethics office, which provides Justice employees with guidance on a wide range of ethics questions, has not instructed invitees not to attend the lunch.

However, it has "advised invitees to consider the appearance of attending such an event," Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse told U.S. News. But Juleanna Glover Weiss, an adviser and spokesperson for his consulting firm, told U.S. News that "General Ashcroft has abided by the letter and spirit of all post government service ethics restrictions." Wednesday's lunch, Weiss said, "is just a small social gathering."

Executive branch employees must comply with stringent standards of ethical conduct pertaining to accepting gifts or items of monetary value from anyone wanting to do official business with their agency, including their old colleagues and bosses. The ethics office has told political appointees at Justice that if they attend the Ashcroft pizza luncheon, it would "count toward the $20/occasion and $50/year limits."

Typically, former government officials must abide by a one-year "cooling off" period before lobbying or soliciting business from their former agency. But there are longer restrictions when it comes to contacting old colleagues on specific matters. The department did not elaborate on what aspect of Ashcroft's lunch invitation gave the ethics office pause.

Ashcroft was the first top official to step down after President George Bush won a second term. He submitted his letter of resignation in November 2004 and left in February 2005. At his last Justice Department annual Christmas party, Ashcroft told reporters that he was not seeking any outside employment until he had completely left the department, in order to protect the department's institutional interests and avoid even the faintest appearance of any conflicts resulting from a job search.

Ashcroft subsequently created his own consulting firm, the Ashcroft Group, which quickly became a profitable venture. The firm specializes in strategic consulting, including with respect to homeland security, best business practices, litigation strategy, and data security. On the group's website, Aschroft parlays his leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, to pitch for homeland security business.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Dismisses Suit Over Transfer Agent (WSJ)

By Chad Bray

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

A federal judge dismissed a Securities and Exchange Commission lawsuit that accused two former Citigroup Inc. executives of cheating mutual-fund customers out of millions of dollars in savings through the use of an affiliated transfer agent.

U.S. District Judge Richard C. Casey in Manhattan granted a summary judgment motion by Thomas W. Jones, the former chief executive of Citigroup Asset Management, and Lewis E. Daidone, the former treasurer and chief financial officer of the Smith Barney family of funds.

The SEC had requested civil penalties, a permanent injunction against the men and disgorgement. "The commission's action for civil penalties and an injunction are time-barred, and its action for disgorgement is not supported by sufficient facts," the judge said.

The SEC had alleged that Citigroup's asset-management business took most of the benefit of a discount from using an affiliated transfer agent for itself, rather than passing on that savings to the mutual funds and their customers. The regulator had claimed Jones and Daidone were "principally responsible" for the alleged scheme.

Citigroup settled the SEC's charges in May 2005 and agreed to pay $208 million to mutual-fund customers allegedly victimized by the transfer-agent arrangements. In settling, the financial-services giant didn't admit or deny wrongdoing.

An SEC spokesman didn't comment.

American Century/Kopp Funds

American Century Investments acquired the mutual-fund assets of Minnesota-based Kopp Investment Advisors for an undisclosed sum. Kopp Emerging Growth Fund and Kopp Total Quality Management Fund, with total assets of $225 million, have been merged into American Century New Opportunities II Fund and American Century Equity Growth Fund, respectively. The Kansas City, Mo.-based American Century manages $104 billion in assets.

S.E.C. Says Firm Traded On Information Stolen From Computers (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

An accounting firm in Hong Kong made $2.7 million from illegal insider trades by hacking into computers to view press releases before they were published, the Securities and Exchange Commission said yesterday in a lawsuit.

The S.E.C. sued the company, Blue Bottle, a Hong Kong-chartered firm that says it is based in London, and its chief executive, Matthew Charles Stokes. Blue Bottle made $2.7 million by hacking into computer systems shortly before the release of market-moving information, the S.E.C. said in a complaint filed in Federal District Court in Manhattan.

A Blue Bottle spokesman could not immediately be reached for comment. An S.E.C. lawyer did not immediately return a call. The suit seeks an injunction barring further wrongdoing as well as the recovery of any illicit trading profits.

The S.E.C. says Blue Bottle made 12 illegal trades this year. In one instance, Blue Bottle bought options to sell shares of BJ's Wholesale Club, at 3:36 p.m. on Jan. 3, the S.E.C. said. The next day, shares in BJ's fell 4 percent after the company said its predicted earnings would fall below expectations.

Blue Bottle made about $12,000 from trading on BJ's, the S.E.C. said.

In another instance cited by the S.E.C., Blue Bottle began buying options to sell Symantec, the maker of computer antivirus software, at 1:03 p.m. on Jan. 12. The next trading day, Symantec said third-quarter earnings in 2007 would be less than forecast, driving shares down by 13 percent.

Blue Bottle made more than $1 million from the Symantec trading, the S.E.C. said.

Based on "the disparate companies" in which Blue Bottle traded, the timing of the trades and the profit they generated, the S.E.C. said it believed that the firm tapped into computer systems to obtain nonpublic data. The commission said it was continuing to investigate how Blue Bottle obtained the information.

Review Clears Bristol-Myers (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Bristol-Myers Squibb, the drug maker, has been cleared of securities law violations in connection with its botched Plavix patent settlement last year, the company said yesterday in a regulatory filing.

DOJ_NMG_0137356

The company said that it has been informed by the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, that a review found no violation of securities laws or breach of an earlier consent order the company had signed with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The review was done by Frederick Lacey, a former federal judge who had been appointed to oversee operations as part of a deferred prosecution agreement the company signed in 2005. That was meant to settle accusations that it had misled investors through inventory manipulation.

The filing, submitted to the S.E.C. late yesterday, said that Mr. Christie's office had advised the company that the matters had been "fully remediated" and that he did not intend to take action.

In a statement last night, Bristol-Myers said the decision suggested that the company was on track to bring an end to the deferred prosecution agreement in Newark as scheduled on June 15.

"If the company fulfills its obligations under the deferred prosecution agreement, we expect the U.S. Attorney for the district of New Jersey would dismiss the complaint against the company on June 15," the company said in a statement.

The decision resolves one potential federal case for Bristol-Myers, which remains under criminal investigation by the Justice Department's antitrust division.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Deliberations In Libby Trial Proceed With Only 11 Jurors (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors in Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury and obstruction trial begin their fourth full day of deliberations today minus one of their original colleagues.

Judge Reggie Walton dismissed a juror Monday after determining she had improper contact with information about the trial "outside the courtroom" during the weekend.

Walton then granted the defense's request that the remaining 11 jurors continue deliberating without a replacement.

Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, argued that the jurors — seven women and four men — were "obviously making progress" in the deliberations, which started Wednesday around midday.

Chief prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald had asked the judge to seat an alternate juror and to restart deliberations.

The dismissed juror was a middle-age woman who had described herself during jury selection as a former curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City. On Valentine's Day, she was the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt to court as part of the jury's "valentine" to Walton.

Shortly after jurors began deliberations Monday morning, the foreperson sent Walton a note indicating that one or more jurors appeared to have been exposed to inappropriate information.

Walton interviewed jurors for about 45 minutes before dismissing the woman. He said that her contact with outside information was accidental and that she didn't share it with fellow jurors.

"What she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her," Walton said. He did not elaborate.

Jurors are not sequestered but are warned each day by the judge to avoid reading, viewing, listening to or discussing reports about the trial.

Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with obstruction of justice and lying to grand jurors and FBI investigators looking into how a CIA officer's identity was leaked to reporters during June and July 2003.

The charges against Libby are based on differing stories he and two reporters, Tim Russert of NBC and Matthew Cooper, formerly of Time, told investigators about their talks.

University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias said he interpreted Wells' motion as a sign the defense believes deliberations are favoring Libby and that Wells does not wish to break that momentum.

"The dynamic might change anytime you have a deliberative body whose composition suddenly changes after a long period together," Tobias said.

Philip Anthony, a jury consultant based in Los Angeles, said the juror's absence will create "a noticeable hole in the fabric of the jury. … No doubt this particular juror had an affinity or even (an) alliance with certain other members of the panel."

No Verdict Yet From Remaining Libby Jury (AP)

By Michael Sniffen

DOJ_NMG_0137357

AP, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- After the judge dismissed one of its members, the jury finished a fourth day of deliberations Monday without a verdict in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Most of the morning was consumed by deciding what to do about an art historian on the jury who saw or read something over the weekend about the trial. After interviewing her in private along with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton ruled that "what she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her."

The judge let the jurors continue deliberating with just 11 members after the defense endorsed that option. He overruled prosecutors who asked him to seat one of two alternate jurors who heard the trial and remain on standby.

Walton said he didn't want to "throw away two and a half days" of discussions the jury has had since getting the case at midday last Wednesday. If an alternate had been seated, the jury would have been required to begin its deliberations over from the beginning.

The jury returns Tuesday.

Libby, who was chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is accused of obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, whose husband was a prominent Iraq war critic.

Walton never disclosed what the juror had seen, but he concluded the exposure was not intentional and resulted from a misunderstanding of his orders. He has ordered jurors to avoid media coverage of the case and to stay off the Internet.

The dismissed juror formerly served as a curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. She was also the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt as part of the jury's Valentine's Day greeting to the court.

Usually defense attorneys want the largest number of jurors available because they only need one to hold out against conviction in order to force a mistrial, said Lawrence Barcella, a prominent Washington defense attorney who spent 16 years here as a federal prosecutor. "This is surely a well thought out calculation for the defense based on the jurors they have, the way they guess the deliberations might be going, and who the alternate would be."

Ultimately, however, decisions like this are "guesswork, tempered by the experience and instincts of very experienced attorneys who have demonstrated good instincts," Barcella said.

Libby Juror Dismissed; Panel Of 11 Continues Deliberations (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The woman was exposed to information about the trial of Dick Cheney's former chief of staff.

A juror was dismissed Monday from hearing the perjury and obstruction case against I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, but the judge allowed the panel to continue deliberations with 11 members.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton discharged the juror, a former art museum curator, after the woman acknowledged being exposed to information about the case during the weekend, when court was not in session.

Walton did not detail the nature or extent of the contacts, which he said were brought to his attention by the jury foreperson. He expressed concern to the lawyers that other jurors might have been tainted, but after interviewing each, the judge concluded the remaining seven women and four men could continue to serve.

"She did have contact with information related to this case," Walton said in court. "It wasn't intentional on her part. It was a misunderstanding of what I had been telling her throughout the trial."

The incident was one of the few signs of life from the jury since it began deliberations Wednesday. Walton called the other jurors into court Monday, and underscored that they should avoid reading or hearing anything about the case during the trial.

Federal court rules permit the judge to move forward with the smaller panel, although the government prosecutor urged him Monday to tap one of two alternate jurors still available for a full 12-member jury.

Special Prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald said the smaller panel put the trial on "dangerous territory" if another juror were to become ill or be dismissed because of media exposure.

But Walton expressed concern that adding a juror would require the panel to restart deliberations. "I just don't think it would be appropriate to throw away those 2 1/2 days of deliberations," he said. "I don't have anything to suggest that this jury is anything but conscientious and can continue."

Defense lawyer Theodore V. Wells Jr. supported his move, saying that restarting deliberations would be "prejudicial to Mr. Libby."

"It's not like by going to 11 we're on the cliff of some mistrial," Wells told the judge.

One observer said the lawyers' opposing views on the size of the jury suggested each was seeking a tactical advantage. "At the very least, it probably means that Fitzgerald liked the alternates and Wells did not," said Guy Singer, a Washington lawyer and former Justice Department prosecutor.

The dismissed juror had demonstrated an independent streak, which could have assisted the defense.

When the trial was about to resume on Valentine's Day, jurors paraded into Walton's courtroom with red shirts marked with white hearts. The only one to abstain from the sartorial statement was the former curator, who worked at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York.

A conviction would require that all jurors find guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; the woman's lack of participation suggested she might not be inclined to go along with the pack.

"Typically the defense would not be happy about losing a potential holdout juror," Singer said.

The jury deliberated Monday and is to resume this morning.

Libby, 56, once Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff and national security advisor, is charged with covering up his participation in the events leading to the summer 2003 disclosure of then-CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. Plame's husband, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, accused the Bush administration of twisting prewar intelligence in an opinion article for the New York Times a few days before his wife's identity was publicly revealed.

Juror Dismissed At CIA Leak Trial (CBS)

CBS News, February 27, 2007

Judge Orders Juror Removed After Exposure To Information About Case

(CBS/AP) A federal judge avoided a potential mistrial in the CIA leak case Monday by dismissing a juror and sending the other 11 back to continue deliberating the fate of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said the juror had seen or read something over the weekend about Libby's trial.

"What she had exposure to obviously disqualifies her," the judge said.

He did not say what the juror had seen but characterized it as a misunderstanding.

Walton originally feared several jurors were tainted, raising the specter of a mistrial in the politically charged case. Libby is accused of lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity.

After questioning jurors behind closed doors, however, Walton said the remaining seven women and four men were not affected. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald Walton asked the judge to call on one of two alternates, both women, who sat through the trial and are on standby.

But Walton said that would require deliberations to begin fresh and said he didn't want to "throw away 2 1/2 days" of discussions. Instead, he sided with Libby's lawyers and allowed deliberations to continue with 11 jurors — something allowed under federal law in such situations.

CBS News Justice Department reporter Deridre Hester reports the jurors were reminded to be vigilant about staying away from information about this case.

"They should continue with their deliberations and I will emphasize again the importance of not having contact with any outside information," Walton said.

The woman who was dismissed from the jury is an art history expert and scholar who formerly served as a curator of prints at the Metropolitan Museum of Art. She was also the only juror who did not wear a red T-shirt as part of the jury's Valentine's Day greeting to the court.

"There is no way to tell which side this helps until, of course, we get a verdict," says CBS News legal analyst Andrew Cohen.

"The worst scenario would have been a mistrial because the whole jury was tainted," Cohen says. "The second-worst case would have been had the jury been forced to start deliberations from scratch with an alternate juror taking the place of the dismissed one. So while this is a wrinkle, it's actually about the best possible outcome given what happened."

Cohen warns, however, that "if Libby is convicted, we may see this little problem emerge again on appeal."

Judge Dismisses Juror In Libby Trial (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — The judge presiding over the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. dismissed one of the jurors in the midst of deliberations Monday and ruled that the case should go forward with the remaining 11-member jury.

The judge, Reggie B. Walton, said the dismissed juror had improperly learned some information about the case outside of the courtroom, but he did not explain further. Judge Walton said it appeared the juror had not done so intentionally but through some unspecified misunderstanding.

After questioning the jurors, Judge Walton said no one else had been tainted by the information. Jurors are supposed to decide cases solely on the evidence and testimony presented in the trial. Deliberations resumed after the juror was dismissed and are to continue on Tuesday.

The dismissed juror was a woman who had worked for years as a curator at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York, before moving to Washington. Judge Walton ruled, over the objections of the prosecution, that he would not replace her with one of two alternates on standby and would instead have the remaining 11 jurors continue to try to decide the case.

"I don't think it would be appropriate to throw away those two and a half days," he said, referring to the more than 18 hours of deliberations the jurors had completed by Monday morning.

If Judge Walton had replaced the juror, he would have been required to instruct the newly reconstituted jury to begin its deliberations from the beginning, as if there had been no previous discussions.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's lead defense lawyer, said that to add a new juror and restart deliberations would be prejudicial to his client. "It would be inappropriate and unfair" to discard the deliberations thus far, Mr. Wells argued.

Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said that the government believed a replacement juror should be seated and that there was no doubt the 11 remaining jurors would follow the judge's instructions to begin their deliberations anew.

But Judge Walton said he did not want to "throw away" the time the jury had already spent considering the case.

The alternates are two women who sat through the entire case as part of a panel of 14 jurors and were informed by Judge Walton that they were alternates only just before deliberations began. He told them at the time that they could be recalled to participate in the deliberations if needed and warned them to continue to abide by his instructions to avoid any news coverage of the case.

The decision by Mr. Libby's defense team to urge that the trial proceed without a new 12th juror seemed to be counter to conventional wisdom in such situations, lawyers said.

Because a unanimous jury is needed for a guilty verdict, a defendant need convince only one juror of his innocence to avoid a conviction. As a result, lawyers said, defense lawyers prefer to have as many sitting jurors as possible to increase the chances of having someone who refuses to vote for a guilty verdict.

But Neal R. Sonnett, a Miami lawyer who is the former president of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, said there were often other factors at play. Mr. Libby's defense team would have made a judgment about the alternate's inclination toward the case, Mr. Sonnett said.

"The lawyers are always looking at who that person would be," he said. "And then they are engaging in a little mind-reading, trying to guess from that person's body language" whether it would be helpful or harmful to insert him into the deliberations.

In this case, the replacement juror would have been a middle-aged woman who identified herself as an insurance industry consultant. Some reporters at the trial observed her taking notes assiduously during the monthlong proceedings.

The dismissed juror was also notable in that she was the only one of the pool of 14 who declined to don a T-shirt with a heart on Valentine's Day as a gesture of good will to the judge and the court staff.

Mr. Libby, who is known by his nickname, Scooter, is the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. He is charged with five felony counts, accused of lying to a grand jury and F.B.I. agents investigating the leak in the summer of 2003 of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson.

Her identity was first disclosed publicly in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. Only days earlier, The New York Times had published an Op-Ed article by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, asserting that the Bush White House had willfully distorted intelligence as to whether Iraq had tried to obtain uranium from Africa to bolster the case for going to war.

Mr. Fitzgerald, who was named special counsel for the investigation, never charged anybody with illegally leaking Ms. Wilson's name. But he said Mr. Libby had discussed Ms. Wilson in conversations with two reporters and had denied under oath having done so. Mr. Libby's lawyers said that the reporters were mistaken about those conversations and that, in any event, any misstatements he made were a result of innocent failures of memory.

Judge Dismisses Libby Juror After Reports Of Media Exposure (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- After the judge dismissed one of its members, the jury finished a fourth day of deliberations Monday without a verdict in the perjury trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Court officials dismissed a female juror after learning she had been exposed to information about the case over the weekend. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he was sending the juror home "based on acknowledgement that she did have contact with information" related to the case. He said the contact "wasn't intentional."

Judge Walton said the remaining jury of seven women and four men had not been tainted and said he would allow deliberations to continue with 11 jurors rather than calling on one of two alternate jurors. "They should continue with their deliberations and I will emphasize again the importance of not having contact with any outside information," Judge Walton said.

Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald asked that Judge Walton call on one of two alternates, both women, who sat through the trial and are on standby. Judge Walton said that would require deliberations to begin fresh and said he didn't want to "throw away two and a half days."

The jury returns Tuesday.

Since Wednesday, jurors have issued only brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses. Mr. Libby and his lawyers have remained in or around the downtown courthouse throughout the deliberations.

The trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress.

The Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. The jurors were weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Mr. Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

Mr. Libby is charged with two counts of perjury, two counts of making false statements and one count of obstruction of justice. He faces up to 30 years in prison and $1.25 million in fines if found guilty.

Juror Is Dismissed From Libby Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The jury considering whether I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby is guilty of perjury lost one of its members after nearly three days of deliberation yesterday, but the presiding judge ordered the panel to continue working to reach a decision.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton dismissed the juror, an art curator in her 70s, after she disclosed to her peers that she had come in contact over the weekend with information about the case of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff.

The jury foreperson reported that to Walton, who interviewed the jurors and determined that the female juror had not intentionally sought to ignore his orders to avoid contact with media coverage and all other information about the Libby case.

Walton agreed with a defense request that the jury continue deliberating with 11 members, rebuffing Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who asked that the judge call back one of two alternates and begin deliberations again. The jury had been deliberating since Wednesday afternoon.

"I just don't think it would be appropriate to throw away those 2 1/2 days of deliberations," Walton said. "I don't have anything to suggest that this jury is anything but conscientious and can continue."

If the jury were to lose another member, the judge said, he would call upon one of the two remaining alternates and instruct jurors to restart deliberations.

According to courthouse sources, the woman sought information that led her to material about the case over the weekend and realized yesterday morning that it was inappropriate to do so. Courthouse officials said Walton instructed the dismissed juror not to talk to the media until the case concludes.

After the juror was dismissed, the panel completed a fourth day of deliberations without reaching a verdict.

Libby, 56, is charged with making false statements, perjury and obstructing a probe into who may have criminally leaked information about undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame to the media in 2003. He is not charged with the leak, but Fitzgerald has accused him of lying to conceal his role in discussing her identity with reporters.

Plame's name and classified CIA role were disclosed in a syndicated column on July 14, 2003, days after her husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, publicly accused the administration of twisting intelligence to justify war with Iraq.

On Feb. 8, another juror revealed that she had inadvertently seen a photo and headline about witness Tim Russert, NBC News's Washington bureau chief, in The Washington Post's Style section. Federal marshals have been cutting all references to the trial from jurors' morning newspapers but had missed that story.

During questioning of potential jurors before the trial began, the juror dismissed yesterday said she grew up in New York, attended Syracuse University and Mills College, and obtained a doctorate in art history from the University of London. She said she worked for a decade at the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York as a curator of prints and drawings.

In questioning to select a jury, she said she was sympathetic to what would become one of the defense's central contentions: that people can have innocent distortions of their memory.

Ex-Ney Aide Pleads Guilty To Conspiracy (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

The top aide to convicted former Rep. Bob Ney pleaded guilty Monday to federal conspiracy charges stemming from a congressional bribery scandal that downed his boss.

Smiling nervously at times, William Heaton, 28, acknowledged accepting a golf trip to Scotland, expensive meals, and tickets to sporting events between 2002 and 2004 as payoffs for helping clients of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Heaton worked for Ney, R-Ohio, from September 2001 to July 2006, ultimately serving as his chief of staff.

"You received things of value in exchange for performing functions for Mr. Abramoff and other lobbyists who worked for him, as well as a foreign businessman. Is that correct?" U.S. District Judge Ellen Segal Huvelle asked Heaton during the 20-minute hearing.

"Yes, your honor," Heaton replied in a firm voice. He pleaded guilty to one count of federal conspiracy.

He faces a maximum sentence of five years in prison and $250,000 in fines, but probably would serve between 18 and 24 months as outlined under federal sentencing guidelines. No date was set for sentencing.

Heaton has agreed to give the Justice Department information that might be useful in an ongoing investigation that has targeted lobbyists, lawmakers, their aides and members of the Bush administration.

Among other things, Heaton acknowledged accepting trips to New Orleans and Lake George, N.Y., an Adirondack resort village. He also took what Assistant U.S. Attorney James A. Crowell IV and other prosecutors described as thousands of dollars worth of gambling chips from a foreign businessman at a casino during a travel stop in London. The unnamed businessman was hoping to sell U.S.-made airplanes and airplane parts in a foreign country.

In exchange, Heaton said he helped Ney insert an amendment into election reform legislation to benefit at least one Indian tribe in Texas that was an Abramoff client. And he lobbied the State Department for a travel visa for the daughter of another Abramoff client in Russia.

Heaton underreported how much the Scotland trip was worth and its purpose on Ney's congressionally required travel disclosure forms. He admitted he helped conceal some of the money Ney received, storing it in a safe in the congressman's office.

He also lied on his own House financial disclosure forms, describing the golf trip as official travel and failing to report gifts Abramoff gave him.

Heaton, a 2000 graduate of the College of William & Mary, declined to comment to reporters as he left Huvelle's courtroom. Before becoming Ney's chief of staff, he was a floor assistant to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., and worked for the Committee on House Administration, which Ney once chaired.

DOJ_NMG_0137362

Ney was sentenced to 2 1/2 years in prison in January for trading political favors for golf trips, campaign donations and other gifts in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. Ney was the first congressman charged in the affair.

Ney's Former Chief Of Staff Agrees To Plead Guilty (HILL)

By Jackie Kucinich And Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 27, 2007

William Heaton, former chief of staff to then-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), has agreed to plead guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit fraud, according to court documents filed yesterday.

Heaton's plea agreement comes just days before the former lawmaker will report to federal prison in West Virginia for corruption charges. Ney is scheduled to enter prison March 1.

According to the plea agreement, Heaton could receive up to five years in jail and a fine of $250,000.

Heaton has become the second member of Ney's staff to be ensnared in the scandal involving imprisoned lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who bribed Ney and his staff with lavish trips and gifts in return for official favors. Heaton's predecessor, Neil Volz, was sentenced last year for conspiracy charges.

According to court documents, Heaton, who began working for Ney in September 2001 as an executive assistant, rose quickly to the position of chief of staff when his co-conspirator Volz left the position to work for Abramoff in February 2002.

Heaton's involvement in the Abramoff scandal spanned from August 2002 until August 2004, according to the documents.

Over those two years, Heaton accepted numerous favors from Abramoff and other members of his lobbying firm, including a now-infamous all-expense-paid golf trip to Scotland. Heaton was also was one of several recipients of a number of other trips abroad, concert and sporting-event tickets, meals and gambling chips, all taken with full knowledge the gifts were in exchange for official favors from Ney.

During one of those trips, Heaton and another staffer helped Ney conceal $5,000 brought into the country through customs and stored the money in a safe inside Ney's congressional office. Court documents said Heaton "open[ed] the safe as requested so that Ney could make repeated withdrawals."

Heaton knowingly falsified his 2002 and 2003 financial disclosure forms and assisted Ney in misrepresenting his travel disclosure form about the receipt of gifts from Abramoff and others.

"The FBI has made combating public corruption at all levels of government one of its top investigative priorities, because American taxpayers deserve honesty from public officials and employees," said Assistant Director Chip Burrus of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division. "No corrupt public servant is exempt from FBI scrutiny. We will continue to pursue those like Will Heaton who sell their integrity at the public's expense."

Heaton's guilty plea comes well after three other former staffers, Michael Scanlon, Tony Rudy and Neil Volz, pled guilty for their roles in the Abramoff scandal.

The case against Ney was first mentioned in Scanlon's indictment. In that filing, prosecutors singled out Ney, mentioned then only as "Representative No. 1," as the target of Scanlon's illegal lobbying, asserting that the lawmaker accepted gifts, including the 2002 golf trip to Scotland and regular meals at Abramoff's restaurant, "in exchange for a series of official acts and influence."

The staffers, however, all appear to be cooperating with prosecutors. The sentencing dates or status conferences for each continue to be postponed, a bad sign for other lawmakers or staffers close to the scandal who could become targets of the probe.

Under a plea bargain entered more than a year ago, Scanlon, Abramoff's business partner and former aide to ex-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), pled guilty to conspiracy to defraud the U.S. After being postponed several times, last week his status conference was reset again for June 5.

Scanlon has agreed to pay back $19.6 million in kickbacks he received from the fees Abramoff charged Indian tribes and faces anywhere between four years and three months to five years and three months in prison.

Volz, a former senior aide to Ney and a lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig, pled guilty to one count of conspiracy in early May last year. In late January, prosecutors agreed to defer his status conference to April 26.

Volz faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. But his sentence could be lessened, depending on how much he cooperates with prosecutors.

Rudy, a former DeLay aide, a colleague of Abramoff's and a lobbyist at Alexander Strategy Group, pled guilty March 31, 2006 to one count of conspiracy. His status conference was originally scheduled for July 11, 2006, but has been postponed several times, most recently in early January. It is now set for April 19.

Rudy could serve a maximum of five years in jail, but his cooperation already has helped to whittle that down to a range of two years to two years and six months.

Former Aide To Ex-Congressman Ney Pleads Guilty In Abramoff Case (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

A former chief of staff to then-Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio) pleaded guilty yesterday to corruption charges stemming from accepting gifts, gambling chips and trips -- including an expense-paid junket to Scotland with his boss -- from former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and a foreign businessman.

The plea agreement by William Heaton revealed for the first time that Ney kept some of his ill-gotten gains -- $5,000 in British pounds -- in a safe in his congressional office. Heaton, who worked for Ney from 2001 until last year, admitted that he helped the congressman stash the money and periodically opened the safe at Ney's request so he could get to the cash, prosecutors said.

Ney, who resigned last year, pleaded guilty and was sentenced last month to 30 months in prison.

Heaton, 28, admitted to conspiring with Ney, Abramoff and others to accept pricey vacations, meals, drinks, golf outings, tickets to entertainment events and contributions to Ney's campaign in exchange for actions by the congressman that benefited Abramoff's clients. None of those clients, including Indian tribes and foreign businessmen, lived in Ohio, the congressman's state.

Along with Ney and others, Heaton went on a now-infamous trip to golf on world-renowned courses in St. Andrews, Scotland, that cost Abramoff $160,000. He also went on junkets to New Orleans and to the Sagamore resort near Lake George, N.Y., with former Ney chief of staff and Abramoff lobbyist Neil G. Volz, who has also pleaded guilty in the bribery scandal.

Heaton, the ninth person to be convicted in the Abramoff investigation, also admitted that he received hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of gambling chips from a foreign businessman who has been identified by Ney's attorney as Fouad al-Zayat, a high-rolling London gambler who sought Ney's help in circumventing a law barring the sale of U.S.-made airplanes and airplane parts to other countries.

A former congressional page who attended the College of William and Mary, Heaton became Ney's chief of staff at age 23, making him the youngest chief of staff on Capitol Hill at the time. Heaton resigned from that position last June as the federal investigation zeroed in on Ney.

Appearing in court before U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle, Heaton said little other than "Yes, your honor" and "No, your honor" in response to questions. He pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy -- a fraction of the charges he could have faced.

Huvelle told Heaton that he faces a prison term of 18 months to two years under sentencing guidelines outlined in his plea agreement. Justice Department prosecutor John Crowell said the government plans to seek a lesser sentence in exchange for Heaton's cooperation in the investigation.

But the judge warned Heaton that she could give him a tougher sentence, something that she and a magistrate judge have done previously in the Abramoff case. After Ney's guilty plea last month to one count each of conspiracy and making false statements, Huvelle handed down a 30-month sentence, three months longer than prosecutors recommended.

Heaton also admitted falsifying his and Ney's financial disclosure forms in 2002 and 2003 to keep gifts secret. For example, Ney's forms said the Scotland trip was paid for by the National Center for Public Policy Research so he could meet with Scottish parliamentarians, though the Scottish Parliament was not in session, and attend a military parade.

Heaton, who had a small group of family members in the audience, surrendered his passport. At his lawyer's request, the judge agreed to let him travel with prior notice to see family in New York and North Carolina pending sentencing.

"No corrupt public servant is exempt from FBI scrutiny," FBI Assistant Director Chip Burrus said. "We will continue to pursue those like Will Heaton who sell their integrity at the public's expense."

Also convicted in the scandal were Abramoff, who along with business partner Adam Kidan is in prison for a related fraud case in Florida; Volz, who pleaded guilty to conspiracy; Tony Rudy, a lobbyist and onetime aide to former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.); David H. Safavian, a former chief of staff for the General Services Administration, who is appealing his conviction for lying about going on the Scotland trip; Michael Scanlon, a former Abramoff business partner and DeLay aide; and Roger G. Stillwell, a former Interior Department official, who was sentenced to two years' probation.

How High-Living Founder Of BetonSports Fell, Fled (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller And Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137364

Gary Kaplan used to throw lavish parties in Costa Rica and plaster the name of his thriving online gambling company on New York City buses. Now, the 48-year-old founder of BetonSports PLC and the multibillion-dollar industry he helped spawn are in reduced circumstances -- the man on the run, the industry in disarray.

Mr. Kaplan is a fugitive from a racketeering conspiracy and fraud indictment filed last year in a St. Louis federal court charging him with heading a criminal enterprise that illegally took in over $3.5 billion in wagers since 2001.

Several Kaplan colleagues have also been charged, including former BetonSports chief executive David Carruthers, who was arrested at the Dallas-Fort Worth airport in July during a brief stopover on a flight from London to the company's headquarters in San José, Costa Rica. Mr. Carruthers and several others charged in the case have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial. Mr. Kaplan's whereabouts are unknown.

The Kaplan indictment is part of a broader federal crackdown in which several executives from other foreign online gambling operations and credit-card processing companies have been indicted. Last October, Congress passed a law banning almost all forms of online gambling. Recently, the Justice Department served subpoenas for records on investment banks that had helped BetonSports and other online gambling companies raise money through public stock offerings.

Industry observers estimate that online wagering, which had hit about $12 billion annually, is down by as much as 50%. BetonSports has largely closed down operations. Federal authorities estimate that 98% of the company's business came from the U.S.

The saga of BetonSports and Mr. Kaplan demonstrates how some online gambling sites rose fast -- and crashed hard -- by operating at, or beyond, the edge of the law. While Mr. Kaplan has a checkered background that includes run-ins with law enforcement, he may have gotten as far as he did in part by surrounding himself with executives like Mr. Carruthers, who came to BetonSports with a mainstream business background.

Before he was an international online gambling impresario, Mr. Kaplan, a New York native, was a bookie and was busted in 1993 by that state's authorities for running an illegal sports-betting operation, according to his federal indictment. He moved to Florida, where he allegedly continued his bookmaking operation, and then on to Aruba and Antigua before later finally settling in San José. The Costa Rican capital, with light-handed gambling regulation and a ready work force, began attracting other online betting operations.

Mr. Kaplan made a splash. He took over a nine-story office building in a shopping-mall complex and outfitted it with a day-care center for workers' kids as well as luxurious suites and a rooftop pool for visiting high rollers that BetonSports sometimes flew in for huge galas.

BetonSports headquarters also housed a shooting range -- a reflection of Mr. Kaplan's fascination with guns and an obsession with personal security, say people who know him. He, his wife and two children routinely traveled with armed bodyguards.

The bodyguards were, at least in part, "an ego thing," says Kenneth Weitzner, founder of Eye on Gambling, a Web site that tracks Internet gambling. Mr. Kaplan created the illusion that he thought went with a successful gambling operation, says Mr. Weitzner, who visited Mr. Kaplan at his Costa Rican operation. Another acquaintance called Mr. Kaplan "tough and intimidating." In one tale, he supposedly shot a computer monitor after BetonSports lost big on a football game.

As BetonSports grew into one of the biggest online gambling companies, it tried to move mainstream. Mr. Kaplan hired veteran gambling-industry executives, such as Mr. Carruthers, who had worked for Ladbrokes, a major British wagering company. In 2004, BetonSports had an initial public offering in London that raised about $100 million and its stock was listed on a branch of the London Exchange.

While Internet gambling is legal in many countries, the U.S. has long contended that it violated various federal statutes -- even before the specific ban was enacted last fall. Federal officials made periodic efforts to attack online gambling, but the companies often managed to operate relatively freely in the U.S. BetonSports was able to run U.S. marketing campaigns, including ads on 250 New York City buses in 2003.

But even as the industry soared, federal agents were building criminal cases. Some of BetonSports' "customers" in 2002 and 2003 turned out to be undercover investigators gathering evidence that went into last year's indictment.

BetonSports's name has appeared in press reports in connection with a 2005 criminal case filed by New York City prosecutors against an allegedly mob-connected gambling operation that was sending bets to an entity in BetonSports's headquarters building in San José. In those articles, BetonSports officials said that the entity simply leased office space and was evicted after the indictment. BetonSports wasn't charged in the New York case.

Some observers find the government's crackdown on Internet gambling curious, given the national explosion in gambling casinos and lotteries in recent years. These people wonder whether the initiative will backfire by pushing gamblers to less reputable operations.

The recent criminal cases and legislation are " an anti-consumer-protection movement because they're eliminating the most reputable publicly traded companies," says Nelson Rose, a California law professor and gambling-law expert. In recent years, BetonSports and others, including some U.S. casino operators, had lobbied Congress to legalize online gambling, arguing that it could then be regulated and taxed.

As for Mr. Kaplan, he is being sought by U.S. and international law-enforcement officials, including Interpol, whose Web site carries a wanted poster for him. Though his home was in Costa Rica, some believe he has left that country. One rumor has him and his family in Israel, there on an Israeli passport. If he is apprehended or returns voluntarily to the U.S., he will have to answer the pending charges in the St. Louis federal case. If convicted he could face a long prison sentence and large financial penalties.

Prosecutors Ask For 5 Year Max For Professor Cuba Spying Case (AP)

By Adrian Sainz

AP, February 27, 2007

MIAMI - A college professor who pleaded guilty in a federal case involving allegations that he and his wife spied for Cuba should receive the maximum five years in prison because he did "classic intelligence work" for Fidel Castro's communist government, prosecutors said Monday.

Carlos Alvarez, 61, and his 56-year-old wife Elsa were set to be sentenced Tuesday. Both pleaded guilty Dec. 19 to reduced federal charges in the case involving accusations of exchanging coded messages with Cuban intelligence services about Cuban-American exile groups and prominent figures in Miami.

Carlos Alvarez's lawyers have asked for a sentence of time served, or a sentence which would allow him to serve his time at home. The Florida International University psychology professor has spent one year and about two months at a federal detention facility.

The professor's attorneys argue he was never a Cuban intelligence agent or a supporter of Castro, and that he was trying to open avenues of communication between the two countries.

In Monday's filing, prosecutors argued the Florida International University psychology professor deserves a five-year sentence because the information he relayed was more sensitive than he said. Alvarez has downplayed the importance of the information.

"The reporting done by the Alvarezes contained substantially more than 'harmless gossip,'" Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod wrote. "Rather, the Alvarezes were engaged in classic intelligence work."

Carlos Alvarez pleaded guilty to conspiracy to become an unregistered foreign agent, while his wife admitted knowing about her husband's illegal activities but failing to report them to authorities. Both were charged previously with the more serious charge of acting as illegal Cuban agents.

Elsa Alvarez faces up to three years in prison on the revised charges. The government Monday requested a 21 month sentence for her, but her attorney Jane Moscowitz requested a sentence of no additional jail time. Elsa Alvarez served five months in a federal detention facility before she was released on bond.

A written report cited by prosecutors stated that one of Carlos Alvarez's contacts met personally with Richard Nuccio, then-President Clinton's special adviser to Cuba, in 1996. The report said Nuccio was "very depressed" and "devastated" by the signing of the Helms-Burton Act, which strengthened U.S. sanctions against Cuba.

Steven Chaykin, Carlos Alvarez's attorney, said his client never personally met with Nuccio and there was no proof that he sent the information found in the computer.

In 2005, Carlos Alvarez admitted in FBI interviews to being a "collaborator" with Cuba's intelligence service beginning in 1977, insisting he was mainly interested in opening dialogue with Cuba's government. His attorneys unsuccessfully tried to have that confession thrown out.

But Chaykin said Carlos Alvarez did not think he was disloyal to the United States and was trying to create dialogue concerning the U.S.-Cuba trade embargo and travel restrictions to the island.

"He naively believed the representations of the people with whom he had been in contact on behalf of the Cuban intelligence service that this was something they also were interested in promoting," Chaykin said. "He got ensnared in their web."

Prosecutors Want 5 Years In Prison For Carlos Alvarez

(CBS4) MIAMI An FIU professor who pleaded guilty to working for the Castro government as agents may have cut a deal with the Feds, but they don't appear to be ready to give him a break.

Prosecutors are pressing for the maximum jail time for Carlos Alvarez, who pleaded guilty in a federal case involving allegations that he and his wife spied for Cuba. If they get it, that means Alvarez would serve 5 years in federal prison.

Carlos Alvarez's lawyers have asked for a sentence of time served, or a sentence which would allow him to serve his time at home. Alvarez has spent one year and about two months at a federal detention facility.

Alvarez his 56-year-old wife Elsa are to be sentenced tomorrow. Both pleaded guilty about two months ago to reduced federal charges. The case involves accusations of exchanging coded messages with Cuban intelligence services about Cuban-American exile groups and prominent figures in Miami.

The professor's attorneys argue he was never a Cuban intelligence agent or a supporter of Castro, and that he was trying to open avenues of communication between the two countries.

U.S.: Couple Shared Vital Data With Cuba (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, February 27, 2007

Prosecutors said former FIU Professor Carlos Alvarez and his wife, Elsa, went beyond 'harmless gossip' to supply communist Cuba with information about key exiles. They are to be sentenced today.

One-time Florida International University Professor Carlos Alvarez and his wife, Elsa, supplied agents in Fidel Castro's government with classic intelligence information that went far beyond the "harmless gossip" the convicted couple said they gathered on the Cuban exile community, federal prosecutors said Monday.

On the eve of the couple's sentencings today, the U.S. attorney's office disclosed for the first time that the FBI obtained material from one of the Alvarezes' home computers showing that rather than reducing their illicit operation in the mid-1990s, they were still actively contacting the Cuban Intelligence Service.

In court papers filed Monday, a prosecutor argued for tough sentences as he cited "sensitive details" gathered from "slack space" on the Alvarezes' computer showing that Carlos Alvarez prepared written reports on:

· Brothers to the Rescue leader José Basulto, including that "an investigation should continue" into ``the ties he has to the CIA, the Cuban American [National] Foundation and financial interests such as Bacardi."

· A personal contact who had met with Richard Nuccio, then-President Bill Clinton's special advisor for Cuba, who "was very depressed" by Cuba's shoot-down of two Brothers to the Rescue planes killing three Cuban-American men and a Cuban exile and the subsequent Helms-Burton law toughening the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

· Lula Rodriguez, a Miami-Dade Democrat who later became personal assistant to then-Attorney General Janet Reno and eventually deputy assistant secretary of state for public affairs in the Clinton administration.

"Although it was Carlos Alvarez alone who would write and encrypt the reports [on computer disks], the reports would include information gathered by Elsa Alvarez as well," wrote Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Axelrod. 'The reports would be signed with the names `David and Deborah,' the code names given to Carlos and Elsa Alvarez by the [Cuban Intelligence Service]."

Axelrod filed the couple's computer information obtained by the FBI under court seal. But he cited sections to bolster his argument that Carlos Alvarez should receive the maximum five-year prison sentence for pleading guilty in December to conspiring to act as an unregistered agent for Cuba's communist government.

Axelrod also cited parts to back his argument that Elsa Alvarez, an FIU counselor on unpaid leave, should receive 21 months' imprisonment for pleading guilty to knowing about her husband's illegal activities and harboring him.

Carlos Alvarez's attorney, Steven Chaykin, called the latest filing ``another example of the government overstating the nature of this case."

DEEP REGRET

"Dr. Alvarez deeply regrets having disclosed information to the Cuban Intelligence Service regarding details of a personal nature about Mr. Maidique in the late 1980s and early 1990s," Chaykin said. ``But at the time, he didn't think the information was of any import or consequences -- he knew Mitch Maidique well and that he was a leader in the Cuban American community, and he was a moderate."

DOJ_NMG_0137367

Chaykin said the rest of the information was readily available from newspapers and other public sources, saying Carlos Alvarez's goal was to loosen the U.S. embargo against Cuba. "That was his thinking process, that he could make a difference," Chaykin said.

The Alvarezes' arrest in January 2006 sent shock waves through South Florida's exile community.

"This man has been dealing with sensitive information for years," said Basulto, a founder of Brothers to the Rescue.

"Don't tell me this is research on the exile community," added Basulto, who denied any involvement with the CIA since the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion or any investments in Bacardi. ``This is information used for strategic purposes by the Cuban government."

The Alvarezes averted a difficult jury trial on the more serious, previous charge of being Cuban agents who did not register with the U.S. government, an offense that carried up to 10 years in prison.

Their plea deals were struck after U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore decided to allow a major piece of incriminating evidence at trial -- Carlos Alvarez's "confession" in summer 2005 to the FBI of his collaboration with Cuban intelligence agents, including use of a home computer, encrypted disks and travel to the island. Carlos Alvarez had destroyed much of the information on his hard drive, but not all of it.

30 YEARS AGO

Prosecutors believe Carlos Alvarez began spying for Cuba in 1977 and that Elsa Alvarez became aware of it in 1982.

Chaykin, in court papers, has urged Moore to be lenient, saying Carlos Alvarez should be sentenced to the time he has already served since he was placed in custody in January 2006 in the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami. Alternatively, he recommended that Alvarez serve whatever sentence he receives at his Miami-Dade home.

Chaykin portrayed Alvarez, 61, a longtime FIU psychology professor before his resignation last year, as a naive intellectual trying to manipulate his Cuban handlers to find an alternative to the U.S. embargo that could lead to the end of the Castro government.

"Of course, Carlos Alvarez did not realize until it was too late that it was he that the [Cuban Intelligence Service] was after, not his information," Chaykin wrote. ``It was he who had been manipulated, not the Cubans. Once he realized he was trapped, there was nothing he could do but to do as little as he could get away with, and pray he would not be exposed by the Cuban government for propaganda value."

In an interview, Chaykin said his client's naiveté with the Cuban Intelligence Service also got him into trouble with the FBI when agents interviewed him three times at a local hotel without a lawyer present. The attorney said Alvarez believed that the FBI agents promised ``all he had to do was tell them the truth and they would leave him alone."

The agents said Alvarez's confession amounted to enough evidence to charge him and his 56-year-old wife.

Many Knew Of FBI Probe (MIH)

By Todd Wright

Miami Herald, February 27, 2007

Questions are swirling about how two Hollywood police officers knew about an undercover FBI probe into their alleged illegal activity.

Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about a two-year undercover FBI probe into his department, defying FBI instructions and possibly opening himself to prosecution.

Word of the FBI investigation somehow reached two of the four veteran officers who were the initial targets of the sting, forcing the FBI to prematurely end the probe and arrest the officers who the feds said were involved.

FBI officials said they told Scarberry to tell no one about the investigation after they informed him on Jan. 18.

But Scarberry told Assistant Chiefs Chadwick Wagner and Louis Granteed, Majors James Jones and Frank McGarry, and two captains on the force.

Within seven days, City Manager Cameron Benson and Mayor Mara Giulianti were added to the list of those who "needed to know," Scarberry said.

Scarberry stands by his decision to tell the mayor, city manager and six high-ranking officers on the force about the sting.

He said he was less than thrilled with the idea that more officers in his department might be implicated in wrongdoing, but contends the FBI never told him not to tell anyone else.

"I was supportive of what the FBI wanted to do," said Scarberry, dismissing the notion that the leak came from inside the department. ``Was I somewhat reluctant? Yes, I was. If I didn't want the investigation to go forward, I would have suspended them immediately and shut the thing down."

DOJ_NMG_0137368

Veteran officers Kevin Companion, Stephen Harrison and Jeff Courtney were arrested on Thursday and accused of a wide range of crimes, including extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a rigged, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a large load of heroin.

UNDERCOVER AGENT

A fourth officer, Thomas Simcox, is expected to turn himself in this week.

He made a deal to work as an undercover agent for the FBI about a month ago.

The group was snared in an FBI sting in which agents posed as members of a New York organized crime family needing added protection for its South Florida operations.

Companion, the ringleader, recruited the other three officers to assist the agents.

In addition, he had contact with several other officers, who have yet to be named, FBI officials said.

The city will conduct its own internal investigation to identify the other officers, who likely will be fired, Scarberry said.

Investigators realized that Companion and Courtney had learned of the probe when the two called in sick Monday through Thursday of last week, then began inquiring about their retirement benefits.

The U.S. Attorney's Office would not comment on whether any action would be taken against Scarberry.

"This was an undercover operation, which means it was conducted in secret. That's how it works," said Alicia Valle, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office. ``. . . We are not going to be pointing fingers at this time. . . . If evidence comes that there was a leak in the city, then we'll pursue it at that time. That's a very serious allegation."

Scarberry said he does not believe information was passed to the officers by anyone he told.

"I seriously doubt any one of them released the information," he said. ``There was nothing to accomplish by doing that."

But FBI agents were furious that someone leaked information before the investigation was complete, a ranking federal law enforcement source said.

Before the case unraveled, the FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office approached Scarberry about using Simcox in an undercover role to try to snare other Hollywood officers in the scheme.

Scarberry objected, the source said.

"He didn't want to look under any further rocks. He wanted to cauterize it," the source said.

Scarberry denied that.

"We were extremely cooperative," he said.

``Of course I was not happy with [the FBI being] in my department."

JUSTICE OBSTRUCTION

Scarberry's actions could fall under the broad federal guidelines for obstruction of justice, said Martin Jaffe, a Hollywood criminal defense attorney. Jaffe was former chief prosecutor for organized crime and public corruption cases in Broward County for 15 years, before switching sides.

Actions such as telling others information about an undercover operation, leaking information to suspects, leaving out classified documents for people to see or withholding information would all qualify under federal rules.

IMPEDES A PROBE

The rule of thumb is that if your action or inaction impedes a federal investigation, you could face obstruction of justice charges, Jaffe said.

It's usually not a good idea to tell people about an FBI undercover investigation, especially if agents told you not to, Jaffe said.

"From a law enforcement perspective, you would think you'd want to keep the people who know anything to the fewest as possible," he said. ``That way, it's less likely there will be a breach."

Arrests Of Hollywood Officers Jeopardize 61 Criminal Cases They Handled (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum And Ihosvani Rodriguez, South Florida Sun-Sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 27, 2007

A former state legislator charged with having sex with a teenager, a man accused in the rape of a 60-year-old woman, and a man who police said molested his 13-year-old stepdaughter are among defendants in 61 pending cases jeopardized by alleged corruption in the Hollywood police department.

The prosecutions, each involving one of four veteran officers charged last week with corruption and drug offenses, are under review by lawyers in the Broward State Attorney's Office, said felony chief Jeff Marcus.

LocalLinks

At the same time, the FBI continued to look into leaks from the Hollywood Police Department that prematurely exposed an undercover investigation of suspected dirty cops. The leaks forced agents to wrap up the sting instead of following up on other leads that could have produced more arrests, according to a federal law enforcement official familiar with the matter.

Detective Kevin Companion, 41; Sgt. Jeffry Courtney, 51; Officer Stephen Harrison, 46; and Detective Thomas Simcox, 50, are accused of providing services to FBI agents posing as mobsters in exchange for cash, sometimes using official police vehicles and equipment.

Companion, Courtney and Harrix son were arrested Thursday and released on bail. Simcox, who was cooperating with investigators, is expected to surrender Wednesday.

Howard Finkelstein, chief public defender for Broward County, said the scandal's effect on pending criminal cases could be "huge."

"This is as serious as it gets," Finkelstein said. "Cases could very easily fall apart."

He said he would advise his staff to take a close look at current and past cases involving all Hollywood police officers, not just the four charged. "I want to find out about every dirty cop in the city of Hollywood," Finkelstein said.

The four officers were involved in pending felony cases that include child sexual abuse, vehicular homicide, kidnapping and drug charges. Companion and Simcox, who ran the sex-crimes unit for the Hollywood police, handled 45 cases, Marcus said.

"We're going through case-by-case to determine what impact there is," he said.

Perhaps the highest-profile prosecution called into question involves a former state legislator who police say admitted paying for sex with a Hollywood madam and an underage girl.

Barry Kutun, 65, surrendered last year after Hollywood police charged him with two counts of unlawful sexual activity with a minor. He was subsequently fired from his post as North Miami's city attorney.

Kutun's attorney Richard Sharpstein said Simcox was the original lead detective in the Hollywood case, adding it was too early to tell how his involvement would impact Kutun's defense.

Simcox also participated in a case where a good Samaritan chased down a man accused of raping a 60-year-old woman in a Hollywood alley on New Year's Day.

Simcox arrested Juan Moreno, 38, whom the woman identified in front of police, on one count of sexual battery with a weapon, records show. The woman suffered serious injuries, including a deep cut on her neck after her attacker allegedly used a belt to try to strangle her.

Assistant Public Defender Jose Alberto Reyes, who represents Moreno, could not be reached for comment Monday. In the case of the man charged with repeatedly molesting his teenage stepdaughter, it was Companion who took the girl's statement at her Hollywood home in December.

The suspect's attorney, Alex Rivero, said that makes him "raise an eyebrow."

"It's definitely something I have to look into," Rivero said Monday. The South Florida Sun-Sentinel is not publishing his client's name to protect the stepdaughter's privacy.

Alberto Milian, a former Broward state prosecutor, said the officers' arrests would undoubtedly cause headaches for his former office.

"It's going to raise credibility issues every time a police officer, especially a Hollywood police officer, testifies," he said. Dennis Siegel, head of the sex crimes unit of the Broward State Attorney's Office, said lawyers would look for ways to make their cases without relying on testimony from the accused officers.

'Waltz' Sting's Newton Leaves Halfway House (KNOXNS/AP)

By Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 27, 2007

CHATTANOOGA - Former Republican state Rep. Chris Newton of Cleveland has been freed from a federal prison system halfway house where he finished a one-year sentence in the FBI's "Tennessee Waltz" bribery sting.

The Polk County native served 9 1/2 months in a minimum-security prison in Atlanta, then another month at a halfway house in Knoxville. He was released Friday but has remaining community service and two years of probation to serve.

Newton is among five current or former state_lawmakers charged with taking bribes from FBI agents who posed as businessmen seeking legislative favors. Local officials in Memphis and Chattanooga and two "bag men" also were charged in the operation.

Newton, 36, pleaded guilty to extortion and bribery conspiracy and then resigned in the middle of his sixth term in the General Assembly.

He also was fined $10,000 for taking a $1,500 bribe.

After pleading guilty, Newton told reporters he "became caught up in business as usual" at the state Capitol.

The Tennessee Waltz scandal prompted a special session of the Legislature and passage of legislation creating an independent ethics commission for lawmakers. The law also restricts contact that lobbyists can have with lawmakers and caps cash political contributions.

SoCal Woman Pleads Guilty To Leading $12M Fraud Scheme (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, February 27, 2007

LOS ANGELES - A woman pleaded guilty Friday to federal mail fraud and money laundering charges for leading a $12 million foreclosure scam that victimized more than 100 Southern California homeowners.

As part of a plea deal Martha Rodriguez, 35, of Downey admitted she led the scheme from May 2003 until November 2005 out of her real estate and escrow agencies, the U.S. attorney's office said.

She faces up to 40 years in prison when she is sentenced August 20. Rodriguez also agreed to forfeit to the government her interest in five homes, a truck and about $900,000 in cash.

According to a federal grand jury indictment, Rodriguez and four others visited homeowners defaulting on their mortgages and offered to stop their foreclosures with short-term loans and refinancing options. But instead of applying for refinancing, the defendants allegedly submitted loan applications to banks under the names of the homeowners.

The five allegedly pocketed the loan money from the banks, which were never repaid. The scammed homeowners, meanwhile, lost their property titles, prosecutors said.

Also indicted were Cynthia Valenzuela, 24, of Downey; Vladimir Stefanovic, 35, of Lancaster; Edward Seung Ok, 40, of Huntington Beach; and Maria G. Juarez, 36, of Diamond Bar.

Valenzuela pleaded guilty Feb. 16 to mail fraud charges. The other three defendants were scheduled to go to trial on July 10.

Technology Aids Credit-card Crooks (MINNST)

By Chris Serres

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 27, 2007

Digital camera technology and account-number software have made it difficult even for experts to spot counterfeit credit cards.

After 20 years as a financial crimes investigator, Joe Guy of the Roseville Police Department was reasonably confident of his ability to detect a counterfeit credit card.

But Guy looked perplexed as he gazed at a fake American Express card confiscated two weeks ago from Ricardo Petit-Homme, a 29-year-old from the New York City borough of Brooklyn, who was charged with stealing more than $22,000 in computer equipment from local Apple stores.

"This card looks so good, it damn near fooled me," Guy said, as he put it under a magnifying glass.

Over the past year, Twin Cities law-enforcement officials and retailers have become troubled by a dramatic jump in the sophistication of counterfeit credit cards, which have been linked to tens of thousands of dollars in thefts at local malls and shopping centers.

U.S. losses from stolen and fraudulent credit cards totaled $3 billion last year, according to the National Retail Federation, a Washington, D.C.-based trade group.

Financial crimes investigators say neither retailers nor credit-card companies are doing enough to stay ahead of the technology used by counterfeiters. It's possible to download computer programs from the Internet that automatically generate thousands of credit-card numbers at a time. These numbers so closely mimic authentic numbers, which are generated by computers using set patterns, that they fool credit-processing machines used at many stores and restaurants.

The fake cards are appearing at a time when credit-card fraud is already on the rise. The Minnesota Financial Crimes Task Force, a state law-enforcement agency that investigates financial crimes, prosecuted 1,900 cases of financial fraud last year, up 70 percent from the previous year. About 80 percent of the cases involved counterfeit credit cards and checks, according to John McCullough, business coordinator for the task force.

The Roseville Police Department and the FBI are investigating an organized ring of 20 people who they say stole goods worth more than $250,000 in local electronics stores, primarily by using stolen credit-card numbers and fake IDs. Investigators believe the group sold much of the stolen merchandise online.

And last February, a 21-year-old named Zhan Biao Zhan went on a buying spree with fake credit cards at Mall of America jewelry stores, buying $12,000 worth of Rolex watches, according to a Bloomington police report. Zhan, who used a fake driver's license with the name Benny Wong, was arrested after he attempted to buy two more Rolex watches from R.F. Moeller Jewelers in Edina.

"It's like the Alamo -- they keep coming over the walls," McCullough said. "We're grossly understaffed to investigate all these cases."

To the naked eye, the eight credit cards confiscated from Petit-Homme look like the real thing. The MasterCards had the slanted letters "MC" next to the expiration date -- a feature normally absent from counterfeit cards. The four-digit bank identification numbers were printed directly below the first four digits on the card; with phony cards, those numbers are often absent or altered somewhat.

They look so real

Even when Roseville police placed the cards under ultraviolet lights, they still seemed authentic. Under the lights, the letters "AMEX" and the bust of a Centurion were visible on the American Express cards -- an effect that is impossible to duplicate without sophisticated technology. The holograms on all the cards also looked real.

The magnetic strips on the cards didn't work, but the account numbers on all of them were valid, so the Apple salespeople made the sales after keying in the numbers. "It's worrisome. Once you jump a hurdle with technology, you never go back," Guy said. "Eventually, these are going to be the benchmark for what we see in the field."

Traditionally, accessing credit-card numbers has been the chief obstacle to producing large numbers of fake cards. But with modern technology, that's no longer as difficult. Using digital cameras, bank tellers and store clerks can photograph the fronts and backs of credit cards surreptitiously. And computer software available on the Internet can generate account numbers using the same algorithms as the credit-card companies.

"It's now possible to buy and sell batches of account numbers," said Mike Hartley, a detective in the property crimes unit of the Bloomington Police Department.

According to a Roseville police report, Petit-Homme managed to steal six computers at three local Apple stores before police nabbed him. Typically such thieves aren't caught, and Petit-Homme probably would have gotten away with it had he been more temperate with his purchases.

An alert employee at the Mall of America Apple store wondered how a man dressed in a worn jacket could afford two laptops and related computer applications. His purchase totaled $6,668.27. The employee called other Apple stores in the area to alert them; when the man bought the exact same merchandise at the Apple store at Rosedale Center, police were called immediately.

After his arrest, police searched Petit-Homme's car and found a printed list of stores and shopping centers. The list included addresses for the Shoppes at Arbor Lakes, the Galleria in Edina, four local Apple stores and several jewelry stores.

Conversations with Petit-Homme led Roseville police to believe that he was acting on behalf of a larger organization based in Brooklyn. He carried a counterfeit New York driver's license with the name Andrew Waters, the same as on the fake cards.

Police aren't sure why he was buying the same computers, but theft rings often buy products in bulk because they've already lined up buyers.

"It's much, much simpler that way," Guy said.

Justices Take Up Police Use Of Lethal Force (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — There was no dispute in the Supreme Court on Monday about the disastrous consequences of a high-speed police chase over the back roads of a rural Georgia county six years ago.

A deputy sheriff caught up with the car that he and other officers were pursuing and, still traveling at high speed, rammed it with his own car, causing an accident that left Victor Harris, the 19-year-old driver, a quadriplegic. Mr. Harris's original offense that set off the chase: driving 73 miles an hour in a 55-mile-an-hour zone. The Coweta County police delivered speeding citations to his hospital room.

The question for the court was whether the forcible termination of the chase had been reasonable under the circumstances, or whether a jury should at least be permitted to consider Mr. Harris's claim that Deputy Sheriff Timothy Scott violated his constitutional rights by unreasonable application of deadly force. At issue were the standards to apply to such a determination.

The United States Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit, based in Atlanta and not known for being overly solicitous toward criminal defendants, ruled in 2005 that Mr. Harris was entitled to take his suit for damages to a jury. The appeals court refused to give Deputy Scott either summary judgment or immunity, basing its ruling on a series of Supreme Court decisions from the 1980s that set boundaries on the use of deadly police force against fleeing criminal suspects.

But the lawyers arguing for the deputy, both Philip W. Savrin of Atlanta and Gregory G. Garre, a deputy solicitor general in the Justice Department, argued that those precedents were not relevant, given the particular danger that Mr. Harris's driving, at speeds of up to 90 miles an hour on dark and winding country roads, had posed to other drivers.

The court's leading precedent, Tennessee v. Garner, from 1985, held that the police had acted unreasonably in shooting an unarmed suspect in the back as he fled from a house he was suspected of burglarizing.

But this case, Scott v. Harris, No. 05-1631, is "fundamentally different from Garner," Mr. Garre said. When the deputy decided to use force, Mr. Garre continued, he "reasonably determined" that Mr. Harris "posed a grave threat to other motorists, the police and any bystanders who might come in his way."

Most justices appeared to agree rather readily, describing their reactions to watching a videotape of the pursuit, made by an automatic camera mounted on the deputy's dashboard, which is part of the record of the case. "He created the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " Justice Antonin Scalia observed. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. told Craig T. Jones, Mr. Harris's lawyer, that his client "created a tremendous risk" to other drivers.

Only Justices John Paul Stevens and Ruth Bader Ginsburg raised the question of whether it would have been more reasonable for the police simply to have abandoned the chase. "If the police weren't after him, there is no indication that he would have been speeding," Justice Ginsburg said.

Justice Stevens raised the issue repeatedly. When Mr. Garre gave a hair-raising description of Mr. Harris's behavior in trying to elude the police, Justice Stevens observed, "Before being chased he hadn't done any of this."

And when Deputy Scott's lawyer, Mr. Savrin, said he had decided to intercept Mr. Harris after concluding that there was "a high likelihood, in fact a probability," that harm would otherwise come to others on the road, Justice Stevens asked, "Would that have been likely if the officer had discontinued the chase?"

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. intervened several times to depict the deputy's behavior as reasonable. "Is it reasonable to suppose that there might be something more going on if the guy is trying this hard to get away from a speeding ticket?" the chief justice asked at one point. Later he suggested that the car might have been stolen or that the deputy could have assumed Mr. Harris was being pursued "for mass murder or terrorism."

With the court seemingly set against him, it was not easy for Mr. Harris's lawyer, Mr. Jones, to get much traction during his 30 minutes at the lectern. His client was "an unsafe driver," he said, but was not an aggressor. Mr. Harris even used his turn signal when he passed other cars, Mr. Jones noted.

That drew a sarcastic response from Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. "He used the turning signal!" Justice Kennedy said, adding, "That's like the strangler who observes the 'no smoking' sign."

For deadly force to be justified under the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable seizure, Mr. Jones persisted, "something more than just unsafe flight" is required. The rule the Supreme Court set 22 years ago in the Garner case to protect fleeing suspects should apply in this setting as well, he said, adding:

"The rule simply says you don't kill him just because he is driving unsafely. And it simply says that if the choice is between killing him and letting him go, you have to let him go if the Garner factors aren't present. And we find nothing in the law and no reason to create a new exception in the law that says that Garner doesn't apply if you're fleeing by vehicle."

Court Ponders Police Chase Liability (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Can a police officer be sued for hitting into a fleeing car during a high-speed chase and causing an accident that leaves the driver badly injured or dead?

The Supreme Court took up that question today in a case from rural Georgia, and the likely answer appeared to be "no."

The case has drawn wide attention because it could set national rules to limit police chases. More than 300 people per year are killed in police chases. Most of the victims are the motorists who tried to flee the police, but a substantial number are innocent bystanders. Each year, several police officers die in such chases.

But during the oral arguments today, most of the justices said they were not inclined to restrict the police from using force when they are pursuing a dangerous speeder.

The fleeing motorist "is creating a grave danger" to others on the highway, said Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

"We are talking about 90 miles per hour on a two-lane road," said Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., referring to the case before the court.

Six years ago, 19-year-old Victor Harris was paralyzed after losing control of his speeding Cadillac in Coweta County, Ga. He had been clocked going 73 mph on a highway where the speed limit was 55.

DOJ_NMG_0137373

When a police officer flashed his blue light, Harris sped away. He was pursued through the parking lot of a small shopping center, where he collided with a police car.

Still undeterred, Harris raced down a dark and winding two-lane road, sped through red lights and swerved back and forth across the lanes to avoid other cars.

"Go ahead and take him out," a police supervisor radioed to Deputy Timothy Scott. Unable to stop Harris safely, Scott rammed into the rear bumper of the Cadillac, causing it to spin. The car careened over an embankment and the accident left Harris a quadriplegic.

That was the "scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " said Justice Antonin Scalia, referring to a police videotape of the chase that was supplied to the court. "It was frightening ... cars coming in the opposite direction, at night, on a two-lane winding road," he said.

Several other justices said they, too, had watched the videotape and agreed with Scalia's description. Harris had "created a substantial risk of serious bodily harm to others. How would a jury find otherwise?" asked Justice David H. Souter.

In his client's defense, Harris' lawyers said the young man had been driving "under control" and used his turn signals when he changed lanes.

"He used the turning signal! That's like the strangler who observes the 'no smoking' sign," interjected Justice Anthony M. Kennedy.

Despite the scary scene captured on the police video, Harris won two preliminary victories in the lower courts. He had sued Scott, alleging that the ramming of his car by the deputy amounted to excessive force and therefore violated the 4th Amendment and its ban on "unreasonable searches and seizures."

Lawyers for the police expected this claim would be rejected. Instead, both a federal judge and the U.S. court of appeals in Atlanta said the suit should go before a jury.

More than 20 years ago, the high court had said an officer may not use "deadly force" to stop a fleeing suspect unless he poses a true risk to the public or the police. That ruling arose when a police officer, answering a burglary call, encountered a teenage boy in the backyard and shot him in the back of the head.

Last year, the appeals court in Atlanta said the same rule against the use of "deadly force" should apply in cases involving high-speed chases. If that rule were upheld by the Supreme Court, it could force the police to break off high-speed chases and to let fleeing motorists get away.

But most of the justices said today they leaned in favor of a ruling that says police may use reasonable force to stop a dangerously speeding vehicle.

It will be several months before the justices issue a ruling in the case of Harris vs. Scott.

Justices Weigh Police Chase Video (WP)

By Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The Supreme Court relies on precedents and case law, dry recitations of fact and the sometimes bloodless decisions of the courts below it. But in a case involving a now-paralyzed man who instigated a high-speed police chase, most of the justices, as a sportscaster might say, went to the videotape.

And the reviews rolled in.

"He created the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection,' " Justice Antonin Scalia said during yesterday's hour-long oral arguments.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg: "Anyone who has watched that tape has got to come to [the] conclusion, looking at the road and the way that this car was swerving, and the cars coming in the opposite direction . . . this was a situation fraught with danger."

Videotape, in this case taken from cameras inside the police cars, is an unusual piece of the record for Supreme Court justices to weigh, but it is at the heart of Scott v. Harris (05-1631). The tape was not played yesterday, but it appeared that a majority of the justices had watched it.

The case involves Coweta County Deputy Sheriff Timothy Scott's decision in 2001 to end a wild, high-speed chase through dark and wet Georgia highways by finally ramming the back of Victor Harris's Cadillac, sending him down an embankment and flipping his car. Harris, then 19, was left a quadriplegic and has sued, claiming it a violation of his constitutional rights for Scott to take such drastic action.

Scott has countered that his maneuver was reasonable to save others who were endangered by Harris's unlawful driving and that, even if not, he should be granted immunity because it was not clearly established law that his action would violate Harris's Fourth Amendment right to unreasonable seizure.

The case comes amid a backdrop of sensational high-speed police chases that have become a staple of cable television shows, as well as increasing debate about whether it is more dangerous for law enforcement officers to chase and capture wrongdoers than to let them go and hope to arrest them later.

In this case, both a lower court and the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 11th Circuit have ruled in favor of Harris. The 11th Circuit said that Scott's actions constituted deadly force, and that it was unreasonable because the officer had no reason to think Harris had done anything more than violate traffic laws. The police gave chase because they clocked him going 73 mph in a 55-mph zone.

"Mr. Harris was simply an unsafe driver," his attorney, Craig T. Jones of Atlanta, told the justices. Jones agreed that Harris should have stopped when officers attempted to pull him over, and that the chase, which lasted six minutes and covered nine miles, involved speeds of more than 90 mph.

But he pointed out that Harris, who Jones has said panicked when police gave chase to him, did not use his car to try to assault other drivers, and that at times he even used his turn signals. That fact did not elicit much sympathy.

"He used the turning signal," repeated Justice Anthony M. Kennedy. "That's like the strangler who observes the no-smoking sign."

Still, Jones argued, Supreme Court precedent holds that police may not use deadly force to stop fleeing suspects unless the suspects threaten the officer with a weapon or there is reason to believe they have committed a serious crime of physical harm or are a threat to do so.

And he said the police pursuit of his client is what created the dangerous conditions.

After Harris had eluded Scott and other officers, Scott told a fellow officer to "let me have him, my car's already tore up." He asked a supervisor for permission to ram Harris's vehicle from the side, which could cause him to spin around and stop. "Go ahead and take him out," the supervisor replied.

But Scott decided he could not make that work, because of the speed at which they were traveling and the road conditions, so he rammed Harris from behind, which sent him careening off the road.

Deputy Solicitor General Gregory G. Garre, who represents the Bush administration's support for Scott, said the deputy sheriff's split-second decision was valid. "When a suspect disobeys a lawful command to stop, races off in a reckless attempt to elude the police, and demonstrates a disregard for his own life and the lives of others in his path, the police may use force, including deadly force, to bring the suspect's vehicle flight to a halt and protect the public safety," he said.

But Jones pointed out that the 11th Circuit had found otherwise, and that the justices' rules for hearing questions of immunity require them to accept the lower court's finding of facts.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer said seeing the videotape himself makes that complicated. He said he had been back and forth on the case until he saw the tape. "Am I supposed to pretend I haven't seen that?"

"Well, I think you apply the law, Your Honor," Jones replied.

Breyer said later that he would look at the tape again, but was afraid that "I end up with Chico Marx's old question with respect to the Court of Appeals: Who do you believe -- me or your own eyes?"

High Court Case Could Change Car-chase Rules (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — The nocturnal chase began near Atlanta after a deputy sheriff clocked Victor Harris driving 73 miles per hour in a 55 mph zone and turned on the siren. Harris sped off, weaving past other cars and going through red lights.

He turned into a parking lot, hit the cruiser of another deputy, Timothy Scott, and sped back on the highway. Scott pursued Harris, then slammed into Harris' car to stop him. The car went down an embankment, crashed and left Harris, then 19, a quadriplegic.

In a nationally watched case heard Monday by the Supreme Court, Harris sued Scott for violating his Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizures. He said Scott was wrong to use such an extreme maneuver when Harris' only wrongdoing was speeding.

Harris won in an early stage of his lawsuit in which a lower court said Scott could be held personally liable for Harris' injuries. Scott's lawyer is asking the justices to reverse an appeals court's decision that said Scott lacked grounds to believe Harris posed a threat of serious harm to others.

The high court's decision could broadly affect the rules for police chasing fleeing suspects.

High-speed chases, a staple of TV news, are controversial because they often cause injuries to suspects, innocent bystanders and police officers themselves.

DOJ_NMG_0137375

Harris "created the scariest chase I ever saw since The French Connection," Justice Antonin Scalia said Monday, referring to the gritty 1971 cop film set in New York City. Scalia and other justices viewed the dashboard camera videotape of the 2001 chase.

Other justices, too, suggested by their comments that lower-court judges wrongly assessed the risk Harris created.

"This was a situation fraught with danger," Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said.

Scott, and groups siding with him, including 28 states, say that the court should reverse the appeals court and provide more protection from lawsuits for police who injure others in the line of duty. Civil libertarians and defense lawyers stress the need to hold police accountable for extreme tactics.

Philip Savrin, Scott's lawyer, said he acted properly in hitting Harris' car.

"There was a high likelihood that this was going to end in tragedy," Savrin said.

Deputy U.S. Solicitor General Gregory Garre, representing the Justice Department and on Scott's side, said police can use "deadly force" to stop a speeder if he is "a substantial risk" to others.

Craig Jones, Harris' lawyer, argued that if the court applies that standard merely to a person's driving, it would be easier for police to defend using deadly force and "to literally take out anyone who is speeding."

Jones insisted Harris never lost control of the car until it was hit. "He only crossed the center line to pass, and when he passed, he used his turn signal," Jones said.

"That's like the strangler who observes the no-smoking sign," Justice Anthony Kennedy said.

Chase Video Steals Show As High Court Hears Case On Police Force (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 27, 2007

Even at the Supreme Court, a picture -- or in this case, a video -- can be worth a thousand words. Or more.

In the case of Scott v. Harris, which was argued Monday, justices debated whether Coweta County, Ga., sheriff's deputy Timothy Scott used reasonable force in 2001 when he rammed his vehicle into a Cadillac he was pursuing during a high-speed chase. The driver, Victor Harris, who at the time was 19, had been targeted for speeding. Scott's maneuver was intended to end the chase, and it did. Harris' car careened down an embankment, leaving him paralyzed from the neck down. Harris sued, and Scott claimed he had qualified immunity -- which the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals denied him.

The qualified-immunity issue was barely mentioned as lawyers for both sides argued over the standards the high court has used in deciding whether police act reasonably when they use deadly force -- and even whether the standard is relevant to what happened to Harris. But what justices kept coming back to was the video of the six-minute chase, taken by dashboard cameras in the police cars involved. The grainy nighttime video, part of the public record in the case, shows the car reaching 90 miles per hour as it sped by other motorists under pursuit by the police.

The video was not shown in the courtroom, but it was evident that most if not all the justices had seen it -- and been affected by it.

On the film, Scott is heard asking for and getting permission to use PIT, or Precision Intervention Technique -- a method whereby police can end a chase with a maneuver that causes a car to spin out and stop. But because of the high speeds involved, Scott ultimately decided to ram Harris' car directly, causing the car to run off the road. Justice Antonin Scalia called it "the scariest chase I ever saw since 'The French Connection'" as he grilled the lawyer for Harris, Craig Jones of Edmond & Jones in Atlanta. "It's frightening."

And Justice Stephen Breyer, thinking out loud, told Jones he had been "shifting back and forth" as he read the briefs in the case, "and then I looked at the tape."

Quoting from the noted legal scholar Chico Marx -- of Marx Brothers fame -- Breyer later said, again referring to the tape, "Who are you going to believe, me or your own eyes?" The quote is from the classic Marx Brothers' movie "Duck Soup."

Justice Samuel Alito Jr. also said watching the tape led him to think that Harris created "tremendous" risk to other drivers by speeding, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg agreed that the tape showed the situation was "fraught with danger," implying that the officer was acting reasonably in ending the chase however he could.

Jones tried to argue that Harris did not pose an immediate threat to anyone when he was speeding, and even bragged that Harris had "used the turn signal" as he shifted from lane to lane.

Justice Anthony Kennedy interjected sarcastically, "That's like the strangler who observes the no-smoking sign."

For some justices, the video may also have cut against the officer, whose lawyer, Philip Savrin of Freeman Mathis & Gary in Atlanta, argued that the ramming did not amount to the use of deadly force.

Justice David Souter, who had also seen the video, was incredulous as he asked Savrin how the officer could have reasonably believed his actions would not result in death or serious injury.

When Savrin said not all high-speed chases result in injury, Souter said, "Some people are lucky."

Justice John Paul Stevens, who also appeared sympathetic to the target of the chase, kept asking why the officer had not simply stopped chasing the Cadillac -- which, he said, would have resulted in Harris slowing down and being captured by a roadblock or other means down the road.

Scalia came to the officer's defense, arguing that merely ending the chase without stopping Harris might have left Harris free to endanger "the public at large."

The 11th Circuit ruled that "the use of deadly force is not 'reasonable' in a high-speed chase based only on a speeding violation and traffic infractions where there was little, if any, threat to pedestrians or other motorists as the roads were mostly empty and Harris remained in control of his vehicle."

Court Turns Away Appeal By Mohawk Industries (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The U.S. Supreme Court Monday refused to rehear a worker immigration lawsuit filed against Mohawk Industries Inc., rejecting a renewed appeal a year after sending it back to lower courts.

The justices last year remanded the lawsuit to a federal court so it could determine whether allegations that the company hired illegal immigrants and suppressed worker wages could proceed as a civil racketeering lawsuit. Last year's action gave the carpet and floor-coverings company a new chance to stop the worker lawsuit, filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations, or RICO, Act. But the Eleventh U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta ruled the lawsuit could proceed against the company.

Mohawk Industries, in its latest appeal, said the Eleventh Circuit ruling amounted to a "cramped misinterpretation" of the legal precedent the Supreme Court asked lower courts to use as guidance in the racketeering suit. "The Eleventh Circuit decision permits plaintiffs to proceed with racketeering suits based upon ordinary business conduct," the company said in its appeal.

Mohawk Industries was sued in January 2004 by a group of current and former hourly workers. The company attempted to get the suit thrown out of a federal court, but first a trial court and then the Eleventh U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said the lawsuit could proceed, before the Supreme Court heard the first appeal last year and remanded it based on a decision in another case involving the RICO statute.

That outcome left unanswered a significant legal question presented by the Mohawk Industries appeal on whether corporations, when working with a third-party contractor, meet the definition of an "enterprise" in federal racketeering laws. The case is Mohawk Industries v. Williams.

Court Rejects Iraq Wrongful-Death Case

Also Monday, the high court rejected an appeal from Blackwater Security Consulting LLC, a defense contractor fighting a state wrongful death suit over the 2004 death of four of its employees in Fallujah, Iraq. The workers were killed at a mob scene where they were beaten, set on fire and their remains were mutilated and hung from a bridge. The four men were with a truck convoy headed for U.S. Army Camp Ridgeway in Iraq.

In January 2005, the estates for the four sought damages under North Carolina's wrongful death statute, despite efforts by the defense security contractor to obtain benefits under a special Defense Base Act that provides compensation to the families of individuals killed in a war zone. Blackwater Security attempted to get the state suit dismissed, arguing the federal defense compensation program, administered by the Labor Department, was the families' exclusive remedy. A U.S. District Court and the Fourth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., declined to intervene with rulings that let the lawsuit proceed in North Carolina.

Blackwater Security, in its appeal, said the federal court decisions expose "civilian contractors carrying on their Defense Department-mandated operations in hostile territory to the destabilizing reach of 50 state tort systems."

Richard Nordan, the estate administrator for the four, accused Blackwater Security of being discontent with lower court's proper conclusions of the laws. "Simply put, Blackwater requests preferential treatment of its case," Mr. Nordan said. The case is Blackwater Security Consulting v. Nordan.

The court also refused to consider the case of a former Phoenix high school teacher sentenced to 200 years in prison for possessing child pornography. Morton Berger argued that his sentence was grossly disproportionate to his crime, amounting to cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment. The case is Morton Berger v. state of Arizona.

Court Takes Up Election, Education Cases

The court did agree to hear several cases. Justices will consider the constitutionality of a statewide primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party.

DOJ_NMG_0137377

The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over its "Top 2" primary system that voters created. The system allows candidates to indicate their party affiliation on the ballot and is open to voters regardless of their party. The system is the successor to the blanket primary that the Supreme Court struck down in 2000 on the grounds that it violated political parties' rights.

The Washington Democratic and Republican parties sued to block the new system, approved by voters in 2004. The parties said they would be forced to be associated with candidates they did not choose. Lower federal courts agreed with the parties. The new system, which has never been used, infringes on the rights of political parties to choose their own nominees, the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals said.

The court also will consider whether taxpayers must reimburse parents who enrolled their learning-disabled student in private school after deciding public schools were unable to meet the child's needs. New York City's board of education asked the justices to take the case after a federal appeals court said tuition reimbursement is available to the parents under the Individuals With Disabilities Act. The case is Board of Education v. Tom F. on behalf of Gilbert F.

Justices Decline Case On 200-Year Sentence For Man Who Possessed Child Pornography (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — An Arizona man who received a 200-year prison sentence for possessing 20 pornographic images of children failed Monday to persuade the Supreme Court to consider whether the sentence was unconstitutionally excessive.

Arizona law imposes a mandatory minimum sentence of 10 years for “sexual exploitation of a minor,” and it requires that sentences for multiple convictions be served consecutively.

The sentence that the man, Morton R. Berger, received was consequently longer than the sentence any other state would have imposed for a similar offense, a justice of the Arizona Supreme Court wrote in an opinion last year dissenting from that court’s decision upholding the 200-year sentence.

A majority of the Arizona Supreme Court declined to examine the aggregate sentence as a whole, instead focusing on the sentence of 10 years for possessing a single pornographic image, which it found was not excessive or disproportionate. It was this aspect of the analysis that Mr. Berger, a 57-year-old former high school teacher, challenged in his appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

“If this court reviews Berger’s entire punishment instead of examining the sentence for a single count,” the brief said, “it would find Berger’s punishment cruel, unusual and unconstitutional.”

His appeal said that in most states, sentences for similar crimes would run concurrently, and an offender would serve no more than five years, with the additional possibility of probation or early release. Both are barred under Arizona law. Had the offense been prosecuted under federal law, Mr. Berger’s brief said, the federal guidelines would have provided a five-year sentence.

The case, Berger v. Arizona, No. 06-349, has drawn considerable attention in criminal law circles as providing a possible occasion for the justices to take a fresh look at a subject they have treated only sparingly. While fully engaged in reconsidering the respective roles of judges and juries in criminal sentencing, the court has been extremely reluctant to strike down particular sentences as excessive.

Douglas A. Berman, a professor at the Moritz College of Law at Ohio State University and an authority on sentencing, also noted the difference in the court’s treatment of punitive damages and criminal sentencing.

In an interview on Monday, recalling that the court last week vacated an award of punitive damages against Philip Morris, Professor Berman said, “For a host of good reasons, the justices think they have a role in regulating extreme corporate punishment, but I fear the court doesn’t embrace a role in regulating extreme individual punishment.” Professor Berman has been writing about the Berger case for months on his blog, Sentencing Law and Policy.

Arizona vigorously opposed Supreme Court review of the sentence, telling the justices that it had been properly based on “overwhelming evidence” of Mr. Berger’s “large-scale, deliberate and long-term acquisition of child pornography.”

The state’s brief said that after Mr. Berger turned down a plea bargain, the prosecutor whittled the case to 20 counts out of fear of “deluging the jury” with highly graphic and disturbing images. The police had found the images in Mr. Berger’s possession after learning that his credit card number had been used to buy contraband images from a child pornography Web site based in Dallas.

These were some of the court’s other activities on a busy Monday:

Primary Elections

DOJ_NMG_0137378

The justices agreed to decide the constitutionality of the open primary system adopted in 2004 by Washington State. Under that system, people can vote for any candidate without regard to the party affiliation of the candidate or the voter. Candidates, however, can designate their own party preference on the ballot. The top two vote-getters advance to the general election regardless of party label.

The Republican, Democratic and Libertarian parties in the state challenged the system on the ground that it violated their First Amendment right to freedom of association by depriving them and their members of the ability to control the selection of candidates running under their banner. Two lower courts agreed, on the basis of recent Supreme Court precedents upholding the rights of political parties to control their own affairs.

The justices granted and consolidated two separate appeals, one filed by the state (Washington v. Washington Republican Party, No. 06-730) and one by the Washington State Grange, an organization that advocated for the voter initiative that established the new system (Washington State Grange v. Washington Republican Party, No. 06-713).

Gun Use

In its latest effort to parse a federal law that makes it a crime to "use" a gun in relation to a drug offense, the court agreed to decide whether the receipt of an unloaded firearm as payment for drugs amounted to a prohibited "use."

The federal appeals courts are divided on this question, which the Supreme Court did not directly resolve in 1995 when it ruled that "use" required "active employment" of the gun, a definition that the court said then included using a gun as an item of barter or commerce even if the gun was never fired.

In the new case, Watson v. United States, No. 06-571, the defendant, Michael A. Watson, acquired a gun from a police informant in return for 24 doses of the drug OxyContin. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit, in New Orleans, rejected his argument that receipt of a gun under such circumstances did not meet the "active employment" test.

The question occurs often, in various permutations, because a violation of the statute in question carries a mandatory minimum sentence of five years in prison in addition to any underlying offense. More than one in 10 of all federal drug convictions carry an enhanced sentence for use of a firearm.

Supreme Court Declines Polygamy Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

The US Supreme Court Monday declined to consider the appeal by a Utah man with three wives who sought to overturn his bigamy conviction by citing the high court's 2003 landmark ruling on gay rights.

The action lets stand a Utah Supreme Court decision upholding the state's bigamy law even though it clashes with some residents' sincerely held religious beliefs.

"There are literally thousands of religious people in Utah ... who now have to be concerned to look over their shoulder that some day [state Attorney General] Mark Shurtleff and the state of Utah will come after them," says Raymond Berry, one of the lawyers representing polygamist Rodney Holm. The ruling will raise concerns among religious fundamentalists in Utah that the state will step up its pressure against them, he adds. "They are kind of like turtles, they pull their heads in, they stay out of the public eye."

The Holm case offers a glimpse into a world rarely seen by most Americans. There are an estimated 37,000 religious polygamists in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, South Dakota, and Utah.

Mr. Holm's lawyers hoped to use the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling on gay rights as a means to challenge state laws against multiple marriage.

In that landmark case, called Lawrence v. Texas, the court invalidated Texas' sodomy law, ruling that gay adult Texans, like all other adults, were entitled to intimate relations without government interference. In a fiery dissent, Justice Antonin Scalia warned that the court's rejection of moral disapproval as a foundation for certain laws would open the door to legal challenges to state statutes banning same-sex marriage, prostitution, and bigamy, among others.

A key legal question is how broadly Lawrence v. Texas should be read. Most judges have interpreted that case narrowly. But within five months of the Lawrence decision, the Supreme Judicial Court in Massachusetts announced a constitutional right in that state to gay marriage.

Lawyers for Holm were hopeful that a majority of justices would see his case as an opportunity to extend the holding in Lawrence v. Texas to protect polygamist relationships from state prosecution in cases where all the parties were aware of and approved of the practice.

There has been no shortage of other challenges as per Justice Scalia's warning, but the high court has so far avoided revisiting the 2003 landmark. In declining to take Holm's case, the justices offered no explanation.

DOJ_NMG_0137379

"They are the philosophical, and often biological, descendants of early Mormons who refused to compromise their religious principles in the face of the most extreme form of coercion," wrote Holm's other lawyer, Rodney Parker of Salt Lake City, in his petition to the court.

Although polygamy was once accepted, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints banned the practice in 1890.

The issue arose recently on the presidential campaign trail with the Associated Press reporting over the weekend that Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney had a great-grandfather who had five wives and a great-great-grandfather with 12 wives.

Mr. Romney, a Mormon, says he is opposed to polygamy. He has been married for 37 years to his high school sweetheart. But prejudice against Mormons might hurt Romney's chances in a run for the White House, some analysts say.

The Holm case arrived at the Supreme Court after the Utah resident was convicted of violating the state's bigamy law and of having unlawful sexual contact with a minor. Holm was charged after his third wife – then age 16 – moved into his house with his two other wives and children following an unlicensed religious marriage ceremony.

The third wife was the younger sister of Holm's first wife.

Holm believes his religious faith requires that he have more than one wife. He and his wives are members of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, a spinoff sect with no connection to the Mormon Church.

At issue in his case was whether state prosecutors violated his constitutional right to practice his religion and maintain an intimate family relationship without intrusive government interference.

In Lawrence v. Texas, the high court declared that a state sodomy law treated gay Texans as second-class citizens. Holm's lawyers told the high court that Utah's polygamy statute does the same for certain religious fundamentalists.

In urging the high court not to take the case, Assistant Attorney General Laura Dupaix said the protections established in Lawrence v. Texas only apply to relationships between consenting adults.

"This case does not involve consenting adults," she wrote. "It involves an arranged polygamous and sexual relationship between a 32-year-old adult and his 16-year-old sister-in-law, who conceived two of his children before her 18th birthday."

In contrast, Mr. Parker said Utah's bigamy law applies a double standard that targets and punishes religious fundamentalists but allows others to engage in the same conduct and escape criminal punishment.

"Widespread popular departure from traditional marriage practices has made the anti-polygamy laws, like laws against cohabitation, adultery, and fornication, anachronistic," Parker wrote. "These laws are not enforced against those practicing contemporary lifestyles, but are asserted as weapons, as in this case, against those living a traditional, family-grounded, religious-based life."

He added, "In gross absurdity..., one can behave in the same way in two circumstances but in one (polygamy) the action is illegal, and in the other (promiscuity) the action is ignored by the law. One can do legally the same act with immoral or amoral intent and have it be legal. Yet the same act with religious intent is deemed illegal."

Local Law Enforcement Says Crime Fighting Here Needs Federal Money (SEATIMES)

By Christine Clarridge, Seattle Times staff reporter

The Seattle Times, February 27, 2007

In a meeting with local law enforcement leaders this morning, U.S. Sen. Maria Cantwell listened to a lot of people -- including Seattle's police chief, the King County sheriff, city officials, federal agents and a few community leaders -- talk about the area's crime problems and what it will take to fix them.

Mostly, the law enforcement officials said, keep federal funding for local law enforcement.

"Gang membership, gang crime, and gang violence is surging in our state," said Cantwell. "Our local law enforcement is doing great work meeting this threat head on, but they need federal support."

Cantwell called for the community meeting to hear firsthand about the region's recent rise in gang violence, according to her media representative.

Cantwell, who's hosting several meetings around the state with law enforcement leaders, last month introduced new anti-gang legislation that seeks to provide additional tools to law enforcement officers and prosecutors.

The top brass of the local FBI, DEA and ATF branches said the state has an increasing drug problem, due in part to the ease with which it moves up and down the Interstate-5 corridor.

Several people, including Executive Director Tony Orange of the Central Area Motivation Program and James Kelly of the Urban League said jobs and internships and treatment programs help keep at-risk youth and prior offenders out of prisons and jails.

DOJ_NMG_0137380

Stella Chao, of the Seattle Department of Neighborhoods, talked of Seattle's efforts to reduce crime in the South Park area with a comprehensive program that addresses school drop-out rates, crime, unemployment, recreational opportunities and mentorships.

King County Sheriff Sue Rahr talked about the need for increased database information and police intelligence so that officers can spend their time efficiently looking for offenders and not "just shaking down kids on street corners."

Cantwell also discussed other federal initiatives to help local law enforcement combat gangs and gang-related crime.

The president's most recent budget proposal undercuts federal support for local law enforcement, she said in a news release.

Ex-CIA Official Urges Silence After Spy 'Sting' (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

A former high-ranking CIA official refused FBI appeals for help in tracking Chinese spies and urged others via e-mail not to cooperate because of the recent prosecution of former Defense Intelligence Agency analyst Ron Montaperto.

Robert G. Sutter, a former national intelligence officer for East Asia and holder of a security clearance, told a mailing list of current and former government officials that a 2003 FBI "sting" operation against Montaperto, who was convicted in June of mishandling classified documents, raised fears that he and other officials could be damaged for discussing their contacts with Chinese officials.

The FBI and other U.S. counterintelligence agencies are stepping up efforts, including outreach to academics, to counter Chinese intelligence efforts after a string of damaging spy cases over the past five years, U.S. officials said.

Mr. Sutter, a Georgetown University professor, stated in the e-mail sent two weeks ago that he had met then with two "relatively young" FBI agents who asked for his help "regarding activities of Chinese officials that I judged might be deemed matters of espionage."

"They also seemed to want and need some educating on policies and priorities of the Chinese administration, and the state of play in U.S.-Chinese relations," he stated.

Mr. Sutter has specialized in Asian affairs for 33 years at CIA, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress and State Department intelligence bureau. He did not return telephone calls or e-mails seeking comment.

FBI spokeswoman Debbie Weierman declined to comment on the FBI's outreach on Chinese intelligence, but she said generally "we do contact a number of people ... to better know our domain."

Mr. Sutter's e-mail was sent to an exclusive list of some 30 current and former officials, including Lonnie Henley, acting national intelligence officer for East Asia, and Dennis Wilder, White House National Security Council staff Asia director.

The Washington Times obtained a copy of the e-mail from a member of the group.

Mr. Sutter stated that his recent meeting with FBI agents was similar to debriefings in the 1970s and 1980s, when he volunteered to share intelligence on meetings with European and Chinese officials.

"My reaction this time was very different than my reaction in the 1970s and 1980s," he stated. "I still have a security clearance, but this time I said almost nothing about China."

"What I did talk about was the credibility of the FBI " Mr. Sutter said. "I referred at some length to the Ron Montaperto 'sting.' I told the agents that while they seemed like nice people, and I tried to be cooperative with the U.S. government, I could not trust them or have any assurance that they would not use any information I provided in some way that would hurt me or others."

Mr. Sutter wrote that the agents then told him that they were "well-versed" on the Montaperto case and said that "the Montaperto sting had indeed closed doors and cut off contacts for the FBI."

"They went on at some length that the sting had seriously damaged the FBI's ability to tap U.S. expertise as it sought to deal with Chinese espionage," Mr. Sutter's e-mail said.

Montaperto in 2003 disclosed to the FBI and Navy counterintelligence agents during a sting operation that he provided both "secret" and "top secret" intelligence to two Chinese intelligence officers during more than 60 meetings, according to court documents in the case. He pleaded guilty to lesser charges of illegally retaining classified documents, but he admitted as part of a plea bargain to passing the secrets to Chinese intelligence.

The prosecution was a setback for a network of pro-China specialists in government and academia who have sought to play down China's growing military capabilities and intelligence operations in a coordinated effort they claim is aimed at improving U.S. ties to China.

Mr. Sutter said he wrote the e-mail as a warning to other China specialists, implying that they too should refuse to help the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0137381

"I pass along this account because I believe others will be contacted -- the two agents that talked to me said that the FBI is trying to broaden its contacts among China specialists," Mr. Sutter said.

Former U.S. intelligence officials and academics in the past privately supported U.S. government counterintelligence efforts, and Mr. Sutter's refusal to help is a sign that the FBI is lacking in its expertise and knowledge about Chinese spying.

Paul D. Moore, a former FBI counterintelligence analyst and specialist on China, said Mr. Sutter's e-mail highlights one of China's intelligence-gathering methods.

Chinese agents are "extremely comfortable working in ambiguous situations, [like] 'I help you, you help me,' " Mr. Moore said.

China has successfully "wormed" classified information out of U.S. nuclear-weapons scientists in meetings in China by showing them secret Chinese designs for warheads and then asking if the United States uses similar designs, he said.

"By saying 'no,' a scientist is revealing classified information," Mr. Moore said, and thus risks later prosecution when reporting the encounters.

"Smart people then wonder if they talk to these [FBI] guys they might slice and dice what is said and send it over to the Justice Department for an espionage prosecution," he said. "When you're dealing with counterespionage, it will suck you in."

More Counterfeit Money Changed Hands In '06 (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — The amount of counterfeit money being accepted by consumers and stores in the USA is climbing as crooks are increasingly using inexpensive home computers and printers to produce phony money.

About $62 million entered circulation that was later deemed fake in the 2006 fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30. That represents a more than 10% increase from the prior year and a 69% rise from just three years earlier, according to the latest data from the Secret Service obtained by USA TODAY.

Terry Tilka says he sees fake bills about once a week at Rock Island Brewing, a restaurant/bar he owns in Rock Island, Ill., as well as at a dance club he owns. "It's been worse in the last three or four years than I have ever seen in my 33 years of business," he says.

There has been a noticeable rise in counterfeiting in the past eight months in Pasco County, Fla., says Sgt. Bill Moltzan of the sheriff's office economic crimes unit there.

The crooks are bold. One person who was arrested charged people, including an undercover agent, for a counterfeiting how-to class. One man was arrested after dancers in a strip club realized he was passing out fake bills and called police while the bouncer held the man. A 62-year-old woman known as Grandma was caught this month trying to sell fake money at less than face value.

"Technology is making it easier for the people trying to do this on their own," Moltzan says.

Despite the rise, the amount of fake money in circulation is a fraction of 1% of genuine currency, Secret Service spokesman Eric Zahren says. The fact the money was caught suggests security features that have been added starting in 2003, such as colors and watermarks, make it easier to detect fakes, says Dennis Forgue, head of currency at Harlan J. Berk in Chicago.

The increase in currency caught should be seen "not necessarily as a sign of defeat, but as a sign of success," he says.

But Zahren says the ease of using home computers to make the money has added challenges to catching counterfeiters.

About 54% of the counterfeit currency collected in fiscal 2006 was made using digital technology vs. so-called offset printing, which involves more skill, time and expense. In 1996, only 1% of counterfeits were digitally produced, according to the Secret Service.

The government has been updating U.S. bills to try to thwart counterfeiters. In 2003, the $20 bill, the most frequently counterfeited currency in the USA, was the first to feature a color other than green. Other features such as a watermark and color-shifting ink also were added.

Since then, new $10 bills and $50 bills have entered circulation. This year, a new $5 bill will be introduced.

Bankruptcy Trustee Wants Probe of $100M Plus in Collins & Aikman Professional Fees

DOJ_NMG_0137382

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Justice Department is backing a call by a big creditor of Collins & Aikman Corp. to appoint an examiner to look into more than $100 million in fees charged by professionals in its bankruptcy case.

U.S. Trustee Saul Eisen, a Justice Department employee, said Collins & Aikman investor Third Avenue Value Fund had made "troubling allegations that merit an independent investigation," according to court papers filed Friday.

In December, Third Avenue asked for an examiner to look into the fees charged by Collins & Aikman's lawyers and advisers after the company abandoned its plan to reorganize. Third Avenue, which is owed $250 million from the auto supplier, argues the bankruptcy professionals should have cut their hours as soon as it was apparent the company would liquidate.

The trustee says Third Avenue's allegations merit an independent investigation and that the examiner should pay particular attention to decisions made by turnaround firm Kroll Zolfo Cooper LLC, which advised Collins & Aikman during its Chapter 11 case.

The Michigan automotive-parts maker has said the appointment of a fee examiner is unnecessary at this late stage in its bankruptcy case -- Collins & Aikman is about to be broken up and sold -- and would unfairly burden it with additional costs and fees.

Rather, Collins & Aikman wants a committee, which would include a company representative, to look into the professionals' fees. But a committee wouldn't have the same authority as an independent examiner.

Third Avenue, Collins & Aikman's largest creditor, resigned from the company's creditors committee in the fall, claiming the panel's bankruptcy advisers were racking up fees on "auto pilot" even while the company's reorganization strategy was failing.

The committee, however, has sided with Collins & Aikman, arguing that the examiner would simply add another layer of fees and expenses to the company's bankruptcy estate.

When he approved the last round of fees in Collins & Aikman's case two months ago, Bankruptcy Judge Steven W. Rhodes asked the company and its creditors to submit opinions about the need for an examiner. Rhodes will consider the request for an examiner at a hearing scheduled for March 12.

Collins & Aikman filed for Chapter 11 in May 2005 in U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Detroit amid production cutbacks by the biggest U.S. auto manufacturers and protection and allegations of fraud by investors who claimed they had been misled about the company's financial condition. But after 18 months in Chapter 11, the Southfield, Mich., company pulled the plug on its strategy and said it would sell its assets rather than emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone entity.

Court To Hear NYC Case On Special Ed School Reimbursement (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) _ The Supreme Court on Monday agreed to consider whether taxpayers must reimburse parents who enrolled their learning-disabled student in private school after deciding public schools were unable to meet the child's needs.

New York City's education department asked the justices to take the case after a federal appeals court said tuition reimbursement is available to the parents under the Individuals With Disabilities Act.

Lawyers for the boy's parents said the special education program proposed by the public school system was inadequate to meet the child's needs, prompting them to send him to a private school. The parents say that under federal law, they may challenge inappropriate proposals and obtain reimbursement for the costs of placement in private school.

The child is identified in court papers only as Gilbert F.

The case is Board of Education v. Tom F. on behalf of Gilbert F., 06-637.

High Court To Hear Case For Autistic Boy (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Jeff and Sandee Winkelman don't have the money to pay for private schooling for their autistic son, let alone hire a lawyer to sue their public school district.

The Winkelmans want the Supreme Court to rule that the main federal special education law gives them the right to go before a federal court to argue that taxpayers should pay for 9-year-old Jacob's private school, even though neither parent is a lawyer.

The case is before the court Tuesday, when the Winkelmans will be represented free of charge by a private lawyer.

Whether Jacob should have private schooling at public expense is not before the Supreme Court, only his parents' right to go into federal court without a lawyer.

The parents objected to the Parma, Ohio, public schools' plan to educate Jacob at a public school. They wanted the district to pay for his $56,000 yearly enrollment in a private school that specializes in educating autistic children.

DOJ_NMG_0137383

The Individuals With Disabilities in Education Act gives every child the right to a free appropriate public education, which in the case of special needs children sometimes means enrollment in a private facility.

Parents unhappy with a district's plan can appeal the decision through an administrative process. If they remain dissatisfied, they can file a civil lawsuit.

At that point, however, they have to find a lawyer, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled in the Winkelmans' case. People who are not lawyers can represent themselves in court proceedings, but not other parties. The appeals court said the law requires the child to be the plaintiff.

The Winkelmans also are asking the Supreme Court to decide that they can file their own lawsuit under IDEA because they are responsible for Jacob, financially and otherwise.

Most parents who want to sue over special education decisions can't afford a lawyer, according to a brief filed by the Autism Society of America and related rights groups.

The Bush administration and 12 Democratic lawmakers, including Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, have sided with the Winkelmans. They argue that Congress clearly intended the special education law to allow parents to go into court without a lawyer's help.

"Congress recognized the interests of parents in guiding the course and substance of their child's education," the Democrats' legal brief said.

In response, the school district said Congress declined in its most recent amendments to the special education law to allow the kind of representation the Winkelmans are seeking. A provision that passed the Senate said, "A parent of a child with a disability may represent the child in any action ... without the assistance of an attorney." But the language dropped out of the legislation before it became law.

The Winkelmans have spent about $30,000 in legal fees since first contesting Jacob's treatment in 2003. Jeff Winkelman has taken a second job while his wife has researched previous court rulings and written her own filings.

The case number is Jacob Winkelman v. Parma City School District, 05-983.

Center Helps FBI With List Of Potential Victims Of Racial Violence (AP)

By Chris Talbott

AP, February 27, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - George Love was killed in a 1958 Mississippi Delta gun battle with police who believed he was involved in a murder - one year later he was cleared of the allegation.

Jimmie Lee Griffin was killed in a hit-and-run accident in 1965. A coroner's report showed the Sturgis resident was run over at least twice.

Hubert Orsby's body was found in the Black River near Canton. He wore a shirt with "CORE," the acronym for the Congress of Racial Equality, on it.

Their deaths are among 74 in 11 states the Southern Poverty Law Center says could be racially motivated killings of black men and women between 1952 and 1968.

The center, which reports on hate crimes, has forwarded the list to the FBI and the Justice Department is expected to hold a press conference Tuesday to talk about a new database of old civil rights era cases that now could be investigated.

Center officials believe the list can be helpful in future investigations.

"In each case there was significant evidence that the death may have been a racial murder," said Mark Potok, director of the center's Intelligence Project.

Researchers at the Montgomery, Ala.-based center can't prove the people on their list - which includes 32 Mississippi cases - were killed because of their race. But they believe each is worth investigation.

Researchers developed the list in the late 1980s while identifying 40 victims of racially motivated killings whose names were etched in a memorial. Those names were also included in the book, "Free at Last: A History of the Civil Rights Movement and Those Who Died in the Struggle."

The center hopes the FBI can help add names that rightfully belong on the memorial.

"We did a lot of research on these names and we're very hopeful that this information will be helpful to the FBI and particularly that it will be helpful to the families of those who were murdered."

In addition to potential Mississippi victims, the list includes deaths in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Kentucky and New York.

DOJ_NMG_0137384

The list covers an era of extreme tension and violence across the South as federal authorities tried to force recalcitrant segregationists to integrate schools under the Supreme Court's Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, Kan., ruling in 1954.

Violence against blacks and the whites who hoped to help better their lives spiked, peaking during the so-called Civil Rights summer of 1964.

"Before 1954 there was somewhat of a thaw" in race relations in Mississippi, said DePauw University historian John Dittmer, whose book, "Local People," chronicles the time.

"You had a more enlightened Legislature ... and more blacks registering to vote in some places. There were even black police in one or two cities patrolling black areas. But the Brown decision changed all that."

Many of the people identified by the center allegedly died at the hands of law enforcement officers. If charged, whites were often exonerated by sympathetic juries.

The center's researchers wrote this of Woodrow Wilson Daniels' 1958 killing in Water Valley: "Sheriff Buster Treloar, identified by four witnesses as the man who beat Daniels to death in a prison, was freed after 23 minutes of deliberation by an all-white jury. "By God," Treloar said after the trial, "now I can get back to rounding up bootleggers and damn niggers."

Many things have changed about Mississippi in the decades that have passed since that era of violence, including a large number of black elected officials. But Sheriff Reginald L. Jackson of Wilkinson County, where one of the victims on the list was killed, said times in his county of 11,000 people have changed little in 40 years.

"Rich, poor, black or white or other race, it doesn't make any difference in my opinion," said the 49-year-old Jackson, who is among a handful of black sheriffs in Mississippi. "But yet we still have some segregation problems and things have not changed a whole lot.

"Within Wilkinson County as a whole, you can see we're still operating pretty much under the old standard."

Cincinnati Landlord Accused Of Harassing Female Tenants (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

CINCINNATI - The U.S. Department of Justice on Monday sued a landlord, accusing him of a pattern of sexual harassment against female tenants over the past nine years.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court here accuses James G. Mitchell, of Cincinnati, of making sexual comments, touching women sexually without permission, entering their apartments without permission or notice, and denying housing on the basis of gender. It also said he retaliated against women who rejected his advances.

It lists at least 53 properties Mitchell owns, some of which have more than one unit. Most are in Cincinnati, with a handful in Fairfield, Hamilton and West Chester.

The lawsuit seeks a court finding that Mitchell has violated the Fair Housing Act, an order forbidding future discrimination and unspecified monetary damages for any woman harassed.

"No woman should be subjected to sexual harassment in her home," said Wan J. Kim, assistant attorney general for the justice department's Civil Rights Division, in a news release.

Boca Zoning Ordinance For Sober Houses Is Discriminatory, Judge Rules (FLSUNSEN)

By Peter Franceschina, Sun-Sentinel.com

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 27, 2007

A judge ruled Monday that a Boca Raton ordinance that bans so-called sober houses from residential neighborhoods is discriminatory and violates the federal Fair Housing Act.

The ruling from U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks came in a lawsuit filed by Steve Manko, who operates two apartment buildings - Boca House for men and Awakenings for women - and several homes for recovering alcohol and drug addicts.

LocalLinks

Attorneys for Manko and several former Boca House residents said the ruling was victory for recovering addicts, who are considered handicapped and are entitled to housing protections under federal law, but the judge's decision also favored the city in some aspects of the complex litigation.

"It's a good ruling in that the judge found the city violated the Fair Housing Act. It's not a complete victory, but the judge said at the end of trial it was not going to be a complete victory, but it is a victory," said Manko's attorney, William Hill. "The city violates the Fair Housing Act - that should be the headline from this ruling. We've said that all along. They should not have passed this ordinance."

In May 2002, the City Council passed an ordinance that would require the sober houses to move into areas of the city zoned for medical centers and hotels. The ordinance was never enforced because of the threat of litigation.

Manko filed suit in 2003, and in September the U.S. Department of Justice also filed suit against the city alleging the ordinance was discriminatory. That case is still pending.

"It is a win for us," said Jim Green, an attorney for the American Civil Liberties Union who represented several former residents of Boca House when the case went to trial last month.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the ruling was a mixed one - while the judge struck down parts of the city's ordinances, he upheld other parts, including a provision that the city can require that state-licensed facilities be in commercial districts. None of Manko's operations are required to be licensed by the state, his attorney said.

The city maintained that Manko's sober houses are commercial and medical operations - involving on-site drug testing, counseling and other services - that are inappropriate for a residential neighborhood. In his ruling, the judge said he had problems with some of the commercial aspects of Manko's operation, which currently help nearly 400 people.

Cole said he was pleased the judge found that the city had not intentionally discriminated against addicts, and that the city has an interest in protecting the residential character of its neighborhoods.

"We are happy the judge is sympathetic to our position," Cole said. "He did not find that we intentionally discriminated." Mayor Steven Abrams said Monday he did not know how if the council would pursue changes to the sober-house ordinance to make it enforceable or just drop the issue.

"The council hasn't discussed it. I just don't know at this point. We need advice from our lawyers on that," he said.

The judge also ruled that another city ordinance, which prevents more than three unrelated people from living together, can't be enforced until the city establishes a process that complies with federal law for making exceptions. Cole said the city has such a process, but it is not spelled out in city code.

The judge's ruling will allow the city to enforce the three-person limitation in the apartment building units, Cole said.

Manko's attorney asked the judge to award about $925,000 to Manko for lost profits, but the judge said during the trial that was a tenuous claim. The judge awarded nominal damages of $1 to each plaintiff.

Judge: Law Discriminates Against Disabled (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, February 27, 2007

BOCA RATON — A city zoning ordinance discriminates against disabled people and violates the federal Fair Housing Act, a judge ruled Monday.

The complaint was filed by the U.S. Justice Department and Steve Manko, who operates two apartment buildings and several homes for recovering alcohol and drug addicts. The lawsuit alleged that the ordinance excluded housing recovering drug and alcohol addicts in residential areas and imposes “conditions and prohibitions on housing for persons with disabilities that are not imposed on housing for an equal or greater number of persons without disabilities.”

Attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union and Manko called the ruling a good one, according to the South Florida Sun-Sentinel.

“The city violates the Fair Housing Act — that should be the headline from this ruling. We’ve said that all along. They should not have passed this ordinance,” said Manko’s attorney William Hill.

U.S. District Judge Donald Middlebrooks also ruled Monday that the city can require that state-licensed facilities be in commercial districts. The city claimed that Manko’s buildings are commercial and medical operations, which involve onsite drug testing, counseling and other services. Manko’s operations are not required to be licensed by the state, Manko’s attorney said.

Manko was seeking about $925,000 for lost profits. The judge awarded him $1.

Jamie Cole, an attorney for the city, said the ruling proved city officials did not intentionally discriminate.

Mayor Steven Abrams said Monday that he did not know how if the council would pursue changes to the ordinance to make it enforceable or just drop the issue.

“The council hasn’t discussed it. I just don’t know at this point. We need advice from our lawyers on that,” he said.

NY Village Wants To Keep Voting System, Let Hispanic Power Evolve (AP)

By Jim Fitzgerald, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. -- A suburban village that is nearly half Hispanic but is governed mainly by whites asked a federal judge on Monday to let its politics evolve naturally rather than cancel elections and impose a new voting system to give Latinos a greater voice.

DOJ_NMG_0137386

Anthony Piscionere, attorney for Port Chester, said "an organic and natural system is beginning to take hold" to the benefit of Hispanics. Cutting the village into districts to increase the chances of Hispanic representation, as the Department of Justice has asked, "would be officially segregating the Village of Port Chester forever," he said.

Piscionere spoke in federal court in White Plains during closing arguments on the government's request for an injunction against village trustee elections scheduled for March 20. The Department of Justice claims that the village's at-large method of electing trustees is unfair to Hispanics and violates the Voting Rights Act, which the village denies.

The Voting Rights Act is often used to oppose at-large voting. In the 1990s, actor Ossie Davis and other black activists went to court to challenge New Rochelle's at-large City Council elections, and the city eventually approved a referendum that changed the system.

Soon after that, a federal judge found that Hempstead's at-large town board system "invidiously excluded blacks from effective participation in the town's political life" and ordered six districts drawn up.

"It's a powerful act," said lawyer Randolph McLaughlin, who was involved with both those cases. It's been used "countless times around the country" by the government and individuals to battle at-large voting, he said.

In Port Chester, which has about 28,000 residents, according to the 2000 census, the government is seeking to delay the election until the village accepts or the judge imposes a district system that would include one sector in which a Hispanic candidate could be expected to win.

Port Chester is about 25 miles from New York City, on the Connecticut border in Westchester County. It is governed by a mayor and six trustees. The trustees' three-year terms are staggered so that two are elected each year to represent the entire village.

Regardless of how Judge Stephen Robinson rules on whether the election should be delayed, he plans to hold a separate trial on the main issue _ whether the system discriminates against Hispanics.

Most of the issues that are likely to be argued at the main trial came up during the injunction case, as population experts, political leaders and would-be candidates testified.

Cesar Ruiz, a Hispanic who lost a race for trustee in 2001, said Democratic leaders turned against him when he began to promote issues that were important to Latinos. They gave him "the cold shoulder" and did not invite him to the Election Night reception, he testified.

A current Hispanic Republican candidate, the Rev. Ariel Acosta, said that during a meeting about the election districts, he heard hecklers shout "Latinos don't belong here" and "Latinos, go back home."

Piscionere and Assistant U.S. Attorney David Kennedy agreed that no Hispanic has ever been elected to the six-member Board of Trustees, but they differed on the success rate of candidates favored by Hispanics.

The government's demographics expert said a six-district system could be drawn in which Hispanics would be 70 percent of the citizen voting-age population in one sector. Piscionere said that didn't necessarily mean a Hispanic would be elected, since Hispanic registration and turnout rates were low.

And if it didn't work, he said, it would be "a Pyrrhic victory."

The village attorney also contended there was no evidence that village voters were "driven by racial bias," and the judge seemed to agree, saying he does not believe "that this system has been put in place or has been maintained for the purpose of diluting the Hispanic vote." But it may have that effect, he added, and he challenged Piscionere's claim that Hispanics have had as much opportunity as anyone else to get involved.

Kennedy said, "Whatever reason this system was put into place, it's broken."

He said that while Piscionere contended Hispanics were poised to take greater political power in the village, what they are really poised for is "to be locked out of the political process for many years to come."

Task Force Report A `step Forward' In Fighting Human Trafficking (AP)

By Jon Sarche, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

DENVER — Like domestic violence 30 years ago, human trafficking is poorly understood and hard to identify, but a new task force report represents a "major step forward" in combating the emerging problem, officials said Monday.

The report, to be delivered to the Legislature on Tuesday, said federal grants and new programs are helping law enforcement officers identify victims, and helping victim advocates learn new methods to help them.

"These people (traffickers) go to the most desolated, desperate areas where families will actually sell children to people they trust," said Rep. Alice Borodkin, D-Denver, who sponsored the 2005 bill that created the task force.

"Then when they come in (to the United States), these people are coerced, broken and they're terrified of any law enforcement. They don't know they can't walk out the door," she said.

The report said authorities in Colorado know of about 30 cases of human trafficking — exploitation of people through force, threats or deception — since 2005. But it also said federal authorities estimate that only 1 percent of victims in the United States have been identified and provided assistance.

State lawmakers have taken initial steps in fighting human trafficking, but the task force was created to help provide guidance to further efforts.

Last year, lawmakers approved a bill to make it a felony to smuggle humans — a crime authorities said can often lead to human trafficking, which was made a felony in separate legislation approved last year.

Another bill gave the Colorado State Patrol about $1.5 million to train up to 24 troopers in working with illegal immigrants to boost enforcement against human smuggling and trafficking. Nineteen troopers volunteered to begin that training next month, said patrol spokesman Sgt. Jeff Goodwin.

Officials said helping train law enforcement officers to recognize victims of human trafficking will be critical. It can be difficult for a police officer to determine whether a woman suspected of prostitution, for example, has been forced into prostitution by people keeping her in the country against her will, Borodkin said.

"Identifying the victim is a big step that's going to have to take place," said Salvation Army Maj. Neal Hogan. "Our state has taken a major step forward in saying our state is not going to tolerate this."

The Justice Department gave the Salvation Army a grant to set up programs in Denver and several other cities to help raise awareness of human trafficking, educate law enforcement and the public about it and track victims and determine how best to serve their needs.

The task force made several recommendations to expand those efforts statewide to help combat the growing problem. It also recommended enhancing penalties for trafficking in children and change victim-assistance laws to specifically encompass victims of human trafficking.

Supreme Court to Consider Washington Primary System

February 27, 2007; Page A8

The Supreme Court said it will consider the constitutionality of a state primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party. The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over its "Top 2" primary system, which allows candidates to indicate their party affiliation on the ballot. Lower federal courts agreed with the Washington Democratic and Republican parties that the system infringes on their right to choose their own nominees.

German Union Sets Pay Target

Germany's labor union IG Metall announced its official claim for a 6.5% rise in wages for workers in the metal and engineering industry, leading unions across the country that have called 2007 the "year of pay rise." Negotiations with employers, including all major German car makers and steel producers, are scheduled to begin March 12. Unions say the wage increase is needed to fuel private consumption. Employers have said they aren't willing to raise wages more than last year's 3% rise. In 2006, IG Metall started by calling for a 5% wage hike.

Ecuador Revives EU Banana Spat

Ecuador asked the World Trade Organization to rule on whether European banana import tariffs are too high, restarting a decade-old dispute over what Latin American countries and the U.S. have argued is unfair trade discrimination. The WTO has consistently ruled against how the European Union sets tariffs for bananas, but the EU says a tariff established last year has brought it into compliance. The WTO's dispute-settlement body will meet March 8 to discuss Ecuador's request.

Supreme Court To Review 'Top Two' Primary System (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The Supreme Court said yesterday it will consider the constitutionality of a statewide primary election system in which the top two finishers advance to the general election even if they are from the same party.

The justices will hear arguments in the fall in a case from Washington state over the "top two" primary system that voters adopted.

DOJ_NMG_0137388

The system allows candidates to indicate party affiliation on the ballot and is open to voters regardless of party. The system is the successor to the blanket primary, which the Supreme Court struck down in 2000 on the grounds that it violated political parties' rights.

The Washington Democratic and Republican parties sued to block the new system, approved by voters in 2004. The parties said they would be forced to be associated with candidates they did not choose. Lower federal courts agreed with the parties. The new system infringes on the rights of political parties to choose their own nominees, said the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit.

Security Study Urges Changes At Iowa Prison (DMR)

Des Moines Register, February 27, 2007

The Iowa State Penitentiary at Fort Madison still suffers from security flaws that could make it vulnerable to the type of escape that occurred in November 2005 when two dangerous convicts fled from the maximum-security prison, according to a new federal security audit.

Two consultants from the National Institute of Corrections who spent two days inspecting the Iowa prison in October suggested relocating an electronic alarm system on the prison's walls, adding more razor wire, improving outside lighting and acquiring more digital cameras.

The consultants also recommended acquiring better metal detectors, along with so-called "heartbeat monitors" that can catch inmates hiding in vehicles leaving the prison.

In addition, they suggested that inmates working in the Prison Industries building be required to strip naked and go through metal detectors while headed to and from their job assignments.

Inmates Martin Moon and Robert Legendre, both serving life sentences, made a daring escape from the State Penitentiary on Nov. 14, 2005, using a handcrafted rope and a grappling hook to scale a 30-foot limestone wall that surrounds the prison.

Moon, serving time for murder, and Legendre, serving sentences for attempted murder and kidnapping, were the first inmates to escape from the maximum-security since 1979.

Both were captured within days -- Moon in Illinois and Legendre in Missouri, but their escape raised serious questions about security at the penitentiary, which was established in the 1800s and is the oldest prison west of the Mississippi River.

Both inmates had been part of a Prison Industries work crew, and they disappeared over a section of the prison wall that had a guard tower left unstaffed because of state budget cuts.

After the escape, prison officials ordered the tower be immediately staffed around the clock.

The consultants, Stan Czerniak and James Upchurch, were invited to inspect the Fort Madison prison by the Iowa Department of Corrections. Czerniak is assistant director of operations for the Oregon Department of Corrections; Upchurch is bureau chief for security operations with the Florida Deparment of Corrections.

They worked in Iowa under the auspices of the National Institute of Corrections, a federal agency within the U.S. Department of Justice.

Iowa Department of Corrections spokesman Fred Scaletta said Monday the penitentiary has only been in receipt of the report for a short period of time and has not been able to implement many of the recommendations.

Also, many of the recommendations will require a cost that is not currently within the penitentiary's budget, but will be requested in future state appropriations, he said.

Danny Homan, president of Council 61 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, which represents prison workers at Fort Madison, criticized the security audit.

"This report is the classic a little and too late," Homan said. "The two escapes happened in 2005, and now a federally funded outside group comes forward to say what should be changed and how it should be done."

He said the union and prison officials have been ironing out the security problems for more than one year.

EDITORIAL Redraw Congressional Districts (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

THE DRIVE TO GET California politicians out of the business of selecting their own voters by shaping their own districts may be derailed by the speakership of Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). Although not long ago it was Republicans who didn't want to risk losing any of their California seats, it's now Pelosi and nervous Democrats who are threatening to scuttle badly needed reform by putting their own interests first. They should back down, and quickly.

Redistricting reform may be a low-profile issue, but it's an important one. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has twice called for an end to the unacceptable status quo in which Sacramento lawmakers divvy up state and congressional districts among their parties when new census figures come out every 10 years.

The party leaders who control the line-drawing reward friends — and politicians who prove to be especially adept at raising money — by designing legislative districts that incumbents can easily defend. But that's not even the seamy part. With the genius of chess masters and the artistry of Renaissance painters, creative partisan mapmakers plot the moves of their favorites from the Assembly to the state Senate and then on to the promised land: Congress, the land of no term limits.

Early this year in Sacramento, in the euphoria of bipartisanship, Democrats grudgingly signed on with Schwarzenegger in his latest call for redistricting reform.

Momentum built as state lawmakers put their chess-playing skills to work linking district reform to rolling back their own term limits. With the prospect of more time in office, politicians found the loss of their district-shaping power palatable.

But Senate President Pro Tem Don Perata (D-Oakland) was candid from the start: He wasn't going to sign on to any plan that could cost Democrats their newly won control of Congress.

So now Democrats are hedging. Sure, they say, let a citizens commission draw the lines for the Assembly, the state Senate, the state Board of Equalization. But not Congress.

Without Congress, though, there is no meaningful reform. Leaving state party leaders with the power to draw congressional lines leaves them with the power to reward and punish candidates rising through the ranks today. Raise a lot of money for the party and they just may draw a congressional district chock-full of voters predisposed to vote for you. Disregard your fundraising chores or vote the wrong way on an important bill and your political future may be over.

Congressional lines must be part of the package. Schwarzenegger is right to insist on it. It would be foolish to expect voters to loosen their grip on state term limits if lawmakers cannot relinquish their stranglehold on districts.

As for Pelosi, here's a radical notion: Trust the voters to pick the people they want to represent them.

ANTITRUST:

Regulatory Clearance Seen As Slow But Sure (NYT)

By Clifford Krauss And Matthew R. Wald

New York Times, February 27, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 26 — The sale of the biggest utility in Texas to private investors faces months of state and federal regulatory hurdles, but experts predict that the broad support for the deal from environmentalists and other important interest groups should help it clear them with ease.

A bigger question, some experts say, is whether the newly formed company will be able to keep all its constituents — consumers and shareholders, growth-oriented politicians and environmentalists — as happy in the years ahead as they appear to be now.

In their official announcement of the merger agreement on Monday, the TXU Corporation and the lead buyers, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group, promised a 10 percent rate decrease for consumers while sustaining service to an increasingly energy-hungry Texas. Along with reducing the planned coal-fired plants to 3 from 11, the new owners also vowed to invest more in renewable energy, including solar and wind power.

The agreement was greeted with satisfaction by everyone from Texas officials to national environmentalists, who viewed it as a model for other states and utilities as well as a call to action for Congress to legislate against the spread of traditional coal power and its role in contributing to global warming.

“I applaud this investment in emissions reductions, renewable sources and Texas jobs,” Gov. Rick Perry said.

Peter Altman, the coal campaign director of the National Environmental Trust, was equally effusive. But “as welcome as the TXU deal is,” he warned , “it is still a wake-up call for Congress that there are more than 100 coal plants on the drawing board.”

The utility’s promises of sustained service, more renewable energy and lower prices should go far in satisfying the Public Utility Commission of Texas, the regulatory body with the power to review purchases and mergers of electric utilities to ensure that they are in the public interest.

“There is a general expectation,” said Terry Hadley, a spokesman for the commission in Austin, “that the new owner would provide at least, if not a better, level of service quality.” Mr. Hadley said the commission would take “however long it takes to be comfortable” with the deal and pointed out that “we can take measures to require a higher level of service” if necessary.

The current management of the company has come under criticism from consumer groups and politicians for being too quick to cut off electricity to late payers and not keeping public lighting in downtown Dallas adequately serviced.

In Washington, the challenges are relatively minor because there are few antitrust issues in the company's going private.

The Nuclear Regulatory Commission will have some jurisdiction since TXU runs a nuclear power plant. "What we tend to look for is if the successor company has the financial reserves and financial and technical knowledge and know-how to operate a nuclear power plant," said David McIntyre, an N.R.C. spokesman.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has less jurisdiction in Texas than other states, but it will probably review the company's limited operations out of state.

Barbara Struck, an analyst with the Energy Intelligence Group, a research firm, predicted that the deal would be approved by regulators "because of the environmental conditions associated with it" and the promises to cut consumer rates.

Peter Hartley, an economist at Rice University, said the utility would have a very hard time keeping its promises to everyone. "How can you make more for all these groups from the same assets and the same management?" he asked. "In the end, they may have to go to the regulators and ask for a rate increase."

In their statement Monday, the company and equity firms promised the decrease in rates until September 2008. The company did not reply to telephone requests for more information.

Representatives of environmental groups predicted that the TXU deal would make it harder for other companies to build new pulverized coal plants. Eric Cane, an analyst at Innovest Strategic Value Advisors, said the settlement would make companies like Dynegy and Xcel think twice about building more coal plants that do not include a plan to keep carbon dioxide from entering the atmosphere.

What the deal shows, more than anything else, they said, was a growing expectation of carbon taxes in the future. "The economics might be there right now for a utility to build a pulverized coal facility," Mr. Cane said, "but you have to question that company's decision, if they're looking forward past the near future."

That is not the way some big coal producers see it, though. And they say they still have basic economics on their side. Until a significant cost is imposed on each ton of carbon pumped into the atmosphere, coal will stand out as the most cost-efficient way to supply new electricity and most regulators will have a hard time agreeing to impose more expensive alternatives on consumers.

"If what has been proposed takes hold and TXU does not advance with the construction of new plants, it will likely enable" other coal facilities to be built, said Vic Svec, a spokesman for Peabody Energy, a coal mining company that has moved into power generation.

The power will still be needed and the type of plant TXU has proposed, he said, is the cleanest, least expensive proven technology to get it.

In TXU Deal, Texas Regulator Has Few Levers To Pull (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith, Susan Warren And Dennis K. Berman

Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

PUC's Limited Role May Ease Passage; Rival Suitors Scurry

Texas regulators have little authority to challenge or block the proposed $32 billion private-equity buyout of utility titan TXU Corp., which could ease the deal's completion despite opposition gearing up in the state. Meanwhile, potential rival bidders considered their options.

A group led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Texas Pacific Group announced a proposed acquisition of TXU yesterday, in a deal that includes the assumption of more than $12 billion in debt. The deal, which would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, was made after the prospective buyers negotiated with environmental groups to reduce TXU's debate-stirring plans to build a fleet of coal-fired power plants.

Yesterday, a number of Wall Street banks and potential investors were scrambling to respond to their competitors' headline-grabbing move.

Blackstone Group was looking at launching a rival bid, potentially with an industry player as its partner, people familiar with the matter said. Given the KKR-Texas Pacific group's huge head start, any Blackstone offer would have to include a higher price and perhaps a different structure. A strategic partner would enable Blackstone to arrange a more creative deal and hence pay more. Blackstone declined to comment.

A slew of other buyout groups were checking with banks about financing, according to people familiar with the matter. Some were signing confidentiality agreements with TXU, which is leading a 50-day "go shop" period to attract a higher bidder, another person familiar with the matter said.

While Wall Street observers said they believed other buyers could raise enough money, they were generally skeptical that a rival could line up the environmental and political cover that KKR and Texas Pacific have secured. Others note though, that a rival bid could promise the same concessions and that the ultimate decision rests with shareholders. In weighing bids, certainty can be almost as important as price. KKR also has had longstanding relations with TXU Chief Executive C.John Wilder, and Texas Pacific, which is incorporated in Texas, is the hometown player.

Mr. Wilder, who has expressed a desire to stay with the company, stands to reap a rich payday. He negotiated a lucrative compensation package three years ago, when TXU was in the doldrums; under his direction, TXU stock soared from about $10 a share to more than $60.

By some estimates, he may now be eligible for well over $100 million in payments, reflecting the full vesting of several large stock allotments called for under his complex five-year employment contract. Mark Reilly, a partner at pay consultant 3C, Compensation Consulting Consortium, said ambiguity in the wording of some documents, such as TXU's proxy statement, made a detailed estimate difficult. But he said the contract could be valued at as much as $200 million at the current stock price. The company didn't confirm the amount.

TXU said it is considering dividing the company into three separate ones. That would make the company's regulated power-transmission business distinct from both its unregulated power-generation business, the biggest in the state, and its power-sales unit. Each is the biggest in its field, reflecting TXU's stature as a century-old utility that serves most of the northeastern part of the state from its Dallas headquarters.

As merger interest has surged in the long-neglected utility sector, some states have moved to block major deals. Last year, FPL Group and Constellation Energy Group called off their $12.5 billion merger amid Maryland regulators' concerns about rising power prices. Also last year, Exelon Corp. scrapped its $17 billion acquisition of Public Service Enterprise Group Inc. because of opposition in New Jersey.

But Texas state regulators have little power to block a sale, even if they feel consumers will be harmed, according to TXU, a spokesman for the Public Utility Commission of Texas and others involved in the deal. The law requires the commission to investigate transactions to determine whether they are "consistent with the public interest," but a finding to that effect isn't required in order for a transaction to proceed.

Under the law, the commission can stop a buyer from jacking up rates for regulated enterprises like power delivery, but it has little or no control over whether a sale takes place. The result is that the largest leveraged buyout in U.S. history is free to proceed with state power regulators on the sidelines. The law allows them to hold hearings but doesn't require full evidentiary hearings, which once were the norm, with document production and the calling of witnesses.

The state's 1999 law deregulating its power market further weakened regulators' ability to block deals.

TXU spokeswoman Lisa Singleton said yesterday that TXU regards the commission as "an important stakeholder" but not one with any legal authority over transactions. "We don't need them to approve the deal," she said.

A spokesman for the Public Utility Commission said the commissioners are debating what to do. The company's debt was downgraded to less-than-investment grade yesterday because of expectations of a greater debt load, although some analysts said they don't expect the buyers to load the debt on the regulated part of the business.

The deal won a mixed reaction in Texas, where TXU and Mr. Wilder have been embroiled in debate over the planned coal plants and repeated rate increases. As part of the acquisition deal, the new private-equity owners have agreed to drop plans for eight of the 11 coal plants TXU had envisioned.

As part of the proposed sale, TXU also has moved to placate customers by confirming it will offer a 10% rate reduction. But the reduction will be available only to customers who haven't elected to move off TXU's basic rate, sometimes called its "price to beat" or default service. That in effect excludes about 70% of its residential customers and all of its commercial and industrial customers. The discount would last until September 2008.

The Texas legislature already has been considering several bills that seek to deal with the problem of high power prices in the state and a deregulation law that has left many consumers very unhappy. Texas Sen. Troy Fraser, chairman of the Business and Commerce Committee, said that the deal only heightens his anxiety about the high cost of electricity and that he felt the proposed rate cut was "too little, too late."

He said he was dismayed to learn the parties had been talking about the transaction for months "but they never bothered to visit with the leadership in the legislature or the PUC." He said they "finally ran me down Friday evening, and it wasn't to ask my input. It was to tell me what they were doing."

TXU Sets Out Benefits Of $45bn Buy-out (FT)

By James Politi

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

TXU on Monday embarked on a campaign to promote a $45bn leveraged buy-out led by Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group amid mounting evidence that the private equity boom has entered a new, more highly politicised era.

DOJ_NMG_0137392

Executives at the Texas power company said the deal would bring lower prices for consumers and stronger environmental policies, including a reduction in carbon emissions and more investment in renewable energy.

Under John Wilder, chief executive, TXU has been the target of environmental groups, angered by the company's plans to construct 11 coal-fired plants to meet Texas's growing energy needs.

But in a sign of private equity's increasing awareness that acquiring big companies entails garnering the support of politicians and special interest groups as well as investors, KKR and TPG agreed to scrap plans to build eight of those coal plants.

The new owners also agreed to bring in James Baker, former US secretary of state; William Reilly, former Environmental Protection Agency administrator; and Donald Evans, former US commerce secretary, to help oversee the investment.

In an interview with the Financial Times, Mr Wilder said he had originally proposed an "aggressive" stand-alone plan that included many of the moves that would be undertaken by TPG and KKR.

But he said the company's board concluded that his proposal was "inferior" to the buy-out. "[The buyers] bring a network of individuals and capabilities that a company like TXU couldn't construct on its own," Mr Wilder said. "We believe they will be a catalyst for innovation."

In leveraged buy-outs, private equity groups typically aim to generate returns in excess of 20 per cent over a time frame of about five years.

When TPG and KKR take over TXU, they will split it into its three main business lines: retail, generation and transmission. Theoretically, the buyers will earn their return by selling each of the units or taking them public in several years.

TXU shareholders will receive $69.25 per share in the deal – a 15 per cent premium over the company's Friday closing share price.

If completed, the deal would represent the largest leveraged buy-out, exceeding this month's $38.9bn takeover of Equity Office Properties, the commercial real estate group, by Blackstone.

The succession of record-breaking deals by private equity groups has been accompanied by criticism, particularly among some European politicians and trade union leaders, that such transactions are bad for the economy.

The private equity groups buying TXU do not expect their buy-out to result in job losses, however. In addition, KKR and TPG have promised a 10 per cent reduction in prices for consumers.

Meanwhile, shares in other US power companies, including Dynegy and Mirant, rose on speculation that they might be the next private equity targets.

Private Equity Buyout Of TXU Is Enormous In Size And In Its Complexity (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 27, 2007

Wall Street banks have provided billions of dollars to finance takeovers in the last year, essentially serving as mortgage lenders to deal-hungry private equity firms, which are among the banks' best-paying customers.

Now the lenders have created a new type of loan that has them ponying up part of the down payment on these deals as well. That trend is vividly illustrated in the $45 billion buyout of the Texas energy giant TXU, which was announced yesterday. There are risks in the transaction, as there are in any large buyout, but for the Wall Street banks behind the deal, it could be even riskier.

In an unusual twist that may soon become common, the banks are going one step further than simply providing the debt financing involved in the deal, in this case a daunting $24 billion of debt.

The banks are also lending $1 billion to TXU's buyers, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company and the Texas Pacific Group — not as secured debt, but in the form of equity using the bank's own cash.

Known as an "equity bridge," the arrangement allows leveraged buyout firms to buy companies with even less cash upfront. The idea is that the leveraged buyout firms will find other investors to ante up cash after the deal is announced.

These bridges can lead to trouble, however. If the private equity firms cannot find new investors — and it is their job, not the banks', to find them — or if the value of the asset falls sharply, the banks are left holding the bag.

"This is how things blow up; people take more risk," said Andy Kessler, a former research analyst and hedge fund manager who has written books about Wall Street. "If you go back to the crash of 1987, all the banks had huge bridges that went bust."

Some have compared the use of the equity bridges to a much more risky version of Michael R. Milken's famous "highly confident" letters in the 1980s takeover boom, which gave assurances that his firm, Drexel Burnham Lambert, could sell junk bonds to finance deals for its clients.

Investment bankers say that the private equity firms, which have become some of the largest fee payers to Wall Street, put pressure on them to extend an equity bridge in exchange for syndicating the debt, a job that can prove very lucrative.

"The bridge may be a pay-to-play," Mr. Kessler said.

The new tactic has appeared in a handful of deals recently, including the $39 billion takeover of Equity Office Properties this month. It lets a private equity firm pursue enormous transactions without bringing in partners, at least until it has negotiated a deal on its own terms.

Indeed, the advent of the equity bridge could spell the end of giant consortium transactions, or club deals, in which often rival private equity firms team up on a bid. In the $11.3 billion buyout of SunGard Data Systems in 2005, for example, seven private equity firms banded together, each with a seat at the negotiating table.

The use of the equity bridge may instead spur private equity firms to be more competitive in bidding, because they would not need to forge temporary alliances of convenience with rivals to mount large bids. And that would take some pressure off the firms, which have been under scrutiny by the Justice Department over whether the consortiums constitute a form of collusion.

In the case of TXU, Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific are expected to invite their limited partners — the investors in their own funds, like big pension plans — to invest directly in this deal. By investing alongside the private equity firms, these investors can share in the rewards if the deal pays off without paying the same enormous fees to the firms that they typically do to invest in their funds. Private equity firms offer direct investment as an inducement to also invest in their funds that do carry fees.

The TXU buyout calls for about $8 billion of cash upfront, $24 billion of new debt and the assumption of about $13 billion in debt.

Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific are each putting up about $2 billion in cash. Goldman Sachs, Lehman Brothers, Morgan Stanley and Citigroup plan to invest $3 billion from their private equity arms.

That brings the cash total to only $7 billion, $1 billion short of the $8 billion required. That's where JPMorgan Chase, Morgan Stanley and Citigroup are planning to come in with a $1 billion equity bridge.

The risk to the banks is that the value of TXU could fall sharply below the $69.25 being offered. Yesterday, TXU shareholders welcomed the deal, driving up the shares 13 percent, to $67.93.

The deal still must undergo months of scrutiny from state and federal regulators. And while the deal has won support through pledges to cut electric rates and scale back a plan to build coal-fired power plants, the private equity firms must still overcome a perception that buyout buyers are temporary owners who are not beholden to shareholders or customers.

Talk about building bridges.

The New Greenmail (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Call it greenmail for a post-Kyoto world. The private-equity firms that just agreed to buy Texas utility TXU have scored something of a PR coup by getting Environmental Defense and other climate-change activists to fall in line with their purchase plans before the deal was announced. The question is what price shareholders are paying for this act of political correctness.

In the old days, a greenmail artist like Carl Icahn would buy up a tranch of some company's stock and threaten to buy the rest unless the target paid him to go away. But 21st-century greenmail works a little differently. Judging by media accounts, the price of Environmental Defense's support was an announcement that the new owners would build only three of the 11 coal-fired power plants that TXU has had on the drawing board.

Last year, Environmental Defense had launched a "Stop TXU" campaign to oppose the new plants. But yesterday it declared "victory" and explained that its agreement had been sought by emissaries of the private-equity investors in return for mothballing the eight coal plants and an agreement to sign on to mandatory emissions caps and an overall reduction in TXU's CO_2 emissions by 2020.

TXU had painted a green bull's-eye on itself when it announced plans last year to build the 11 new plants. Never mind that the plants were to be built on the sites of existing plants, that a number of them would replace older, less-efficient plants, or that Texas is already bumping up against the limits of its ability to produce the electricity it needs for its growing population and economy. The announcement sent the environmental movement to the barricades against TXU, and may be one reason that the company's stock, after going up regularly for several years, sputtered and stalled in 2006.

That stock slide wasn't all bad for Kohlberg, Kravis Roberts, which is leading the group buying TXU for not much more than its all-time stock-price high, which it hit in the middle of last year. But then again, giving in to the pressure not to build all 11 plants may not turn out to be all bad for KKR and TXU, either.

Ercot, Texas's independent electric-grid operator, figures that peak electricity demand in the state will catch up with available capacity by 2009, if not sooner. Tight demand means higher electricity prices, which is good for TXU's profits. That squeeze will, in turn, rejuvenate calls for more capacity, which may allow TXU to dust off the plans for the new plants at a moment when the current environmental concerns weigh more lightly in the political scales than skyrocketing electricity bills. The private-equity crowd didn't get to be billionaires for nothing.

Texas's electricity market is bigger than all of South Korea's and nearly the size of the United Kingdom's -- which is to say, it's big. It also has limited interconnection to surrounding states, so its ability to import power on high-voltage lines to make up for any shortfall is limited. Texans learned this last April when a spring heatwave sent temperatures in parts of the state into the triple digits, catching the utilities flat-footed and producing rolling blackouts and brownouts around the state.

The people who run TXU understand all of this at least as well as anyone. They also know that starting this year and continuing in stages into 2009, the state's electricity-deregulation plan calls for the price cap on wholesale power to be raised to three times its 2006 level. The retail price cap expired at the end of last year.

These reductions in price controls would certainly have played a role in TXU's earlier decision to invest $10 billion in the 11 new plants, which was the point of decontrolling prices in the first place -- greater returns mean more investment, which is needed to supply a growing state's energy needs. So now TXU can hope to get the benefit of rising prices by restricting supply, and get environmental plaudits in the bargain. Only Texas consumers might suffer.

Which is not to say that TXU would be giving up nothing by not building the plants. Some of the plants that were to be replaced are gas-fired, and natural gas prices have been volatile and rising. TXU owns a bunch of coal deposits, so it had planned to build the coal-fired plants in part to get a better grip on its supply costs going forward. And given the projections for steadily rising electricity demand in Texas and the rather closed nature of its market, TXU runs the risk of ceding market share in electricity generation to rivals.

As for TXU's current shareholders, the agitation of the greens may have helped bring down TXU's share price last year, so the environmentalists probably did KKR and partners a favor. There may even be a trend in the making here -- environmental protesters bring down a stock, making a private-equity transaction look more attractive, and in return, the equity firm and its management partners buy off the greens with this or that environmental promise. We're not suggesting any such quid pro quo here, but if we were TXU's mom-and-pop investors or Texas energy consumers we'd certainly be asking some pointed questions.

Proposed Satellite Radio Merger Could Set Off Sparks At Hearing (PLTCO)

By Andrew Glass

Politico, February 27, 2007

Up in the sky 22,500 miles above Earth, separate sets of satellites beam hundreds of music, news and sports radio programs to almost 14 million U.S. subscribers in homes, offices and cars. Down on the ground in the nation's capital, a legion of lawyers and lobbyists has launched a multipronged campaign to let them merge.

The proposal calls for XM Satellite Radio Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. to combine their programming. They will try to persuade the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to sanction the union and to do it quickly. The initial skirmish will occur Wednesday on Capitol Hill. While Congress cannot block the deal, it could influence the outcome.

The key issue before the lawmakers is the same one that faces the regulators: What is the scope of the market? If it is satellite radio, as critics allege, a merger would spawn an illegal unregulated monopoly. But Mel Karmazin, Sirius' CEO, will testify that the market should also include the 223 million weekly listeners to about 10,000 AM and FM domestic radio stations, the 219 million Americans with access to the Internet and millions more who own iPods and other hand-held music players.

The projected XM-Sirius merger, announced Feb. 19, will be the first item to come before the newly created House Antitrust Task Force. House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers Jr., D-Mich., who set it up on a provisional basis, said, "We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry."

Karmazin will argue that the merger would allow automakers to mount receivers without having to choose between the two incompatible systems. Post-merger subscribers could listen to both Howard Stern (Sirius) and Oprah Winfrey (XM). They could tune into National Football League and National Basketball Association games (Sirius) and Major League Baseball games (XM), too. Karmazin will also say that dropping duplicate channels and replacing them with a wider range of niche programming would benefit consumers.

Over the last eight years, the two firms have lost a combined $7 billion. They don't see a way to profitability. In 2006, their collective losses will exceed $1.5 billion. But no matter how the congressional session goes, the would-be partners must still surmount high regulatory hurdles in attaining a government-sanctioned bailout.

Conyers plans to question Karmazin about why his company, being in such dire financial straits, signed Stern, the nation's most sexually explicit shock jock, to a five-year $500 million contract. "Bad management is no excuse for a monopoly," said Mark Cooper, director of research at the Consumer Federation of America (CFA), who will also testify.

DOJ_NMG_0137395

Opponents of the merger include the National Association of Broadcasters (NAB), which will be at the witness table, represented by its president, David Rehr. In a statement, the NAB said: "… Policymakers will have to weigh whether an industry that makes Howard Stern its poster child should be rewarded with a monopoly platform for offensive programming. We're hopeful that this anti-consumer proposal will be rejected."

But Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons want to leverage the NAB's hostility to deflate the monopoly charges. Earlier, the FCC allowed each of them, against NAB opposition, to offer real-time traffic and weather reports in top urban markets.

Not all critics play in the same big league as the NAB and the CFA. Law school student subscribers, calling themselves the Consumer Coalition for Competition in Satellite Radio (C3SR), will resist the merger as well. Chris Reale, a founder of C3SR, said, "A monopoly satellite radio provider would be able to raise prices and cut programming to a growing number of consumers that have come to rely on satellite radio for news and entertainment."

To counter the negative onslaught, XM and Sirius have hired a slew of top-of-the-line investment bankers, law firms and lobbyists.

J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. is handling the financial side for XM and Morgan Stanley for Sirius. Three law firms -- Skadden Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP, Jones Day and Latham & Watkins LLP -- are acting as legal counsel for XM. Sirius will get by with two: Simpson Thacher & Bartlett LLP and Wiley Rein LLP.

Their task is to persuade both Justice Department trustbusters, led by Thomas Barnett, and a fractured five-member FCC that a combined system will serve the public interest. The FCC would have to overturn its decade-old edict that they should remain separate. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has said, "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

On the lobbying front, Sirius, based in New York, works with 84-year-old former Sen. Paul Laxalt, R-Nev., and his associate Tom Loranger. This year, in keeping with the Democratic takeover of Congress, it also hired Steve Ricchetti, a former deputy chief of staff to President Bill Clinton.

XM, based within walking distance of Capitol Hill, has employed a larger and somewhat rotating gallery of lobbyists. Last year, records show, XM spent $403,705 in lobbying fees, allocated among nine firms.

One of them was Mehlman Vogel Castagnetti Inc., which along with a predecessor firm, Mehlman Capitol Strategies, earned $80,000 for its efforts. "Politics are partisan, policy is bipartisan," said Alex Vogel, a co-founder of the firm and chief of staff to former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. Vogel's partners are Bruce Mehlman, whose brother Ken served until January as chairman of the Republican National Committee, and David Castagnetti, formerly chief of staff to Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont.

XM also employs Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates, an arm of Hill & Knowlton. Paddy Link serves as the chief XM account executive. She was the first woman to head the staff of the U.S. Senate Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation, where she helped draft the breakthrough Telecommunications Act of 1996. Before going over to the committee, Link served as chief of staff to former Sen. Larry Pressler, R-S.D.

XM's Losses Narrowed In 4th Quarter (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

For Year, Though, Satellite Radio Firm Fell Deeper in Red

Continued growth in subscribers helped XM Satellite Radio Holdings slightly reduce its losses in the last quarter of 2006 from the fourth quarter of 2005, the company said yesterday.

XM, which broadcasts from the District, hopes to merge with rival Sirius Satellite Radio, which is based in New York. Both companies will continue to operate separately as they await regulatory approval from the Federal Communications Commission and Department of Justice, which is expected to take several months.

XM's last-quarter revenue increased by 45 percent, to $257.1 million from $177.1 million in the fourth quarter of 2005. The company narrowed its loss to $263.2 million (90 cents a share) from $270.5 million ($1.22).

XM finished the year with 7.6 million subscribers, a 29 percent increase over the year before, that was, however, lower than the projections the company made in early 2006. Executives said they hoped to have at least 9 million subscribers, who typically pay $12.95 a month, by the end of this year.

XM reduced its quarterly marketing expenses by more than 25 percent, spending $142 million compared with $196 million, company executives said in a conference call with analysts and reporters. The cost of gaining each new subscriber fell from $141 to $128.

In the last quarter of 2006, XM took a charge of $57.6 million to reflect the reduced value of its stake in a Canadian satellite radio affiliate.

For all of 2006, XM lost $732 million, or $2.70 per share. In 2005, it lost $675 million. XM and Sirius have paid heavily to recruit such stars as Howard Stern, Oprah Winfrey and Martha Stewart. They contend they need to merge to remain competitive with over-the-air, commercial radio, iPods and other audio services, but some consumer groups oppose monopoly ownership of satellite radio.

XM Cuts Its Loss To $263m For Quarter (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

XM Satellite Radio yesterday reported a narrower fourth-quarter loss as it prepared for Congressional hearings concerning its proposed merger with rival Sirius.

For the quarter, XM lost $263.1m, or 90 cents per share, compared with $270.4m, or $1.22, during the same period a year ago. The company, which has never made a profit, benefited from a reduction in costs, and from a jump in subscriptions that helped push revenues up 45 per cent to $257m.

The results came a week after XM announced an $11.4bn merger with Sirius. Analysts and investors have projected $5bn in cost savings that would push the companies toward profitability.

However, the biggest obstacle to the deal will be allaying antitrust concerns at the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission. At a Congressional hearing tomorrow, the companies are expected to argue that they are part of an expanding market for portable audio that includes iPods, mobile phones and other devices.

"We're working to close the deal and we're confident it's going to go through," Hugh Panero, XM's chief executive, said yesterday.

XM suffered last year because of product delays and increased competition from Sirius, which spent heavily to lure top talent such as Howard Stern, the radio shock jock. It finished the year with 7.6m subscribers - up 1.6m over the previous year but shy of the 9m it had forecast.

One bright spot was that XM managed to lower its average cost of acquiring new subscribers in 2006 - to $126 from $141 the previous year.

Editorial: A Monopoly -- Not (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 27, 2007

TEN YEARS AGO, federal regulators sold a pair of satellite radio licenses -- and sternly warned that a competition-chilling merger wouldn't be tolerated.

How quaint that worry seems now. The two operators -- XM and Sirius -- are losing billions of dollars and want to huddle together to stop the bleeding. Meanwhile, HD radio, iPods, Internet broadcasts and other trends have rushed past regulators and redrawn the landscape. There are 90 million people wearing dangling iPod ear-buds, 65 million who listen to free Internet radio and about 14 million satellite-radio subscribers.

It's hard to see a stifling monopoly in the making when the two satellite networks are gasping for air. Consumers, who need defending when choices narrow dramatically, don't need any help on this shift.

In Washington, the Justice Department is judged likely to bless the deal after surveying the larger landscape of audio choices. It's a sensible reading of broadcast reality.

It's the Federal Communications Commission, which laid down the no-merger threat a decade ago, that may stop the deal. The panel shouldn't, even if it risks going back on its guiding words, issued at the dawn of the Internet age.

A merged satellite market will create a semblance of a monopoly, but only over one slender source of information. If the merged network raises prices or cuts options, unhappy subscribers can turn elsewhere for their entertainment fix.

This infant industry was touted as a major breakthrough way back when. How far away that era seems now when cheaper, handier and more varied choices now abound.

CME, CBOT Shareholders To Vote On $8B Deal On April 4 (AP)

By Jesse Thomas

AP, February 27, 2007

CHICAGO - Shareholders of Chicago Mercantile Exchange Holdings Inc. and CBOT Holdings Inc., the two largest U.S. derivatives exchanges, will vote on CME's proposed $8 billion acquisition of CBOT on April 4.

DOJ_NMG_0137397

In a filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission, CME said Monday its meeting on the deal will be held at the W Chicago City Center, while CBOT's Class A shareholders will meet at Union League Club of Chicago.

In addition, a special meeting for Series B-1 and Series B-2 members of CBOT will be held at the Union League Club before the Class A shareholder meeting to approve an amended and restated certificate of incorporation to become effective upon the deal, the filing said.

The SEC filing states CME and CBOT "enthusiastically support" the combination, which would create the world's largest derivatives exchange. Executives from both exchanges have repeatedly stated they expect the deal, originally announced on Oct. 17, to close midyear.

The deal is still awaiting regulatory approval from the U.S. Department of Justice and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Department of Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona said the investigation is ongoing, but did not say when a decision might be made.

The proposed acquisition has come under fire in recent weeks. The Futures Industry Association, a trade organization that is not required to approve the deal, said that the new company, to be called CME Group Inc., a Chicago Board of Trade company, could wield unfair pricing power, which could "raise even higher the barriers to entry for new competitors."

The association said the deal also would substantially lessen competition among U.S. futures exchanges.

CME officials have said that the acquisition will increase competition in the global marketplace. CME and CBOT also expect to generate annual cost savings of at least $125 million as a result of the deal, while saving exchange users about $70 million on an annual basis.

On the New York Stock Exchange, CME shares closed down $8.26, or 1.5 percent, at $536.59. CBOT shares closed down $2.00, or 1.2 percent, at $160.50.

Regulators OK GE Purchase Of Abbott Unit (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve $8.1B General Electric Purchase of Abbott Labs Division

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators on Monday approved General Electric Co.'s $8.13 billion purchase of Abbott Laboratories' diagnostics business.

The Federal Trade Commission said it has approved the transaction without requiring any changes.

General Electric will acquire Abbott's in vitro diagnostics and point-of-care diagnostics businesses, the companies said when they first announced the transaction in January. The in vitro diagnostic division tests blood and urine samples to diagnose diseases and other conditions.

Abbott expects to receive $6 billion in after-tax cash from the transaction, the company said last month. Abbott plans to use the money to pay down debt and supplement share repurchases.

The two companies said in January that they expected the transaction to close in the first half of 2007.

Shares of GE rose 9 cents to $35.19 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Abbott increased 84 cents to $54.43, also on the NYSE.

Caremark Rx Downgraded Amid Bidding War (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, February 27, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- Raymond James downgraded Monday its rating on Caremark Rx Inc. shares on the belief there will be no further bidders for the company beyond fellow pharmacy-benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. on the one hand, and retail pharmacy-chain operator CVS Corp. on the other.

"Based on our analysis, we believe a [per-share purchase] price in the mid-$60s begins to become dilutive from CVS' perspective," Raymond James analyst Michael Baker wrote in a research note. He cut his rating on Caremark to market perform from outperform.

"We do not expect CVS to push the price beyond this point; therefore, upside is modest from current levels, in our opinion."

Caremark agreed last November to a so-called merger of equals with CVS under which Caremark stockholders would receive 1.67 shares of the combined company for each share they own.

The following month, however, Express Scripts launched a hostile cash-and-stock counterbid for Caremark that at the time carried a 15% premium to the CVS deal. Terms call for Express Scripts to pay $29.25 in cash and 0.426 share of stock for each outstanding Caremark share.

CVS subsequently sweetened its bid with a $2-a-share special dividend, which it then tripled to $6 a share.

Shares of Caremark closed Monday's session higher by 17 cents at $63.24. Express Scripts shares added 19 cents to finish at $78.82, while shares of CVS slipped 10 cents to end at $32.38.

DOJ_NMG_0137398

Twists and turns

A judge in Delaware on Friday delayed a shareholder vote on the proposed Caremark-CVS merger for the second time, until at least 20 days after Caremark shareholders are provided with additional information about the deal. Caremark subsequently mailed supplemental disclosures containing the information in question to its shareholders and scheduled the vote for March 16. See full story.

The Caremark shareholder vote, analyst Baker noted, will take place after the March 8 deadline for the Federal Trade Commission to make a second information request concerning the Express Scripts bid.

Antitrust questions have been among the top concerns raised in reference to a Caremark-Express Scripts deal. Caremark's the largest PBM in the country on a market-capitalization basis, ahead of Medco Health Solutions Inc. and Express Scripts.

With an eye to avoiding the need for a second request from the FTC, Express Scripts at the end of January withdrew and then submitted again its Caremark bid antitrust filing, resulting in the March 8 deadline. See full story.

The key, said Raymond James' Baker, will be whether the FTC takes a broad view of the market or attempts to redefine it more narrowly.

From a broad market perspective, a combined Caremark-Express Scripts would have roughly a 29% market share, and it would "likely be of little concern" Baker said. He also estimated Medco's share of the market at 19%, followed by WellPoint Inc. at 11%.

"A more narrow definition of the large-employer market (Fortune 100) could be more problematic and require Express Scripts to provide additional information under a second request," Baker said. Carolyn Pritchard is a reporter for MarketWatch in San Francisco.

Linux Camp Rages Over Novell Pact (BOS)

By Hiawatha Bray, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 27, 2007

Microsoft accord could leave other open-source software companies more vulnerable to patent suits

Last year's surprise partnership between software titan Microsoft Corp. and leading Linux distributor Novell Inc. was supposed to be a kind of peace treaty. Instead, it's brought the open-source software community to the brink of civil war, over a provision that could help Microsoft sue other open-source software companies for patent violations.

As part of the deal, Novell agreed to compensate Microsoft for features in Linux that Microsoft claims to have patented. Critics say Novell has betrayed other Linux vendors and made it easier for Microsoft to threaten Linux companies with patent infringement suits.

"Anybody who has not signed a deal now . . . is somehow under a cloud," said Peter Brown, executive director of the Free Software Foundation, a group that oversees the creation of most Linux code. "When will Microsoft act against them?"

But for renowned open-source programmer and former Novell employee Jeremy Allison, the deal came at too high a price. Allison helped develop Samba, a popular program that lets Linux computers interact with machines running Windows. In December, Allison quit . "I left Novell over the deal because I felt it was not consistent with the responsibilities of an open-source company or an open-source programmer," Allison said.

The deal with Microsoft amounts to a $308 million lifeline for Waltham-based Novell, a company brought to the brink of ruin thanks to years of fierce rivalry with Microsoft. Originally based in Utah, Novell invented the first system to link desktop computers into networks. It grew into the world's third-largest software company, at one time employing 10,000 workers.

But Novell's business was gutted when Microsoft added networking capability to its Windows operating system. Novell then challenged Microsoft with an alternative operating system and office software suite. Both ventures were costly failures. Today, Novell has just 4,800 employees, mostly in Utah. Only about 200 are based in the Boston area. Still Novell is one of the biggest technology companies based in Massachusetts.

Novell now hopes to become the leading distributor of Linux software to businesses -- a position held by Red Hat Inc. of Raleigh, N.C. Red Hat officials say they're unworried by the Novell-Microsoft deal. At a technology conference earlier this month, Red Hat's chief financial officer, Charlie Peters, said he sees no sign that an alliance between Novell and Microsoft is hurting Red Hat's sales. "Just in the last week or two you've seen several good customer wins from us," Peters said. "This clearly is not an issue."

Open-source supporters favor some features of the deal. Microsoft paid $240 million for Novell Linux licenses, which it will distribute to customers who want to use both Windows and Linux in their data centers. The two companies also will cooperate on ways to make Linux work better with Windows . After all, even companies that use Linux for high-end server applications still use Windows on most of their desktop machines. Microsoft will also pay $108 million to Novell for permission to use Novell patents in Microsoft's products.

But it's Novell's $40 million patent payment to Microsoft that infuriates open-source specialists. That's because Novell's SUSE Linux, like all versions of Linux, is made up of hundreds of pieces of software produced by the GNU Project, an open-source development group led by the Free Software Foundation in Cambridge. Linux companies like Novell and Red Hat compete by selling support for their Linux products. Meanwhile, the Free Software Foundation insists that no version of Linux violates patents held by Microsoft or anybody else.

Brown, the foundation's executive director, said that those who buy Novell's version of Linux will be shielded from Microsoft patent litigation. But people who buy from other Linux companies are still exposed to patent lawsuits, even though all versions of Linux are nearly identical.

Brown said that Microsoft singled out Novell because the company's sales and profits are weak. . Novell revenue fell from $1.2 billion in fiscal 2005 to $967 million in 2006. The company posted a $376.7 million profit in 2005, but that was mainly due to a $536 million payout from Microsoft to settle an antitrust dispute between the two longtime enemies. Last year, Novell's net income dropped to $32 million.

The company's financial woes made it a prime target for Microsoft, said Brown. He thinks Novell entered into negotiation in good faith, but learned too late about Microsoft's patent tactics. "They wave a big check under their noses, they get Novell desperate for the money, and then they spring the patent provision on them."

Novell says the critics are wrong. Susan Heystee, the company's vice president of global strategic partnerships, said Novell does not believe that Linux contains any Microsoft-patented code. "There is definitely no statement that we're making that there are any patents being infringed," she said. "We do not acknowledge that there is any issue there."

But within days of signing the deal with Novell, Microsoft chief executive Steve Ballmer told guests at a software industry conference that Linux contains Microsoft intellectual property. "In a sense you could say that anybody who has got Linux in their data center has an undisclosed balance-sheet liability," he said, suggesting that Microsoft might demand compensation from Linux users not covered by the Novell agreement. Microsoft agrees that Novell did not concede any patent violations in Linux, saying that the companies have "agreed to disagree" on the issue.

Leaders of the open-source movement are at work on a legal strategy that could let Novell retain the benefits of the deal, while preventing Microsoft from using it to attack other open-source firms. They're drafting a new version of the General Public License or GPL, the Free Software Foundation's legal rulebook, which governs how Linux and other open-source code can be used.

Under the new license, called GPL3, if a company waives its patent rights over GPL software distributed by one company, that waiver will apply to all other companies distributing the software. If the provision had been in place when Novell and Microsoft struck their deal, the patent protection won by Novell would have applied as well to Red Hat, Ubuntu, and other Linux versions. Microsoft would have forfeited its patent infringement claims against all Linux distributors.

The foundation hopes to have the new license completed within a couple of weeks. It can then issue future versions of Linux code under the license. As they're upgraded over time, the hundreds of programs that make up Novell's Linux will be covered by the new license.

Brown said GPL3 would ensure that no other Linux company will be able to make a separate peace with Microsoft. "We want to attempt to stop these type of deals being struck," he said.

Feds OK Coke's Purchase Of Fuze Beverage (AJC)

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 27, 2007

Washington — Federal antitrust regulators have approved Coca-Cola's purchase of juice and tea maker Fuze Beverage, according to a notice issued by the Federal Trade Commission Monday.

The FTC cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal.

Atlanta-based Coca-Cola will buy all Fuze Beverage brands, including the Vitalize, Refresh, Tea and Slenderize lines. The company said Feb. 1 that it expects to close the transaction this year.

Shares of Coke rose 42 cents to $47.68 in early trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Insurers Prepare A Battle Strategy To Protect A Key Exemption (column) (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The insurance industry is one of Washington's fiercest and best-funded lobbies, so it rarely gets surprised. But last week several industry representatives privately acknowledged amazement that their most important federal benefit -- an antitrust exemption -- is in danger.

DOJ_NMG_0137400

Angry with how insurers have been treating Hurricane Katrina victims and others, the chairman and the ranking Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), as well as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), have joined forces to propose a repeal of the 62-year-old exemption, known as the McCarran-Ferguson Act.

"This is the big one," said Carl Parks, senior vice president of the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies and a leader in the effort to save the exemption. "We are upset and disappointed."

The insurers say they are doing nothing wrong. Yet lawmakers are outraged on behalf of constituents who believe they have not been properly compensated for their property losses.

Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), who lost his house during Katrina and is a co-sponsor of the legislation, has said that even "the nightmares of FEMA" did not prepare his constituents for their "abandonment by insurance companies."

McCarran-Ferguson provides insurers with an exemption from federal antitrust laws so that thousands of companies can exchange and aggregate data on accidents and injuries. They use that information to formulate the rates they charge their customers.

The exemption can operate only if states regulate the insurers, and lately a growing number of lawmakers have complained that some states have failed to do so. Hence the legislation -- and its companion bill in the House -- which would repeal the exemption and impose regulation by the consumer-focused Federal Trade Commission.

Large insurers that have enough data to set rates themselves have been proposing a modified repeal of McCarrin-Ferguson for years, but only if companies can opt to replace state regulation with a more compliant captive federal regulator. The new legislation, however, would add stiff federal regulation on top of the state regimen.

"The concern is that the industry could end up with double regulation," said Stanton D. Anderson of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Insurers are beginning to muster their forces for an epic battle. Some of the bigger firms are hoping that the friendly-federal-regulator option will emerge somehow. But Parks and others who represent smaller insurers are not taking any chances.

The National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies has already created a "war room" that is targeting the districts and states of lawmakers who might be sympathetic or persuadable. It is hunting for insurers with employees in those places whom they can train to lobby their elected representatives. A broad coalition of insurance lobbies is also in the offing.

Parks, 60, knows this ground well. He has worked in public affairs for the insurance industry on and off since 1969, first for Allstate and later for the Property Casualty Insurers Association of America. In between, he helped the Credit Union National Association stage a huge grass-roots lobbying effort that persuaded Congress to pass a bill overturning a Supreme Court decision that would have hamstrung credit unions.

Now he has an even bigger fight. "This is an issue that we have to win outside the Beltway," Parks said. "We think we will win when we communicate our message."Lobbying Winner -- and Loser

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the affiliated U.S. Chamber Institute for Legal Reform have broken their own record for expenditures on lobbying. Their combined total skyrocketed to $49.2 million for the second half of 2006, more than double the $23.5 million they reported for the first six months of the year. The latest six-month period shattered their earlier record of $30.1 million, set during 2004's first half, PoliticalMoneyLine said.

The institute, which alone spent $17.8 million in the second half of 2006, does all manner of lobbying and research to fight trial lawyers. The rest of the Chamber buys issue advertising and houses a stable of lobbyists and policy analysts.

By contrast, the National Association of Manufacturers -- the Chamber's onetime rival -- spent just $3.6 million in the second half of 2006, down dramatically from $9.6 million in the year's first six months. NAM said the 63 percent decline resulted from its withdrawal from lobbying on the asbestos bill that it wanted but failed to get.

NAM was outpaced in lobbying expenditures in last year's second half by a wide range of groups and individual companies. Twenty of these spent more than $5 million during the period.Thank You, Mr. Chairman

If it's good to be a Democrat on K Street these days, it's even better to be a Democrat who once worked for a current chairman of a congressional tax-writing committee. That's clearly where the money is.

Timothy E. Punke, a former trade aide to Chairman Max Baucus (D-Mont.) of the Senate Finance Committee, was named a partner of Monument Policy Group, a lobbying firm. His new clients include heavyweights such as Microsoft and the Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America.

Former Baucus chief of staff Jeffrey A. Forbes of Cauthen Forbes & Williams also has a slew of new clients. They include Merck, Genentech, Ford and Intuit.

William A. Signer, a former staffer to Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) of the House Ways and Means Committee, has a new job -- managing director of health-care and tax practices at Carmen Group. "His experience in understanding Chairman Rangel's goals and motivations are invaluable to clients," said David M. Carmen, president of the firm. Signer's ties to Rangel, Carmen added, were "definitely a factor" in his hiring.A Republican Purge on K?

But last month, the MPAA named Seth Oster, a Democrat, as executive vice president for communications, in effect taking part of Feehery's portfolio. My colleague at washingtonpost.com, Mary Ann Akers, reports that lobbyists worry that the move might presage a citywide purge of Republicans. But Feehery professes no bitterness. "It was a good time for me to start my own business," he said. "It gives me a greater range to do things I want to do." The MPAA will be one of his first clients, he added.

EU Takeover Law In Tatters (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

The European Union's decades-long struggle to abolish "poison pills" and other barriers to hostile takeovers has ended in failure, the European Commission will conclude on Tuesday.

The commission will also warn it could overhaul the Union's ineffective takeover law earlier than planned.

"A large number of member states have shown strong reluctance to lift takeover barriers," the Commission says in a report on the effects of the EU takeover directive. The report finds the vast majority of member states have exploited the law's many loopholes to ensure that takeover defences can be used as extensively as before.

"The number of member states implementing the directive in a seemingly protectionist way is unexpectedly large," the report says.

The report's publication comes amid rising concern about protectionism in several European countries, and follows recent controversies over the growing power of hedge funds, private equity groups and other activist investors.

The report's downbeat conclusions also suggest that most EU governments are unconvinced by the Commission's assertion that takeovers offer "benefits for companies, investors and ultimately the European economy as a whole".

The EU takeover directive – which was finally adopted in 2004 after more than 14 years of debate – was originally designed to make it harder for companies facing a takeover bid to use poison pill defences, such as issuing new shares or entering into complex joint ventures. It would also have curbed the use of shares with multiple voting rights – another method of keeping suitors at bay.

But strong resistance from countries such as Germany and Sweden and a last-minute change of heart by the European Parliament meant the proposal was watered down.

Crucially, member states were allowed to opt out of a key provision that forces companies to seek shareholder approval for poison pill defences.

Another vital clause – known as the breakthrough rule – to ensure that existing defences become ineffective during the takeover period was also made optional.

The Commission report, a copy of which has been obtained by the FT, finds that "the vast majority of member states have not imposed (or are unlikely to impose) the breakthrough rule". Only Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania have opted into the clause, which means that less than 1 per cent of listed companies in the EU will apply the rule on a mandatory basis.

Charlie McCreevy, the EU internal market commissioner, has repeatedly voiced his frustration over the final version of the takeover directive.

The report suggests that he may want to return to the issue earlier than planned.

The directive is scheduled to be revised as late as 2011, but the report says that "in the light of the evaluation" this overhaul may have to be bought forward.

Western States Agree To Cut Greenhouse Gases (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

Washington Post, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137402

Five Western governors agreed yesterday on a plan to cut their states' emissions of gases linked to global warming and to establish a regional carbon-trading system, though they stopped short of saying how drastically they will seek to reduce greenhouse gases.

The governors -- including Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger of California and Democrats from Arizona, Oregon, New Mexico and Washington -- said that within six months they will set a regional target for lower emissions. A year after that, they pledged, they will devise a regional cap-and-trade system allowing polluters to buy and sell greenhouse gas pollution credits.

"In the absence of meaningful federal action, it is up to the states to take action to address climate change and reduce greenhouse gas emissions in the country," said Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano. "Western states are being particularly hard hit by the effects of climate change."

The move won immediate plaudits from environmentalists. Jeremiah Baumann, an environmental advocate at the Oregon State Public Interest Research Group, said, "This regional global-warming solution will benefit the environment on a global scale."

It remained unclear how much the five states will cut their carbon dioxide emissions and how soon they will do it. Several states on the East and West coasts have adopted reduction targets in recent years, but in the immediate term all fall short of the targets that the European Union, Canada and Japan are seeking to meet by 2012 under the international treaty known as the Kyoto Protocol.

California passed legislation late last year mandating a 25 percent cut below current levels of greenhouse gases, which would bring its emissions down to 1990 levels. The four other Western governors have all established, through executive orders, reduction goals that are slightly more modest than California's, and state officials predicted the final pact is likely to equal the sum of all the states' individual targets.

Dan Skopec, undersecretary for California's Environmental Protection Agency, said the significance of the agreement is that companies in the five states will be able to trade emissions.

"It's not as important that the different states may have a different emissions reduction goal. The important thing is that an emission reduction in Arizona means the same thing as an emission reduction in California or Oregon," Skopec said.

The states' agreement came as scientists and interest groups continued to debate the best way to curb the country's global-warming pollution. In a presentation at the National Press Club yesterday, James E. Hansen, the outspoken climate scientist who directs NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies, said the United States should stop building coal-fired power plants and older polluting utilities must "be bulldozed" before mid-century.

Also yesterday, the AFL-CIO endorsed the idea of a more modest cap-and-trade emissions-reduction plan that "should initially seek to gradually slow the growth in greenhouse gas emissions" but also contain a "safety valve" cost cap to protect the economy."

Carbon Curbs Gain Backers (WSJ)

By John J. Fialka

Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Energy Groups Shift Stance, Possibly Giving Campaign New Fuel

WASHINGTON -- Seeking to shape legislation before Congress, three major energy trade associations have shifted their stances and decided to back mandatory federal curbs on carbon dioxide and other man-made emissions that could accelerate climate change.

Joined by the AFL-CIO, the groups say they now plan to use their lobbying clout to stake out positions that favor modest, economy-wide regulations, in hopes of minimizing anticipated energy-price increases and pre-empting state efforts that could result in a patchwork of differing state and regional regulations.

The shift by the groups, which include the Edison Electric Institute and the American Gas Association, underscores their belief that Congress is in a mood to pass some form of mandatory emissions controls, perhaps before the next election in 2008. "We want to be at the table" during the debate, said Paul Wilkinson, a vice president of the American Gas Association, which represents 200 utilities that distribute natural gas throughout the U.S.

Taken with environmental concessions made in the proposed $45 billion purchase of electric utility TXU Corp. by seven buyout firms, as well as the Oscar-related attention over former Vice President Al Gore's documentary on global warming on Sunday, the efforts could provide new momentum to the campaign to reduce the emissions believed by many scientists to cause global warning.

Separately yesterday, the governors of California, Oregon, New Mexico, Arizona and Washington state jointly announced plans to reduce "greenhouse gases" through a "cap-and-trade" program that would allocate emissions credits to companies, which could use or trade them. New England states and New York have adopted a similar, regional approach.

The American Gas Association had previously opposed federal action to control climate-change emissions as "unwarranted." Mr. Wilkinson said the association's board reversed itself last week because of growing signs that Congress could pass mandatory controls. While debates could go on for years in Congress, he said, the basic structure of the bill could be determined soon.

The largest trade group, and the one likely to be hardest hit by any energy-price increases under national regulations, is the Edison Electric Institute, whose members generate 60% of electricity in the U.S. The institute's board, including 50 chief executive officers of utilities, last month approved a set of principles supporting "federal action" to reduce greenhouse-gas emissions.

Institute chairman James E. Rogers described the lengthy, closed meeting as "crossing a bridge" for members of the group, which previously supported only voluntary reductions. He added that his group wants a "safety valve" that would require the government to intervene as needed to keep the price of credits stable and low.

The Electric Power Supply Association, which represents 22 companies that sell electricity on a wholesale basis, also recently endorsed mandatory federal measures. Association president John E. Shelk said members want some certainty over what kinds of power plants they should invest in. "This is what's really driving the do-it-now argument," he said.

The AFL-CIO yesterday joined the drive by issuing its own plan calling for mandatory controls that would "gradually slow the growth" of greenhouse-gas emissions. The plan seeks implementation of a cost cap to prevent sudden increases in energy prices that could hit businesses. Robert Baugh, who heads a task force developing the labor group's energy strategy, said the critical issue is jobs. "We don't want to close down businesses here and put them offshore," he said.

At least five different versions of a federal cap-and-trade system to reduce emissions have been introduced on Capitol Hill. All would require companies that produce carbon-based fuels or emissions to have government-allocated permits for each ton of carbon in the fuel they handle. Regulators would gradually reduce the caps, but companies could trade their credits. Those that modernize their equipment to reduce emissions to below the federal caps could sell their extra quotas. Companies that need more credits could buy them to get under the declining caps, or pay a penalty.

All five bills target electricity producers, because half of the nation's electricity is generated by coal-fired plants. Coal has the highest carbon content among all fuels.

Mr. Rogers of the Edison Electric Institute said that under a mandatory cap system, his industry would need more federal assistance to develop new emission controls, particularly ways to separate CO2 emissions and inject them into the ground. If the technology, which remains unproven on a commercial scale, fails, power producers would have more emissions than they had planned and would need to buy more emissions credits. In that case, the government should intervene by freezing the market price for carbon credits, which would otherwise rise, he said. Eventually, most costs would be passed on to consumers.

While none of these groups backs a particular bill, legislation being prepared by Sens. Jeff Bingaman (D., N.M.) and Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) features the safety valve to keep emissions-credit prices low and a more moderate approach towards emissions reductions. "These groups are saying it's time to go," said Jason Grumet, staff director for the bipartisan National Commission on Energy Policy, which helped draft portions of the Bingaman bill.

Another bill sponsored by Sens. John McCain (R., Ariz.) and Joseph I. Lieberman (I., Conn.), which takes a more aggressive approach and doesn't have a safety valve, is favored by environmental groups. Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense, called safety-valve proposals a form of government "price controls" that would discourage innovation.

Estimates of the cost the various bills would impose on the nation's economy haven't been fully worked out. One environmental group, Resources for the Future, estimates that the Bingaman measure would increase electricity prices by 3.5% while the more-aggressive McCain bill could hike prices by as much as 35%.

Wall Street Adds Climate Change To Bottom Line (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

The environmentally tinged takeover of TXU Corp. illustrates global warming's increased financial relevance.

NEW YORK

Wall Street now views the color green as something other than money.

In the latest sign that global climate change is becoming a major factor for investors, potentially the largest private takeover in the nation's history has environmentalists' fingerprints all over it.

A consortium of private investors announced Monday they would pay almost $45 billion to acquire TXU Corp., which generates electricity in the state of Texas. What makes the deal more than just another gigantic financial transaction is that the buyers of the company consulted with environmental groups and agreed to sharply scale back plans to build new coal-fired power plants.

DOJ_NMG_0137404

"This is a real breakthrough, an indication investors are paying attention to the real financial risk associated with climate change," says Dan Bakal, director of electric power programs at Ceres, a Boston-based environmental group that advises investors controlling $3.7 trillion in assets. "It means Wall Street is really beginning to pay attention."

Wall Street analysts believe the deal could mean that future takeovers will start to factor in the cost of corporate carbon emissions.

This could affect mergers and acquisitions in a broad range of industries, including manufacturing companies, the auto industry, mining companies, and other utilities.

"What it shows is the environment has a much greater presence than in the past and the issue of global warming is under increased scrutiny," says Sam Stovall, chief investment strategist at Standard & Poor's in New York. "These are additional factors that must be addressed in future mergers."

In fact, there are some signs Wall Street is trying to get up to speed as quickly as possible. For the past three years, the World Resources Institute (WRI), an environmental think tank in Washington, D.C., has been working with investment banks and securities firms such as Merrill Lynch, Citigroup, and Goldman Sachs to teach them how to establish their own carbon "footprint" and analyze other companies' emissions.

Analysts eye carbon 'footprint'

By calculating the footprint – the amount of greenhouse gases a company pumps into the atmosphere – analysts can begin to forecast the potential risks of climate-change lawsuits and future costs of any greenhouse-gas regulations.

"It's been a slow start, but we have been pleased to see financial institutions begin to grapple with those systems," says Jennifer Layke, deputy director of climate and energy for WRI. "But this is the first time we have seen a set of investors reach out to the environmental community around the terms of a new investment deal."

Last year, the New York Stock Exchange began to educate CEOs about the issue. It sponsored a lunch with former Vice President Al Gore, who gave a slide-show version of his Oscar-winning documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth."

Investors call for carbon accounting

This year there will be a record number of shareholder resolutions asking companies about their carbon footprint.

Normally, shareholder propositions don't receive much traction in the corporate world.

But, the proposals have been receiving a significant amount of institutional support from such large shareholders as Calpers, the California public-employee pension fund. And there is increasing concern that corporate boards may have a liability if they don't start to plan for future limits on carbon emissions.

Pressure was already building on TXU to scale back its proposal to build 11 coal-fired power plants. Over the weekend, Ceres issued a report that looked at the potential carbon taxes the utility would face, assuming that Congress or the states begin to enact such charges.

"Our report made some reasonable assumptions, including that none of the costs would be grandfathered in," says Mr. Bakal. "That means 100 percent of the carbon dioxide must face a carbon tax, which we estimate could be as much as $780 million per year, perhaps for 15 years."

At the same time, the Ceres report called into question some of the revenue and cost assumptions that TXU had made to justify the new plants.

"We think they had overestimated the amount of growth and underestimated the amount of the coming carbon controls and the cost of complying with the existing Clean Air Act," says David Gardiner, one of the authors of the report and a sustainability consultant in Arlington, Va.

TXU buyers moved to ease opposition

Some of these issues resonated with the group of TXU buyers, which includes the Texas Pacific Group, Goldman Sachs, and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. Texas Pacific and KKR are private equity groups that amass money from pension funds and wealthy individuals and buy companies.

Monday, in Dallas, the buyers' group said they would drop eight of the 11 new coal-fired power plants if their deal succeeds. They also said they would roll back electricity rates by 10 percent. And, they indicated they would work towards meeting any national emissions caps in the future.

"It's a sign people are paying attention," says Rodney Taylor, managing director of the environmental-services group at Aon, a large Chicago-based insurance broker. "From a financial standpoint, it also says something about the perception of where energy costs are going. KKR is kind of a medium-term investor, so they must be looking at energy costs going up sharply over the next three to five years."

Global Warming A Hot Spot For Investors (USAT)

By Adam Shell And Matt Krantz

DOJ_NMG_0137405

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Droughts. Hurricanes. Rising temperatures. Melting glaciers. In a world abuzz with talk about global warming, climate change is elbowing aside tech and biotech as the major investment theme of the future.

Wall Street's savviest analysts are devising ways to cash in on crazy weather, just as they did in response to the profound changes brought on by the dawn of the digital age, globalization and the graying of America.

Discussions about what interest rates mean for stocks are giving way to chatter about what a 1-degree rise each year in temperature would do to profits at businesses ranging from carmakers to solar companies.

Global warming has emerged as a major market-moving force that represents a generational shift likely to influence how people invest for decades. The world's biggest financial services firms are investing massive amounts of time and brainpower trying to pinpoint what stocks and sectors will benefit — and be hurt — by changes in Earth's weather patterns.

"We are approaching a tipping point when it comes to climate change," says Edward Kerschner, a strategist at Citigroup.

Kerschner should know. He spent nine months researching "Climatic Consequences," a 120-page report that zeroes in on 74 companies in 18 countries well-positioned to profit from changing weather patterns. "The interest in this report is unprecedented," says Kerschner. He says presentations to clients are booked through the fall.

Similarly, UBS released a 97-page tome, "Climate Change: Beyond Whether." And Lehman Bros., with input from analysts in London and Tokyo, this month published a 143-page paper, "The Business of Climate Change." The well-being of the planet, the report concludes, has gone from a "fringe concern" of scientists and activists to a "central topic" for CEOs and investors.

"Global warming is likely to prove (to be) one of those tectonic forces that — like globalization or the aging of populations — gradually but powerfully changes the economic landscape," writes John Llewellyn, senior economic policy adviser at Lehman.

And California's Calpers, the nation's largest public pension plan and considered a trendsetter among giant money managers, is committing $800 million to invest in clean technology in emerging markets of Eastern Europe, Latin America and Asia.

Earlier this month, the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) concluded that it was more than 90% likely that human activity is causing global warming. Former vice president Al Gore came to a similar conclusion in his film, An Inconvenient Truth, which Sunday won the Academy Award for best documentary feature.

The IPCC says temperatures around the globe could rise 2 to 12 degrees Fahrenheit by 2100. Likely result: more intense heat waves, more powerful tropical storms and a rise in sea levels that could swamp low-lying cities.

From an investors' standpoint, it doesn't matter if people believe global warming is real or if greenhouse gases are to blame, Kerschner says. What does matter is if consumers, regulators, governments and corporations "react to the perceived threat." That is what creates investment opportunities — and risks, he says.

Agriculture.

Ethanol, which is made mainly from corn, has been the talk of the farm since President Bush pushed for greater ethanol use in his January State of the Union address.

The biggest ethanol producers, Archer Daniels Midland, Aventine Renewable Energy, Pacific Ethanol and VeraSun, seem obvious places for investors. The problem is, investments that are obvious rarely pan out. Ethanol plays, at least in the short run, have been no exception. These stocks have all tumbled as corn prices have soared, making the main raw ingredient used to make ethanol prohibitively pricey.

Corn, as a feed for ethanol, is limited, says Michael Hoover, managing director at U.S. Trust. If ethanol were to provide just 10% of the nation's automotive fuel needs, it would consume 35% of the nation's corn crop. And 25% of all food prices are affected by corn prices, he says: "You've got a food-vs.-fuel issue."

But that doesn't mean there's no money to be made on the farm. There are high hopes about cellulosic ethanol, which is made from farm leftovers ranging from grasses to empty corn husks and beets. The trouble is, it takes more energy to extract starches from this "biomass" than it produces. Companies such as Diversa are working on developing enzymes that could be a cheap way to extract parts from biomass to create fuel.

Cashing in on the food boom requires thinking more creatively. For one thing, as in most gold rushes, the companies selling the picks and axes often cash in. That's why Kerschner thinks tractor-maker John Deere could benefit as farmers look to handle bigger crops more efficiently. Citing strong demand for tractors because of rising corn prices, Deere issued a bullish outlook for 2007, and analysts say the ethanol boom is just getting started. Similarly, Monsanto is working on crops that are more resistant to drought.

Alternative energy.

Windmills. Fuel cells. Solar panels. Those global warming plays pop into most investors' minds. There's no shortage of companies working on these technologies. Energy Conversion Devices and SunPower, for example, are developing types of clean solar panels with the hope of rivaling oil and coal, deemed "dirty" by scientists.

Don't count on making big-time dough, says Robert Wilder, CEO of WilderShares, a company that creates stock indexes that track eco-friendly companies. He says the technology is too immature.

Wilder is skeptical about how soon these technologies will make meaningful contributions. Solar, for instance, provides only one-tenth of a percent of the world's energy. Even if production were ramped up tenfold, it would provide 1% of current demand.

Alternative energy plays, he believes, are not the best route to profits. He prefers technology that makes dirty energy sources, such as coal and oil, cleaner. Fuel Tech, for example, makes devices that help factories reduce the dangerous carbon spewed out of smokestacks. "Ironically, people interested in benefiting from climate change should look at the really dirty stuff, not the clean stuff," Wilder says.

Another potential play: nuclear power generators. While disposing of nuclear waste is problematic, the actual generation of nuclear energy is clean and doesn't produce carbon, he says. FPL Group is a play on both nuclear and alternative energy because it produces nuclear power in addition to being the nation's biggest producer of wind power, Wilder says.

Automotive.

Seems like people are pouring just about anything into their gas tanks. There's ethanol, hydrogen, clean diesel and biodiesel. Each hold promise and any could be part of the solution, says Ron Cogan, editor and publisher of Green Car Journal.

Cogan lists hybrid technology as a can't-miss investment. Hybrid cars are powered by an intelligent system that knows when to run on liquid fuel and when to switch to electricity. Hybrid technology works with all the fuels to make them more efficient. Toyota, Honda, General Motors and Ford are the leaders, in that order, he says.

Another way to profit is to invest in companies that make the parts used to build hybrid vehicles. International Rectifier, for instance, makes many of the components that end up in hybrids made by General Motors and Ford. Energy Conversion makes the batteries.

Financial services.

One potential beneficiary, analysts say, is the Chicago Mercantile Exchange (CME), a futures exchange with an already-broad weather-related product lineup and plans to create markets. Last year, the CME traded 797,508 weather contracts valued at $21 billion, up nearly tenfold from $2.2 billion in 2004. Those options and futures enable insurance, energy and utility companies to hedge potential losses related to weather. Similarly, the CME recently launched "hurricane contracts" that enable insurers to transfer risk to financial markets. "Companies are becoming increasingly aware that climate is closely tied to profits," says Felix Carabello, CME's director of alternative investment products. "Investors are always looking for new asset classes" to diversify portfolios.

Stock investors seeking broad exposure to "green" investments could consider mutual funds offered by Domini Social Investments. All Domini holdings promote "the enrichment of our natural environment."

Infrastructure.

While the Earth may be choking on contaminants, the world's demand for energy is only accelerating as economies in places such as China and India enjoy growth spurts. And that's why heavy construction and engineering companies that build power plants will be busy, U.S. Trust's Hoover says.

But the enlightened ones that build ecologically sensitive plants will steal market share. Case in point: McDermott International. It builds and designs everything from coal-fired boilers to power-generation systems in 90 countries and nuclear steam generators.

The company is finding ways to make these plants more efficient and cleaner. One technology, clean coal, puts devices in smokestacks that pull the carbon out of the exhaust and plow it back into the soil. "It's about taking the harmful things out of the stack," Hoover says.

Real estate.

In a post-Hurricane Katrina world, many folks may rethink their dream of buying or remaining in coastal homes with coveted water views, David Lereah, chief economist at the National Association of Realtors, writes in his upcoming book, All Real Estate Is Local. Lereah cites global warming as a "megatrend" and notes that people have an "increasing aversion to locations on the water" and are avoiding "severe-weather-prone" areas.

He predicts households will "move from oceanfront properties to homes several miles away from the water." Many folks, he notes, are fleeing Florida in favor of the Smokey Mountain region, which includes Georgia, Tennessee and western North Carolina. "They feel more secure in the mountains," says Lereah.

DOJ_NMG_0137407

Red Lyons, a Georgia Realtor, confirms a stream of buyers, many from Florida, are moving to the mountain region: "It's without a doubt weather-related." Skyrocketing insurance premiums are also affecting property values. "Higher premiums come directly out of the asking price," says Dean Baker, co-director at the Center for Economic and Policy Research.

Technology.

Small parts and components that go into everything from washers and dryers to fighter jets and elevators could play a gigantic factor in curbing energy use. Technology that exists right now could reduce the world's power use by 30% overnight, says Alex Lidow, CEO of advanced control maker International Rectifier. About 11% of the savings could be achieved with efficient electric motors inside washing machines, conveyor belts and other motors that use half the energy of older technology, Lidow says. Another 11% could be saved in transportation uses including hybrids. The last 8% can be saved with energy-efficient fluorescent bulbs.

Making devices that go into bulbs, hybrid cars and electric motors is paying off for International Rectifier. It gets a third of its business, which is growing at an annual 25% clip, from such energy-saving devices. Those businesses focused on energy efficiency are also the company's most profitable.

Despite the forward-looking mind-set of Wall Street analysts, profiting from climate change is still in its infancy. Citigroup's Kerschner learned that firsthand at a recent meeting with wealthy clients in Florida, a state known for both its beautiful beaches and run-ins with deadly hurricanes.

Says Kerschner: "I asked them, 'How many of you are aware of global warming?' Virtually everyone raised their hand. Next I asked, 'How many of you are concerned about global warming?' Most kept their hands up. Finally I asked, 'How many of you have adjusted your investments due to climate change?' Sheepishly, most put their hands down."

At that moment, Kerschner says, he knew most investors hadn't even started to think about how to profit from changes in the Earth's weather patterns.

Wildlife Refuges Lack Means To Survive (LAT)

By Tim Reiterman

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The San Luis National Wildlife Refuge Complex, where tule elk bugle across grassy uplands and migratory waterfowl splash in languid sloughs, has been run for years out of a strip mall 12 miles away, next door to a Sears store.

There is no money to build a visitors center on the 44,000-acre complex that provides recreation for about 90,000 tourists, anglers, hunters and bird watchers each year. Nor is there money to hire a second full-time law enforcement officer for the complex's three far-flung refuges in Merced and Stanislaus counties.

A high-energy, 80-pound Belgian Malinois, Scott can be a formidable ally when Merrill is tracking down poachers, breaking up altercations, searching for marijuana patches and meth labs, or investigating burglar alarms at refuge warehouses. But the pair can cover only one refuge at a time, although drug crimes, fish and game violations, vandalism, dumping and medical emergencies occur throughout the complex.

The National Wildlife Refuge System, part of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, was created a century ago to provide a haven for the most imperiled species. But today the mosaic of 547 refuges covering nearly 100 million acres of swamps, islands, wetlands, deserts, grasslands and forests is itself jeopardized by budget constraints.

Distributed across all 50 states, the refuges are home to hundreds of types of birds, mammals, reptiles, amphibians and fish — many threatened or endangered. But refuge managers say cutbacks are undermining efforts to protect an array of sensitive species, including red wolves, sandhill cranes, pronghorn antelope, sea turtles and rare butterflies.

Personnel scarce

More than 225 jobs at refuges were cut between fiscal 2004 and 2006, leaving some refuges with no employees. Many refuges operate without full-time law enforcement. Some are losing battles against invasive plant species that choke out wildlife habitat. Education programs for schoolchildren and others are being curtailed or dropped at some refuges. At the 1.5-million-acre Desert National Wildlife Refuge, the largest in the lower 48 states, there is no money to fix a washed-out stretch of a 75-mile dirt road from Las Vegas across the Mojave Desert in Nevada. Some visitors insist on driving through the closed section and get stranded. "I just hope someone does not die before I have the opportunity to have it fixed," manager Amy Sprunger said.

Across the country, in North Carolina's Pocosin Lakes National Wildlife Refuge, half of the 100 miles of roads have been closed. "We can't pay for materials to fix the holes," manager Howard Phillips said.

At California's Antioch Dunes refuge along the San Joaquin River near Antioch, budget constraints have contributed to a steep decline in endangered Lange's metalmark butterflies, a subspecies only found there, according to manager Christy Smith.

From a peak of 2,300 eight years ago, Smith said, the population plunged to about 100, because invasive plants overran buckwheat that sustains the butterflies. Now the refuge is using volunteers and others to attack the invaders, and a zoo plans to capture some butterflies to propagate them for release. "They are no longer sustainable in the wild," Smith said.

At Southwestern Arizona's Cabeza Prieta National Wildlife Refuge, manager Roger Di Rosa said he does not have staff to adequately monitor the well-being of endangered Sonoran pronghorn antelope. The wilderness the animals once had largely to themselves has become a busy corridor for smugglers and illegal immigrants. "It is affecting them," Di Rosa said. "Watching them over time, we feel it is hampering efforts of recovery."

The refuge system's Mountain-Prairie region, which covers almost 5 million acres from the Dakotas to Colorado, has lost almost half of its 31 biological technicians, and that has deputy assistant regional director Ron Shupe especially worried about migratory birds that use wetlands in the Alamosa refuge in Colorado's San Luis Valley.

Without biological monitoring, Shupe said, employees are left to guess "when to raise and lower the water to provide correct habitat for migrating waterfowl and sand hill cranes…. If the fowl pass [the wetland], they will roost on private land, increasing exposure to hunting" and the likelihood that the birds would feed on crops.

Bill Reffalt, who was national chief of refuges in the early 1980s, said habitat degradation was a nationwide problem.

"Hundreds of millions of birds and other wildlife depend on refuges … and if you reduce the capacity of refuges to take care of them, the animals have no place to go," he said. "They can't just go buy a plane ticket."

Refuge funding, now about $380 million annually, has remained relatively flat since 2003, while salaries and other operating costs have risen. Anticipating that domestic security, hurricane relief, and the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan will remain higher priorities, officials are preparing to trim 75 regional and headquarters office jobs and 248 more field jobs in the next couple of years. That means the field staff will have been cut by one-sixth since fiscal 2004.

"I told them [managers] we can no longer do more with less if we are going to have quality delivery," U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Director H. Dale Hall said in a telephone interview. "We are going to have to do less with less and make … intelligent management decisions…. We are going to come out of this with a strong wildlife system."

Battling invaders

But many refuge managers aren't so sure. Nearly two-thirds of them, responding to a recent survey by the nonprofit Public Employees for Environmental Responsibility, said the refuge system is not accomplishing its missions.

"I've been with this agency 30 years and have seen ups and downs, but I have never seen anything like this," said Patricia Martinkovic, manager of the Minnesota Valley refuge near Minneapolis.

After losing 20% of her staff, Martinkovic said, the refuge is drastically reducing the mowing of 35 miles of trails, prescribed burning for fire protection and invasive plant control.

"Fast forward it a few years and you will see that wetlands have basically filled in with [invasive plants] and will not see that nice vista of egrets and trumpeter swans," Martinkovic said.

The Southeast, with 128 refuges, has been particularly hard-hit by cuts.

President Theodore Roosevelt founded the first refuge at 5.5-acre Pelican Island on the east coast of Florida to protect birds. By the system's centennial celebration there in 2003, the refuge had expanded to 5,400 acres with a staff of six.

The staff is about to be cut to two. No biologists work at the refuge even though the staff is responsible for looking after the country's largest concentration of threatened loggerhead and endangered green sea turtles nesting at a nearby refuge. "It is a little oasis of species diversity," said manager Paul Tritaik, "because lots of Florida is growing tremendously."

Managers have been doing whatever they can to keep the refuges running. They have relied more heavily on volunteers, sought outside funding sources and have done manual labor themselves, such as laying pipe for wetland management and mending fences to keep cattle out of fragile habitat.

At South Carolina's Cape Romain, budget cuts have forced the refuge manager to choose between two successful programs: one that nurtures threatened loggerhead turtles and another that has helped bring back the nearly extinct red wolf.

Manager Donny Browning said he favored the turtles because nests on the refuge produce a quarter of the loggerheads hatched north of Florida. "That program is so vital," he said.

For two decades, the coastal refuge also was an integral part of efforts to save the red wolf, which had dwindled to fewer than 20 animals. Wolf pups bred on Bulls Island in the refuge, then reintroduced to wolf habitat in the region, proved better at surviving alligators and other hazards than wolves from captive-breeding programs.

But about two years ago, the program was halted — and the wolves were removed from the island. Although the red wolf has rebounded to around 300 animals, most are in captivity, and the total population is about 250 shy of the recovery goal.

Now Bud Fazio, the biologist who heads the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service's Red Wolf Recovery Program, said plans for more budget cuts threaten the remaining offshore breeding program at St. Vincent Island in Florida. If there is no biologist available, Fazio said, "We will have to take wolves off that island as well and will have no source of wild-raised wolves to reintroduce unless we can establish one elsewhere."

Honeybees Vanish, Leaving Crops And Keepers In Peril (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

VISALIA, Calif., Feb. 23 — David Bradshaw has endured countless stings during his life as a beekeeper, but he got the shock of his career when he opened his boxes last month and found half of his 100 million bees missing.

In 24 states throughout the country, beekeepers have gone through similar shocks as their bees have been disappearing inexplicably at an alarming rate, threatening not only their livelihoods but also the production of numerous crops, including California almonds, one of the nation's most profitable.

"I have never seen anything like it," Mr. Bradshaw, 50, said from an almond orchard here beginning to bloom. "Box after box after box are just empty. There's nobody home."

The sudden mysterious losses are highlighting the critical link that honeybees play in the long chain that gets fruit and vegetables to supermarkets and dinner tables across the country.

Beekeepers have fought regional bee crises before, but this is the first national affliction.

Now, in a mystery worthy of Agatha Christie, bees are flying off in search of pollen and nectar and simply never returning to their colonies. And nobody knows why. Researchers say the bees are presumably dying in the fields, perhaps becoming exhausted or simply disoriented and eventually falling victim to the cold.

As researchers scramble to find answers to the syndrome they have decided to call "colony collapse disorder," growers are becoming openly nervous about the capability of the commercial bee industry to meet the growing demand for bees to pollinate dozens of crops, from almonds to avocados to kiwis.

Along with recent stresses on the bees themselves, as well as on an industry increasingly under consolidation, some fear this disorder may force a breaking point for even large beekeepers.

A Cornell University study has estimated that honeybees annually pollinate more than $14 billion worth of seeds and crops in the United States, mostly fruits, vegetables and nuts. "Every third bite we consume in our diet is dependent on a honeybee to pollinate that food," said Zac Browning, vice president of the American Beekeeping Federation.

The bee losses are ranging from 30 to 60 percent on the West Coast, with some beekeepers on the East Coast and in Texas reporting losses of more than 70 percent; beekeepers consider a loss of up to 20 percent in the offseason to be normal.

Beekeepers are the nomads of the agriculture world, working in obscurity in their white protective suits and frequently trekking around the country with their insects packed into 18-wheelers, looking for pollination work.

Once the domain of hobbyists with a handful of backyard hives, beekeeping has become increasingly commercial and consolidated. Over the last two decades, the number of beehives, now estimated by the Agriculture Department to be 2.4 million, has dropped by a quarter and the number of beekeepers by half.

Pressure has been building on the bee industry. The costs to maintain hives, also known as colonies, are rising along with the strain on bees of being bred to pollinate rather than just make honey. And beekeepers are losing out to suburban sprawl in their quest for spots where bees can forage for nectar to stay healthy and strong during the pollination season.

"There are less beekeepers, less bees, yet more crops to pollinate," Mr. Browning said. "While this sounds sweet for the bee business, with so much added loss and expense due to disease, pests and higher equipment costs, profitability is actually falling."

Some 15 worried beekeepers convened in Florida this month to brainstorm with researchers how to cope with the extensive bee losses. Investigators are exploring a range of theories, including viruses, a fungus and poor bee nutrition.

They are also studying a group of pesticides that were banned in some European countries to see if they are somehow affecting bees' innate ability to find their way back home.

It could just be that the bees are stressed out. Bees are being raised to survive a shorter offseason, to be ready to pollinate once the almond bloom begins in February. That has most likely lowered their immunity to viruses.

Mites have also damaged bee colonies, and the insecticides used to try to kill mites are harming the ability of queen bees to spawn as many worker bees. The queens are living half as long as they did just a few years ago.

Researchers are also concerned that the willingness of beekeepers to truck their colonies from coast to coast could be adding to bees' stress, helping to spread viruses and mites and otherwise accelerating whatever is afflicting them.

Dennis van Engelsdorp, a bee specialist with the state of Pennsylvania who is part of the team studying the bee colony collapses, said the "strong immune suppression" investigators have observed "could be the AIDS of the bee industry," making bees more susceptible to other diseases that eventually kill them off.

Growers have tried before to do without bees. In past decades, they have used everything from giant blowers to helicopters to mortar shells to try to spread pollen across the plants. More recently researchers have been trying to develop "self-compatible" almond trees that will require fewer bees. One company is even trying to commercialize the blue orchard bee, which is virtually stingless and works at colder temperatures than the honeybee.

Beekeepers have endured two major mite infestations since the 1980s, which felled many hobbyist beekeepers, and three cases of unexplained disappearing disorders as far back as 1894. But those episodes were confined to small areas, Mr. van Engelsdorp said.

Today the industry is in a weaker position to deal with new stresses. A flood of imported honey from China and Argentina has depressed honey prices and put more pressure on beekeepers to take to the road in search of pollination contracts. Beekeepers are trucking tens of billions of bees around the country every year.

California's almond crop, by far the biggest in the world, now draws more than half of the country's bee colonies in February. The crop has been both a boon to commercial beekeeping and a burden, as pressure mounts for the industry to fill growing demand. Now spread over 580,000 acres stretched across 300 miles of California's Central Valley, the crop is expected to grow to 680,000 acres by 2010.

Beekeepers now earn many times more renting their bees out to pollinate crops than in producing honey. Two years ago a lack of bees for the California almond crop caused bee rental prices to jump, drawing beekeepers from the East Coast.

This year the price for a bee colony is about $135, up from $55 in 2004, said Joe Traynor, a bee broker in Bakersfield, Calif.

A typical bee colony ranges from 15,000 to 30,000 bees. But beekeepers' costs are also on the rise. In the past decade, fuel, equipment and even bee boxes have doubled and tripled in price.

The cost to control mites has also risen, along with the price of queen bees, which cost about $15 each, up from $10 three years ago.

To give bees energy while they are pollinating, beekeepers now feed them protein supplements and a liquid mix of sucrose and corn syrup carried in tanker-sized trucks costing $12,000 per load. Over all, Mr. Bradshaw figures, in recent years he has spent $145 a hive annually to keep his bees alive, for a profit of about $11 a hive, not including labor expenses. The last three years his net income has averaged $30,000 a year from his 4,200 bee colonies, he said.

"A couple of farmers have asked me, 'Why are you doing this?' " Mr. Bradshaw said. "I ask myself the same thing. But it is a job I like. It is a lifestyle. I work with my dad every day. And now my son is starting to work with us."

Almonds fetch the highest prices for bees, but if there aren't enough bees to go around, some growers may be forced to seek alternatives to bees or change their variety of trees.

"It would be nice to know that we have a dependable source of honey bees," said Martin Hein, an almond grower based in Visalia. "But at this point I don't know that we have that for the amount of acres we have got."

To cope with the losses, beekeepers have been scouring elsewhere for bees to fulfill their contracts with growers. Lance Sundberg, a beekeeper from Columbus, Mont., said he spent $150,000 in the last two weeks buying 1,000 packages of bees — amounting to 14 million bees — from Australia.

He is hoping the Aussie bees will help offset the loss of one-third of the 7,600 hives he manages in six states. "The fear is that when we mix the bees the die-offs will continue to occur," Mr. Sundberg said.

Migratory beekeeping is a lonely life that many compare to truck driving. Mr. Sundberg spends more than half the year driving 20 truckloads of bees around the country. In Terra Bella, an hour south of Visalia, Jack Brumley grimaced from inside his equipment shed as he watched Rosa Patiño use a flat tool to scrape dried honey from dozens of beehive frames that once held bees. Some 2,000 empty boxes — which once held one-third of his total hives — were stacked to the roof.

Beekeepers must often plead with landowners to allow bees to be placed on their land to forage for nectar. One large citrus grower has pushed for California to institute a "no-fly zone" for bees of at least two miles to prevent them from pollinating a seedless form of Mandarin orange.

But the quality of forage might make a difference. Last week Mr. Bradshaw used a forklift to remove some of his bee colonies from a spot across a riverbed from orange groves. Only three of the 64 colonies there have died or disappeared.

"It will probably take me two to three more years to get back up," he said. "Unless I spend gobs of money I don't have."

Show On The Road (WSJ)

By Robert Poole

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137411

Lou Dobbs recently griped on his popular CNN show that parts of the Interstate highway system "built with your tax dollars are now being sold to the highest bidder. And incredibly, it's being done with the federal government's encouragement." Worse, according to America's loudest economic nationalist: "Some of the leading bidders: foreign investors."

I was interviewed for this segment and pointed out, helpfully I thought, that a Spanish company sinking $7 billion into new highways in Texas, meanwhile creating thousands of U.S. jobs, is the very antithesis of protectionists' dreaded "outsourcing." But that tidbit was left on the cutting-room floor.

Mr. Dobbs and others are riled up, but the public-private toll road partnerships sweeping the nation promise to revitalize our highway system. It's a seismic shift in the way roads are financed and managed -- the biggest change since the launch of the Interstate system 50 years ago. In these deals, investor-owned companies pay for the right to design, finance, build, operate, maintain and rebuild an existing or new toll road. In return they get the right to collect tolls on the road for 50 to 99 years.

Headlines may scream "New Jersey Turnpike for Sale!" but highways are not "sold" under these concessions. The government still owns the roads and the contracts spell out exactly what the company can -- and must -- do. The deals (whether for a new or existing road) typically include limits on allowable toll increases and rates of return, maintenance requirements, etc.

Private roads aren't exactly new: In the 19th century, private toll roads provided much of England and America's pre-auto-era highway capacity. Public-private toll road partnerships were rediscovered in France, Spain and Italy during the 1960s and '70s as the main method for building nationwide toll motorway systems.

The re-emergence of this model in the U.S. has been driven by a transportation system burdened with pork projects and funded by gas taxes that fail to keep up with construction and maintenance costs, let alone travel demand. From 1980 to 2000 highway travel increased 80% and the number of drivers rose by 30%, but highway capacity grew by just 2%.

Woefully short of funds, states are turning to the private sector. But private capital will only invest in projects people or shippers are willing to pay tolls to use. Money is therefore directed to routes and roads most appealing to users, not according to the agendas of pork-happy politicians.

State and city governments are also realizing that they are sitting on billions in untapped assets. Chicago's Democratic Mayor Richard Daley moved first, leasing the 7.8 mile Chicago Skyway for $1.8 billion in 2005. The Spanish-Australian consortium leasing the road quickly improved traffic flow by installing state-of-the-art electronic toll collection equipment.

Republican Gov. Mitch Daniels leased an Indiana toll road for $3.8 billion and is working to partner with the private sector on a new one that would connect several counties. Democratic Gov. Ed Rendell may lease the Pennsylvania Turnpike, while his Democratic cohort, Gov. Jon Corzine, is considering the same for New Jersey's.

While states are trying to reduce congestion and build roads without raising taxes, we can never underestimate the federal government's power to stop progress dead in its tracks. At a recent hearing on toll road public-private partnerships, Oregon's Democratic Rep. Peter DeFazio mused that "the federal government may have to step in" if the leasing of existing toll roads continues.

Congress would be wise to get out of the way and let a crucial experiment play out, in which some states embrace the new approach and others don't. In 10 years, we'll all be able to see whose highways resemble packed parking lots, and which states have booming economies because they're moving goods on free-flowing roads.

Tribes Get Funds To Help In Meth (BG)

Billings Gazette, February 27, 2007

The Northern Cheyenne and Crow Indian reservations have received federal funding to bolster their fights against methamphetamine.

The Boys & Girls Club of the Northern Cheyenne Nation has received a $15,000 grant to start a pilot program called Meth SMART. The program is to run through June with federal funding from the Office of Justice Programs Prevention Initiative. It provides age-appropriate curriculum to teach kids ages 6-18 about meth and its effects.

SMART Moves

The Arizona Alliance of Boys & Girls Clubs developed the program, which is based on the national Boys & Girls Clubs' successful Skills Mastery and Resistance Training Moves programs. SMART Moves focuses on prevention and healthy choices.

"The kids see the use out there," Bureau of Indian Affairs Chief of Police John Grinsell Grinsell said. "They need to know that it isn't right, it isn't good."

The Crow Tribe is anticipating about $100,000 from the Department of Justice. It also received a $45,000 grant from Health and Human Services and the Department of Justice. The Justice funding will help the Crow/Northern Cheyenne Safe Trail Task Force, which was created last year to fight drug use and dealing, Crow Tribal Chairman Carl Venne said.

"It's a big boost to us," Venne said. "We're doing everything we can to cope with the problem."

DOJ_NMG_0137412

Meth Free Crow will help administer the other grant. Coordinator April Flores said the program is under way with youth task forces in the schools developing anti-meth messages.

"We need to reclaim our communities, to reclaim our children, their mothers and fathers," Flores said.

Funding, programs fit

Ernie Weyand, senior supervisory resident agent with the FBI, said the funding and programs fit with law enforcement's efforts.

The Crow/Northern Cheyenne Safe Trail Task Force has had several successes in terms of arrests and executing search warrants, Weyand said. It also has an education and prevention component that aims to help keep people off the drug but also gather community support to help law enforcement stop dealing and distribution.

The task force is a partnership among the two tribes, the FBI, the Bureau of Indian Affairs Office of Justice Services, the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Colstrip Police Department.

"It's really all about awareness and education," Weyand said. "As we've said before, we will never arrest our way out of this problem. It just won't happen.

"It's about providing education and empowering community members to join the fight and be part of this effort."

Northern Cheyenne

In a quiet voice Theresa Harris shares a poem that explains how children see adults: Their little eyes watch and their little ears listen and their little hands want to do what big hands do.

As program director at the Boys and Girls Club of the Northern Cheyenne Nation, Harris has seen that poem play out in the lives of the children she works with.

Harris has asked children if they know what meth is.

"Little hands came up," Harris said. "And it's just amazing.

"The kids know, it affects and impacts them," Harris said. "Man, it just makes you step back and take a deep breath."

Some of the kids are so young, Harris said, that sitting in the club chairs "their legs don't even reach the floor."

"Kids are smart," Harris said. "They know what the light bulbs and needles and straws and pens are used for."

Adults have a responsibility to talk to kids about methamphetamine use, Harris said. The question is how to do so in an age-appropriate manner. The Northern Cheyenne club has hopefully come up with an answer.

Lane Spotted Elk is the club's coordinator for the Meth SMART. A teenager, Spotted Elk will work with the kids three times a week.

"This was just a blessing because now we have the tools to be able to work with them, to be able to help them," Harris said.

The Northern Cheyenne club has several anti-meth awareness messages, including a three-day summer camp. It is also affiliated with the tribe's War on Meth committee that hosts activities and awareness events.

The Meth SMART program is divided by age groups: kids, ages 6-9; youth, ages 10-13; and teens, ages 14-18. The curriculum has several components. For example, kids start with an introduction to drugs that harm with an emphasis on meth; youths learn facts about meth and its effects on the body and mind; teens continue that track and case studies on methamphetamine users are added.

Parents receive a handbook that explains the program and offers ways to start family discussions.

Meth SMART comes at a time when there is "an awakening" on the reservation about the effects of methamphetamine, Harris said and added she works with kids whose families are torn apart by the drug. Talking about meth not only helps prevent use, it helps those affected by the drug know they are not alone and they have a safe place to talk.

"Our kids are worth fighting for," Harris said.

Grinsell and the department's drug officers took part in an orientation meeting for the program.

"The more awareness that people have the better off I think they will be," Grinsell said. "A lot of people don't know too much about meth. They need to know once you experiment with it you're going to be hooked, it's not like any other drug."

Crow Reservation

Crow Bureau of Indian Affairs Chief of Police Ed Eastman has a new graffiti issue in Lodge Grass.

Lately, the spray-painted messages around town have shifted from seemingly gang related to an anti-meth language.

The idea is right, Eastman said, even if the medium is not.

"They're asking for help," Eastman said.

The infusion of money will help with law enforcement overtime and resources, Eastman said.

The grant allows the Crow Reservation to tap resources available through a High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Area designation. Indian Country is seen as a target for methamphetamine dealers, especially Mexican drug traffickers, according to the Department of Justice's "National Methamphetamine Threat Assessment 2007." Access to the Crow Tribe is easy with Interstate 90 running across the reservation and connecting it to urban areas including Billings.

The new prevention program will give kids a chance to use their creativity to spread the "no meth" message in a more productive way than graffiti.

Flores, the Meth Free Crow coordinator, said the program will develop a DVD and campaign posters. She also sees kids using their own talents, whether that is traditional or hip-hop music or skits, to spread the prevention message.

"Our intent is not to throw everybody in jail," Venne said. "How can we help them? To teach them it is bad and we are here and we can help them."

But that does not mean that dealers, in Crow or elsewhere, won't be prosecuted. "We really want to nail them," Venne said.

Venne said it is important for the tribe to take responsibility for fighting the drug.

"Now the people are aware of it and they're wanting some thing done," he said. "What's dangerous about this drug, it has no barriers, whether you're rich or poor. I think it's the devil himself."

FBI Unsure If Missing Notebook PCs Contain Sensitive Data (GCN)

By Jana Cranmer, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 27, 2007

The FBI has reduced notebook PC losses by 312 percent since 2002, but the bureau has failed to adequately report whether stolen computers contain classified or sensitive data, the Justice Department Office of the Inspector General said in an audit report last week.

“When losses occur, the FBI must timely report the loss, be able to identify the contents of lost laptops and determine whether the laptop is encrypted,” the bureau’s IG said in a follow-up report to a 2002 analysis. “In addition, the FBI “must investigate these losses and thefts, enter required data into the National Crime Information Center and report the losses to the DOJ as required.”

The IG’s “most troubling” discovery was “the FBI could not determine in many cases whether the lost or stolen laptop computers contained sensitive or classified information.”

The FBI’s data was incomplete, auditors found. Of the 160 notebooks that disappeared between February 2002 and September 2006, employees filed only 152 forms to provide information about whether the notebooks contained sensitive or classified information. This information could include counterintelligence or counterterrorism case information, personal identifying information or classified information on FBI operations, the report said.

The forms revealed that eight missing notebooks contained sensitive classified information, but these forms failed to provide a complete picture of the losses. The auditor said 43 other forms did not state whether the lost notebook contained sensitive or classified information.

“Without knowing the contents of these lost and stolen laptop computers, it is impossible for the FBI to know the extent of the damage these losses might have had on its operations or on national security,” the audit said.

In addition to the insufficient information reported on these forms, employees reported in a less than timely manner that 38 notebooks were missing — more than 10 days after their disappearances — delaying loss investigations.

After discovering the FBI’s insufficient tracking of missing notebooks, auditors recommended that the FBI:

Maintain adequate records on how many notebooks are authorized to hold classified information.

Document the disposal of excess notebooks and hard drives to ensure sanitation of all sensitive or classified information prior to disposal.

Report weapon and notebook losses to DOJ.

Ensure that property is recovered from employees before they leave the FBI.

Adhere to its policy on property storage. The bureau agreed with most of the recommendations and plans to implement them.

“While the Inspector General acknowledged that the loss of certain resources is inevitable in an organization the size of the FBI we nevertheless stand committed to increasing the institutional and personal accountability to further increase the progress we have made in minimizing the loss of information technology components,” said FBI assistant director John Miller in response to the audit.

News Area Man Sentenced For Role In Meth Conspiracy (DRR)

Mt. Carmel Daily Republican Register, February 27, 2007

BENTON, Ill. — A Fairfield man and a Springerton man were sentenced to in federal court after pleading guilty to conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of methamphetamine.

Acting United States Attorney for the Southern District of Illinois Randy G. Massy said Fairfield resident Kevin L. Garrett, 40, was sentenced to 30 years imprisonment, fined $1,000, and placed on 10 years of supervised release following his incarceration during sentencing in United States District Court in Benton last week.

Stewart W. Poore, 44, of Springerton, to 20 years imprisonment, fined $900 and placed on 10 years of supervised release following incarceration.

Garrett and Poore were charged along with 29 other defendants by a federal grand jury in July 2005 with conspiring to manufacture and distribute 500 grams or more of meth.

Both pled guilty to the offense in October 2006.

Under federal law, parole has been abolished and defendants are required to serve at least 85 percent of their sentences.

These guilty pleas resulted from a long term investigation into the manufacture of methamphetamine in Wayne and White counties.

Thus far, that investigation, which began in 2003, has resulted in the federal indictment of 33 individuals in related cases who, in total, were responsible for the manufacture or attempted manufacture of the equivalent of over 400,000 grams of methamphetamine.

In addition to the 33 defendants who have been indicted federally, over 20 additional defendants have been prosecuted in related cases in state court by the State's Attorneys in Wayne and White counties.

Investigation into the case is on-going and is being led by the Carmi office of the Southern Illinois Drug Task Force, with the assistance of the Illinois State Police, the Fairfield Police Department, the Carmi Police Department, the White County Sheriff's Department, the Joint Narcotics Unit of the Mt. Vernon Police Department and Jefferson County Sheriff's Department, the Wayne County State's Attorney's Office, the White County State's Attorney's Office, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the United States Drug Enforcement Administration.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant United States Attorney James M. Cutchin.

Maine Coast Guard Crew Seizes $14 Million In Drugs During Caribbean Patrol (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

The U.S. Coast Guard says a crew based out of Maine seized $14 million worth of cocaine and heroine during a 54-day patrol in the central Caribbean.

Coast Guard Officials said the crew of the New England-based cutter Tahoma intercepted a freighter carrying more than a thousand pounds(462 kilograms) of cocaine, 66 pounds (30 kilograms) of heroin and a machine gun equipped with a silencer.

The Coast Guard towed the ship 500 miles to San Juan, Puerto Rico for further inspection and turned the drugs and freighter passengers to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency.

The crew is expected to return tomorrow at the Portsmouth Naval Shipyward in Kittery.

Local Coast Guard Cutter Tahoma Seizes Drugs In Carribean (FDD)

Foster's Daily Democrat, February 26, 2007

KITTERY, Maine — The U.S. Coast Guard reported seizing $14 million worth of cocaine and heroin during a 54-day patrol of the central Caribbean.

Coast Guard Officials said on Feb. 4, the crew of the New England-based cutter Tahoma intercepted a freighter carrying 462 kilos of cocaine, 30 kilos of heroin and a MAC-10 machine gun equipped with a silencer on board the Bolivian-flagged vessel Osiris II, according to the Coast Guard's website.

The Osiris II, a 130-foot cargo vessel, was intercepted by the cutter Tahoma approximately 228 miles southeast of the Dominican Republic. After successful coordination and cooperation between the Caribbean Corridor participating agencies and the government of Bolivia, Coast Guard personnel boarded the vessel.

The Tahoma towed the ship 500 miles to San Juan, Puerto Rico for further inspection and turned the drugs and eight freighter passengers to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency, Coast Guard spokeswoman Sarah Rousseau said in a statement Saturday. The Caribbean Corridor Initiative consist of members from the U.S. Coast Guard, Immigration and Customs Enforcement, Drug Enforcement Agency, Customs and Border Protection, FBI and the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Fehr Says Union Will Advise Players On Mitchell Probe If Asked (AP)

AP, February 26, 2007

TUCSON (AP) — The players' association will offer advice but said it's the choice of each individual whether to cooperate with former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell's investigation into steroids use.

"We haven't made any comment about the Mitchell investigation specifically," union head Donald Fehr said Monday. "What you should expect, however, is that any time any player has an issue with that or something arises, then we will give them whatever our best advice is under the circumstances, and then players make their individual decisions."

Mitchell, hired by commissioner Bud Selig just before the start of the 2006 season, warned baseball owners in January that a lack of cooperation with his investigation into steroid use will "significantly increase" the chances of government involvement.

Fehr, starting his annual spring training tour by meeting with the Arizona Diamondbacks, said Mitchell's comments were unnecessary and that important individual rights are involved.

"I don't think there's anything productive for us to engage in a war," Fehr said. "We spend a lot of time in this country lately with lawyers trying to get public relations advantage on things. I'm not sure that when you're dealing with rights which may be in some sense fairly technical and legal that you ought to be doing that."

On another drug-related issue, Fehr said the union will "take a hard look" at any verified test to detect human growth hormone. That drug cannot be detected by a urine test, and a blood test is in its early stages of use.

"So far as I know it hasn't been peer reviewed by anybody," he said. "Nobody knows the details. We'll take a hard look at whatever it becomes when and if it becomes."

He believes baseball's current anti-drug rules, strengthened under pressure from Congress, "are working pretty well."

Fehr sidestepped an opinion about Barry Bonds and whether Selig would honor him if Bonds breaks Hank Aaron's career home run record.

"You know, look, at this point with all the controversy surrounding him, you ask Bud what he's going to do and he's going to demure and basically say 'I don't know yet,'" Fehr said. "We'll wait and see what happens. I'm not going to prejudge anything."

Fehr said this is his 30th spring training tour, and for a change, there is no contract rancor between the union and owners. The sides reached a new labor agreement last October without the usual public angst.

"It was remarkable," Fehr said. "It never happened before in my career. It made me feel pretty good."

The agreement currently is in the proofreading stage.

Ore. Medical Marijuana Users Ask Lawmakers To Protect Jobs (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

SALEM, Ore. (AP) — Medical marijuana advocates pleaded with lawmakers Monday to enact a bill that would prohibit employers from firing them because of their choice of medication.

"The bottom line is I need a job and I don't make enough through social security and food stamps," said Judy Adamson, a 61-year-old widow, breast cancer survivor and registered medical marijuana user. Last year Adamson was suspended from her job as a driving instructor when she tested positive for cannabis after her former employer ordered her to take a drug test.

The new bill comes just a few weeks after a previous bill was introduced that would allow employers to fire employees who fail drug tests — even if they are a state registered medical marijuana user. That bill is currently being considered by the Business, Transportation and Workforce Development committee.

Both measures aim to clarify whether an employer in Oregon has the right to terminate someone's job if they fail a drug test but are a registered medical marijuana user.

Many employers say they already have that right. "The goal is to make sure that medical marijuana is treated as a possible intoxicating substance," said Jeff Dean, director of government affairs for the Pacific Northwest chapter of Associated Builders and Contractors.

During the last few weeks everyone from former commercial helicopter pilots to representatives from the construction industry have spoken about the importance of drug-free workplaces. But on Tuesday, lawmakers heard mostly from those who use medical marijuana for a variety of illnesses, and say that doing so helps them maintain their jobs.

"The nature of the discussion is straightforward," said Leland Berger, an attorney who testified on behalf of medical marijuana users. "It should be treated as any other medication."

But employers warn that medical marijuana users pose risks to themselves and other employees, and that drug tests are the surest way to keep out workers who might be impaired by marijuana use. Others say the best way to identify if a worker is impaired — not just by cannabis but by any type of medication or drug — is through computer programs and even video games that can test a person's reflexes and hand-eye coordination.

Andrea Meyer, a representative for the American Civil Liberties Union, said drug tests done through a urine analysis provide a false sense of safety because they don't reflect a worker's ability to function.

"If someone is using heavy equipment, they should be tested using technology that detects impairment," she said. "The issue shouldn't be what medicines they are on; the issue should be whether they are impaired, whatever the cause."

Democrats Spar Over Medical Pot For Workers (OREG)

By Janie Har, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, February 26, 2007

On the job - One legislator's bill would let employers fire legal weed users; another's stops them

SALEM -- The political stakes might not be as high as for school funding or tax increases, but two Democratic senators are jousting over workers' right to smoke medicinal dope.

Last Monday, Sen. Rick Metsger of Welches hustled out of his business and transportation committee a bill giving employers leeway to boot workers who use medical marijuana.

Today, Sen. Floyd Prozanski of Eugene will take up a bill in his Commerce Committee that would prohibit those same employers from discriminating against legal pot smokers.

Current law is a little hazy in this area.

Oregonians approved the medical use of marijuana in 1998 but didn't spell out how it would intersect with workplace laws, other than to say employers don't need to accommodate users. About 13,000 people in Oregon carry a card allowing them to ingest marijuana to treat severe pain or a "debilitating medical condition" such as cancer or glaucoma.

Employers say they shouldn't have to stub out their drug policies for medical marijuana users, some of whom might be high on the job and putting co-workers at risk.

"We don't have the time to deal with this stuff. We're not a social service agency, and we cannot take the risk of somebody hurting their fellow workers because they were impaired," says Bob Shiprack, lobbyist for the building and construction trades council.

"We'll let the Legislature sort this out, I guess," he says.

Medical marijuana and civil rights advocates say workers shouldn't be punished for treating a medical condition. If employers are so concerned about safety, they argue, businesses should test to see whether workers actually clock in unable to do their job.

"The only way they are testing is through urine analysis, which does not show whether a person is impaired at the time they are at the workplace," says Andrea Meyer of the American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon.

Prozanski agrees with the need for safeguards at work, but he says, "we need to not just go on a witch hunt."

He plans to pass Senate Bill 423 out of committee. Prozanski hopes the two sides can work out a deal.

"Good for him," Metsger says. "I'm going to try to do my best to block" his bill.

Later, Metsger tempered his comments to say he'd have to study Prozanski's proposal. Still, if there's any language "that would conflict with our efforts on (SB) 465," Metsger warned, "I would vigorously oppose it."

Hillman To Be Hired As Marshal (BOS)

By Frank Phillips, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 27, 2007

Former state representative and lieutenant governor candidate Reed V. Hillman is expected to soon land a much-coveted political appointment as US marshal for Massachusetts, leading state GOP sources said.

The White House is on the verge of announcing that Hillman, 58, a former head of the State Police, will be named to the $130,000-a-year patronage post, which has been vacant for the past 18 months, the sources said. The position was last held by Anthony Dichio, who was dismissed in August 2005 after a Justice Department report found he routinely failed to work full work weeks and had misused his official vehicle.

Hillman said today that he was unaware of any pending announcement, but confirmed that he would take the job if offered. "Anything on that will have to come from the White House," said Hillman, who stepped down as State Police commander in 1999 and then represented Sturbridge in the House of Representatives for six years. "All I know is that I am in the mix with four others."

But two leading Massachusetts Republican officials who have followed the appointment process said the White House has decided to give Hillman the job and will make an announcement within days.

"It's a matter of paperwork," said one of the sources, who has been involved in the appointment process and confirmed that the Massachusetts Republican leadership has lined up behind Hillman. "All the appropriate people agree that he's the right person."

IMMIGRATION:

Texas Could Pull The Welcome Mat (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

The Lone Star State has long welcomed Latino immigrants, no matter how they got across the state's 1,200-mile border with Mexico.

Back when California voted to cut public services to illegal immigrants, then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush was preaching that immigrants were equal players in the state's economy.

But the atmosphere has changed markedly in Texas, home to about 10% of the nation's illegal immigrants.

Now, a growing chorus of Republicans and some Democrats is pushing some of the harshest immigration-related measures in the United States — laws that would not only deny public services to illegal immigrants but strip their American-born children of benefits as well.

The proposal to deny services to American citizens, which is thought to be the first in the country, is part of a push to challenge the citizenship given automatically to children born in this country to illegal immigrants.

Prior rulings have affirmed that nearly all such children were entitled to birthright citizenship under the 14th Amendment. But some legal scholars have questioned whether the amendment, which redefined national citizenship to include the children of slaves after the Civil War, should cover babies born to foreign parents.

The Pew Hispanic Center estimated last year that more than 3 million U.S. citizens were born to illegal immigrant parents.

"The Texas bill could be a vehicle to get this before the courts, and we strongly support that," said Ira Mehlman, a spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which has been pushing Congress to revisit the 14th Amendment. "There is no question that it is time for a review, given the number of people entering the country illegally and giving birth."

Texas' shift toward a more incendiary brand of immigration politics comes at a time when many state lawmakers are frustrated that Washington has failed to stop illegal immigration. Few think President Bush's moderate proposals, which include a guest worker program and enhanced border security, will help much, even if they are approved by Congress.

State Rep. Leo Berman, the Texas legislator who wrote the bill to deny benefits to the children of illegal immigrants, admits that his goal is to set off a fight in the federal courts. His legislation has been compared to Proposition 187, which was ruled unconstitutional after California voters approved it in 1994, but it goes further. It would deny citizens born to illegal immigrants numerous state services, including unemployment benefits and the ability to obtain professional licenses.

"A pregnant illegal alien can wait at the border, check into a hospital in Texas, give birth without paying a penny, and be rewarded for her illegal behavior," Berman said. "That's outrageous."

Berman's bill is one of more than two dozen proposals targeting illegal immigration in Texas. Other measures would tax money that illegal immigrants wire abroad; require patients to prove they are in the country legally before receiving state medical services; eliminate in-state college tuition breaks for illegal immigrants; and require state agencies to do a thorough accounting of how much illegal immigration is costing the state. Texas is home to between 1 million and 2 million illegal immigrants.

"Why should illegal immigrants, who by virtue of being in the country have broken the law, be able to get the same state services as a citizen?" asked state Sen. Royce West, a Democrat from Dallas who is proposing one of several measures to tax remittances to Mexico. He said his legislation was one way to raise money for healthcare programs.

Texas politicians say that proposing such laws would have been unimaginable a decade ago. During his days as governor, Bush regularly praised the cultural and economic contributions Latino immigrants were making to the state. His political strategy paid off: He won 40% of the Latino vote in 1998, a number previously considered unreachable for a Republican.

Bush's approach was a stark contrast from the immigration politics in California during the tenure of Gov. Pete Wilson, who backed Proposition 187, using it to win reelection.

DOJ_NMG_0137418

"California has always been more liberal than Texas, but yet the treatment of immigration issues has been night and day," said Rogelio Saenz, a sociology professor at Texas A&M University.

The Texas Republican Party added hard-line immigration language to its platform last year in response to the demands of its conservative base. It included the line "No amnesty! No how. No way," and a call to "suspend automatic U.S. citizenship to children born to illegal immigrant parents," the idea now proposed by Berman.

Latino leaders say they are stunned by the Texas proposals to deny services to children. They promise retaliation at the ballot box.

"How could anyone be so mean-spirited?" said Rosa Rosales, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, the nation's oldest Latino civil rights group, which originated in Texas. "We're just going to have to get the community out to show these representatives that we matter."

For undocumented Texans such as Ofelia Lopez, the state's push to get tough on illegal immigrants elicits sadness as much as fear. Lopez , who crossed into the U.S. from Mexico seven years ago with the hope that she could give her children a better life, has two daughters, one 3 years old and one 6 months old, who are U.S. citizens.

"I don't think the solution is to deny children the opportunity to become better people. That's not going to help anyone," said Lopez, 35, who also has a 15-year-old daughter born in Mexico who is attending a Texas high school. "That's not going to stop people from coming here. People are coming here because it's the only way to survive."

Last year, state lawmakers nationwide proposed a record 570 immigration measures, and 84 were signed into law, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. The group predicts that immigration will again be among the hottest state issues in 2007.

In Texas, Democratic state Rep. Pete Gallego, head of the Mexican American Legislative Caucus in the House, said that though some of the new proposals were harsh, a few might have momentum, particularly the bills to tax wire transfers.

"People are appalled at how hard core some of these things are," Gallego said. "We will have a fight."

Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a conservative Republican who talked tough on illegal immigration during his reelection campaign last year, has tempered his rhetoric in recent weeks, and sounded a message of compassion and unity during his oath-of-office address last month. He has singled out Berman's proposal as divisive.

Berman counters that his bill may not make him the darling of Austin's lobbyists or the governor, but he is convinced his cause is popular.

"My mail is running 30 to 1 in favor of what I am trying to do," he said. "This problem is costing Texas money. Texas has to act."

TEST CASE Immigration Crackdown Targets Bosses This Time (WSJ)

By Barry Newman

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

GUILDERLAND, N.Y. -- Early in April of 2005, a man whose friends knew him as César went looking for a job at a wholesale distribution hub near this upstate village. At a workshop run by IFCO Systems North America Inc., the nation's biggest recycler of wooden pallets, César let the boss know that he was in the country illegally, but would be trying to buy some fake "papers."

"That will work," said Robert Belvin, the 42-year old IFCO site manager.

What Mr. Belvin didn't know was that César was an undercover informant working for federal immigration enforcers. Or that he was wearing a wire.

The conversation -- and many others César recorded -- helped build a case that is the biggest test so far of a heavily touted government campaign to control illegal immigration.

A year after César went to work, agents from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau pounced on 52 IFCO workshops in 26 states, arresting 1,187 foreigners. Unlike raids on many other companies -- including December's arrests of 1,282 workers at Swift & Co. -- the motivation for the raid on IFCO wasn't to catch foreigners. It was to catch the Americans who hired them. Seven IFCO middle managers were also arrested that day and charged, in identically worded complaints, under the same felony statute that punishes human smuggling. Five of them, people familiar with the case say, are expected to plead guilty today in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York.

Neither the company nor its top executives were named in the complaints, which allege that the managers "knowingly conspired with others" to transport, harbor and support undocumented workers for "commercial advantage or private financial gain." But the investigation isn't closed. Like any ICE operation today, one immigration official says, the objective is "to move up in the organization."

In 2005, the Department of Homeland Security announced that instead of imposing small fines for sloppy paperwork, its immigration-enforcement branch would flush out "egregious" employers and put them in jail. That demands proof and police work -- including undercover informants and secret recordings -- more common to drug busts than immigration audits.

· The Issue: Officials are targeting employers for their role in hiring undocumented workers.

· The Challenge: Nabbing offenders requires intensive law-enforcement efforts more common to drug busts.

· The Bottom Line: More cases are likely, as immigration officials take a more aggressive stance against undocumented workers.

Since ICE's creation in 2003, employer arrests have leapt from 25 in 2002 to 718 in 2006. Only last week, ICE arrested three executives of a Nevada-based janitorial service with national reach. But successful prosecutions have so far largely been limited to smaller labor contractors, restaurant owners, and a company putting up a fence on the Mexican border.

IFCO's parent, IFCO Systems NV, by contrast, has world-wide sales of nearly $650 million. Registered in Holland and managed out of Houston and Munich, it promotes itself as a smoothly run system, listing Target Corp., Cargill Inc. and Dell Inc. among many corporate customers. Repairing pallets -- the rough frames that carry goods from factory to warehouse -- is tough work. Up until last April, most IFCO pallet workers were Hispanic.

It was easy for ICE to swoop down on those working illegally. To accuse their bosses of a conspiracy, punishable by prison terms of up to 20 years, was a far greater task. The clues ICE collected, as disclosed in the complaints filed in federal court in Albany, resulted from a combination of lucky tips and accidents. The evidence was backed up by local police work, aggressive surveillance, and the unusual involvement of the Social Security Administration.

IFCO maintains that nothing points to illegal immigration as part of its formal business model. "We deeply regret that we had even a single ineligible worker on our payroll," the company said in a written statement. The company declined to comment further on the case.

The government claims that the immigration status of more than half of IFCO's 5,800 workers in the U.S. was suspect. It is unclear whether the U.S. Attorney in Albany, who is supervising the case, will bring charges against higher-level IFCO executives.

Still, the government's intrusive new style has petrified other companies that rely on foreign labor. "Everybody thinks these are show trials," says Amy Peck, an immigration lawyer in Colorado who represents corporate clients. "And at the same time, we're scared to death about what's going on."

The IFCO evidence, she and other lawyers acknowledge, appears to pull back the curtain of "plausible deniability" that effectively allows six million foreigners to work illegally in the U.S. To avoid discriminating, employers have argued for 20 years, they can't turn away candidates whose papers seem to be genuine. But at one upstate work site, the IFCO complaints allege, that was disingenuous.

The first hint came three months before César applied for a job, when the phone rang at the ICE office in Latham, 10 miles from here. The caller said he worked for IFCO, and said he saw some Spanish-speaking co-workers tearing up their W-2 tax forms. That made the immigration enforcers at ICE very curious: Why would anyone tear up a W-2?

The IFCO worker who phoned said that one of his bosses told him the men didn't need W-2s because they didn't file tax returns. "That's not something you hear every day," says Julie Myers, the DHS assistant secretary who heads ICE. Her agents decided IFCO was worth watching.

Toward the end of the month, a few IFCO workers were relaxing at the Governor's Inn, a motel near the pallet shop. "They like to drink," a Honduran named Reynaldo says now. "They went to the store to get more beer." (A forklift driver arrested in the raid, he has remained in the area and asked that his full name not be used.) As four men returned to the motel in a Chevrolet, the Guilderland police say, they crashed into a Subaru. Two young women were slightly hurt. The Chevy's driver jumped out and ran.

The police found the other three men in the motel. Mr. Belvin, the manager of IFCO's operation, arrived and went with his workers to the police station. All three, the police told Mr. Belvin, had admitted being in the country illegally. Mr. Belvin said that was untrue and that he had the documents to prove it. Mr. Belvin's lawyer didn't respond to phone messages seeking comment.

Then, in an unrelated incident in March, a woman called the police to say she had been attacked in a garage by a Hispanic man. An officer sent to the scene found no suspects. But he did interview six men at a nearby house in connection with the woman's complaint. The men all said they worked for IFCO. The police, recalling IFCO's connection to the earlier accident, notified ICE. Senior inspector John Tashjian said, "If there's any suspicion they're undocumented, we do that."

Responding, ICE agents found five men who didn't belong in the country and arrested them. In sworn statements, a Honduran said he didn't show any documents when IFCO hired him and a Salvadoran said he was told "that papers would be provided to him later."

It wasn't long before ICE decided to plant its spy.

"I have never heard of that being done in an immigration work-site enforcement action, never," says Paul Zulkie, an attorney who advises corporations on immigration policies and is also president of the American Immigration Law Foundation.

But ICE's orientation has changed. Many of its agents came out of the former Customs Service, which enforced import and export regulations. For them, getting evidence to prove that managers know full well that documents are fake means peeking behind the paperwork.

According to the complaints, ICE's informant had himself been arrested by the Border Patrol for entering the country illegally. After he assisted ICE in a human-smuggling case in Texas, the agency gave him temporary leave to remain in the U.S. -- plus a stipend -- in exchange for his cooperation to help with the IFCO investigation. In April, the complaints say, he introduced himself to some IFCO workers at a grocery.

The informant isn't cited by name in the complaint. But piecing together bits of information, former IFCO workers say they knew him as César, a Portuguese-speaking forklift driver.

The complaints detail how he ultimately got his fake green card and fake Social Security card directly from ICE. The name on the Social Security card wasn't the one he had given IFCO. Nor was the name on the green card. The picture, say the complaints, was of someone else. César showed the documents to Mr. Belvin's boss, James Rice.

Mr. Rice, then 35 years old, was a development manager who had come to open the Guilderland operation the previous October. But because it was a start-up, people close to the company say, its managers were having a hard time finding workers. Looking at the photo on the fake green card while César recorded him, Mr. Rice said, "It looks like you to me." Mr. Rice's lawyer had no comment.

Once hired, César did more at IFCO than drive a forklift. At Mr. Belvin's request and with assistance from ICE, the complaints say, he helped recruit more illegal workers. He got phony documents for five other new hires and he phoned an IFCO manager in Houston to ask about jobs here for two Mexicans who had crossed the border.

In July, César was promoted to foreman.

Already well along in its work, ICE opened a second line of inquiry into IFCO: It enlisted the Social Security Administration.

When numbers on tax returns don't match numbers on its books, Social Security tells employers by letter. A "no-match" can have many explanations, but to ICE it's a red flag of illegal immigration. Yet privacy law bans Social Security from showing ICE its data. Companies do volunteer for audits in return for shelter from raids, and they can check Social Security numbers of new hires themselves. IFCO didn't volunteer for such programs. But the sanctity of its records vanished the moment its recyclers were seen tearing up W-2s.

Destroying the forms was a violation that let Social Security in on the case. Through a subpoena of IFCO's payroll processor, says one official, its inspectors learned that 53% of IFCO's workers in 2005 had dud Social Security numbers. What's more, the complaints say, they discovered that in 2004 and 2005 IFCO received 13 letters in Houston informing it that "more than 1,000 social-security numbers" at "several" of its sites "did not match the records of the SSA."

IFCO didn't follow up on the letters. People familiar with IFCO's position say an employee set the letters aside unopened, failed to tell anybody about them, and then left the company for good.

In the fall of 2005, César traveled to an IFCO start-up in Westborough, Mass., the complaints recount. With Mike Ames, IFCO's site manager, he visited a bakery where Brazilian day-laborers gathered. After speaking in Portuguese with a woman there, César recorded an exchange with Mr. Ames, whose lawyer also didn't respond to requests for comment.

César said: "They don't have no documents, no papers, no permission to work in the United States."

Mr. Ames replied: "But, you know how to work the deal...I don't want it to end up where they can't be paid because of identity, ID, you know what I'm saying."

At least five Brazilians got jobs. Directed by Mr. Belvin and Mr. Rice, the complaints say, César drove three of them 150 miles to Guilderland "for training."

A few weeks later, Mr. Rice left IFCO. On Jan. 8, 2006, Mr. Belvin was fired. Neither departure, according to people familiar with the situation, had to do with immigration issues. Soon afterward, IFCO fired César. Officials won't say where he is now.

On the day of the IFCO raids last April, people following the case say, ICE agents interviewed dozens more managers around the country. The court granted ICE permission to search computers in Guilderland. And, according to the complaints, the federal Department of Labor also spoke to a former bookkeeper who claimed that piecework pallet repairmen were being systematically underpaid for overtime work.

Showing that IFCO broke wage rules could support a charge that it used illegally hired workers for commercial gain, say some legal experts. And connections among workers and managers at several sites could be used to argue -- as the government has in some other immigration cases -- that what ICE uncovered was no rogue operation.

IFCO denies the implication. "There was certainly no corporate strategy to hire undocumented workers or exploit any of our employees," the company said in a statement. Since the raids, it has added new payroll screeners and joined the Social Security verification system. Profits slumped in midyear, but having scoured its records, IFCO says its labor force is up to strength and is as legal as can be.

Of the workers rounded up in April, many have left the country or slipped underground. Reynaldo, the Honduran who drove a forklift for IFCO here, has stayed on in a frame house nearby. The arrest of his managers at IFCO was news to him.

"That really touches me," the 24-year-old said, sitting beside a messy bunk bed one evening as other men came and went. "These are people who offered us opportunities."

"They haven't committed a crime," said a Nicaraguan named Mario who sat next to him. He is 39, and fixed pallets at IFCO for 30 cents apiece. "At least," he added, "it's not a crime to me."

Growing Demand For English Lessons Outstrips Supply (NYT)

By Fernanda Santos

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

MOUNT VERNON, N.Y. — Two weeks after she moved here from her native Brazil, Maria de Oliveira signed up for free English classes at a squat storefront in this working-class suburb, figuring that with an associate's degree and three years as an administrative assistant, she could find a good job in America so long as she spoke the language.

The woman who runs the classes at Mount Vernon's Workforce and Career Preparation Center added Ms. Oliveira's name to her pink binder, at the bottom of a 90-person waiting list that stretched across seven pages. That was in October. Ms. Oliveira, 26, finally got a seat in the class on Jan. 16.

"I keep wondering how much more I'd know if I hadn't had to wait so long," she said in Portuguese.

As immigrants increasingly settle away from large urban centers — New York's suburbs have had a net gain of 225,000 since 2000, compared with 44,000 in the city — many are waiting months or even years to get into government-financed English classes, which are often overcrowded and lack textbooks.

A survey last year by the National Association of Latino Elected and Appointed Officials found that in 12 states, 60 percent of the free English programs had waiting lists, ranging from a few months in Colorado and Nevada to as long as two years in New Mexico and Massachusetts, where the statewide list has about 16,000 names.

The United States Department of Education counted 1.2 million adults enrolled in public English programs in 2005 — about 1 in 10 of the 10.3 million foreign-born residents 16 and older who speak English "less than very well," or not at all, according to census figures from the same year. Federal money for such classes is matched at varying rates from state to state, leaving an uneven patchwork of programs that advocates say nowhere meets the need.

"We have a lot of folks who need these services and who go unserved," said Claudia Merkel-Keller of the New Jersey Department of Labor and Workforce Development, noting that her state has waiting lists in every county, "from beginner all the way through proficient level." New Jersey, like New York and many other states, does not keep statewide figures on how many people are on waiting lists.

Luis Sanchez, 47, a Peruvian truck driver for a beer distributor in New Brunswick, has been in this country 10 years — and on the waiting list for English classes in Perth Amboy five months. "You live from day to day, waiting to get the call that you can come to class," Mr. Sanchez said in Spanish, explaining that he knew a little English but wanted to improve his writing skills so he could apply for better jobs. "I keep on waiting."

Mr. Sanchez is unlikely to get the call soon: Perth Amboy's Adult Education Center recently discovered that it was operating in the red and canceled 9 of its 11 evening classes in English as a second language, including all at beginner and intermediate levels. In Orange County, N.Y., where the immigrant population doubled in the past 16 years, the Board of Cooperative Education Services' adult education program has stopped advertising for fear its already overflowing beginner classes will be overwhelmed.

In Framingham, Mass., 20 miles west of Boston, hundreds of people used to spend the night in line to register for English as a second language, so the program now selects students by picking handwritten names from a big plastic box.

"With the lottery, everyone has the same chance," said Christine Taylor Tibor, director of Framingham's Adult E.S.L. Plus program. "Unfortunately, you might have to enter the lottery several times before you get in."

Census figures show that in the United States there were 32.6 million foreign-born residents 18 years or older in 2005, up about 18 percent from the 27.5 million counted in 2000 (and nearly twice the 17.1 million in 1990). Federal spending on adult education, about $580 million last year, has increased 23 percent since 2000 and more than tripled since 1990; some 45 percent of the money is devoted to English.

But financing varies widely across the states, which are required to allocate at least one quarter of what was provided by the federal government: Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, South Dakota and Texas spent the minimum in 2003, according to the Education Department, while California and Connecticut each spent about seven times that.

In New York, the state Education Department added $76 million to the federal government's $43 million for the 2005 fiscal year. That year, according to a recent report by the Center for an Urban Future, a nonprofit research group based in Manhattan, there were about 86,500 people enrolled in government-sponsored adult programs for English as a second language, serving about 5 percent of the state's 1.6 million adults with limited English skills.

Last fall, Arizona voters approved an initiative banning illegal immigrants from benefiting from all state-financed programs, including English instruction; administrators of English-as-a-second-language classes in several other states said they do not check for documentation when registering students and thus do not know how many of them may be in the country illegally.

Advocates for more English classes say the state-federal financing split leaves an adult education system whose quality and reach vary widely from place to place — and is lacking most everywhere. Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, where the immigrant population has tripled since 1990, largely because of an influx of Mexicans, sponsored a bill last year that would have given legal immigrants $500 vouchers to pay for English classes since so many of the free ones were full.

"Most education policy is the prerogative of state and local governments, but I would argue that the prerogative to help people learn our common language is a federal responsibility," said Senator Alexander, a Republican who was education secretary under the first President George Bush. "If we make it easier for people to learn English, they will learn it. I think that ought to be a priority of our government, and I don't think it has been."

The government-financed classes are most often run by school districts or worker training centers and generally require only a registration fee of perhaps $10. Libraries, churches and community centers often also provide free or inexpensive classes, like the English Language Institute at Westchester Community College in Valhalla, N.Y., which offers nine levels of instruction for $76 to $247 per three-month session. Then there are private programs like the one at Pace University in Pleasantville, N.Y., which costs $790 for two classes a week for 14 weeks.

With immigrants accounting for half of the growth in the nation's labor force from 1990 and 2000, and expected to make up all of the growth in the two decades to come, "the issue of English proficiency has become an issue of economic development," said Tara Colton, the author of the Center for an Urban Future report. Indeed, some business owners, frustrated at the lack of low-cost classes, have begun teaching immigrants English at work.

At Skyline Furniture Manufacturing Inc. in Thornton, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, about half of the company's 60 employees have learned English at the factory over the past five years, under a state program in which the government pays to bring teachers to work sites if companies pay workers for the hours in class.

"It makes sense to us because our workers can do their jobs better, and it makes sense to them because they can advance in their jobs," said Cinthia Nowakowski, the plant's manager, adding that three of the company's eight foremen were promoted after completing the program. "Besides, it's convenient. The guys don't have to worry about having to arrange transportation to get to school or getting there and finding that there's no room in the class."

In Newburgh, N.Y., an Orange County town where one in five of the 29,000 residents are immigrants, Blanca Saravia has amassed an impressive portfolio of odd jobs since arriving from Honduras in 2004: gas station attendant, office janitor, cook's helper, and, for the last 14 months, packager at a local nail-polish factory. Speaking in her native Spanish, Ms. Saravia said that she has been able to get by with co-workers' translating, but that "when the boss gives orders, I don't understand."

So earlier this month, Ms. Saravia joined 30 others in a cramped classroom learning to conjugate the verb "to be" as part of the adult English program in Orange County, where the immigrant population doubled in the last decade — and the number of free English classes has jumped to 26 from 2 in 1995.

"If I tell her, 'We're full, come back in a couple of months,' chances are she'll get discouraged and never come back," said Ramón Santos, who runs the Newburgh program.

Carl DeJura, director of adult basic education at Brookdale Community College in Long Branch, N.J., said he has lately crammed as many as 40 students into a class — "double what it should be."

"If you have to cut back on textbooks, supplies and materials to serve the people who need it," he said, "that's what you do."

In Mount Vernon, Haitian, Chinese, Somali, Arab, Mexican and Brazilian students flock to the beginner class each morning at 8:30 before heading out to work or to look for work. Ahmed Al Saidi, 49, who works at a gas station and moved from Yemen in 1994, said in halting English that he wants to learn the language "for better work and to talk to people when I go to the store."

Ms. Oliveira, the immigrant from Brazil, said she still knows too little English to venture into the marketplace; her husband, who is American born and supports the couple financially, encouraged her to enroll in the classes, held five mornings a week.

DOJ_NMG_0137423

"I hope that when I'm speaking a little better, I'll be able to find a job where I can use the English I learned here and the skills I have from back home," she said in Portuguese. "When I was on the waiting list, there were times I thought this time would never come."

Cashing In On Immigrants (USAT)

By Ruben Navarrette

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SAN DIEGO — Critics are still fuming over Bank of America's plan to offer credit cards to people without Social Security numbers or credit histories, characteristics common to illegal immigrants.

CNN's Lou Dobbs called it "idiotic." Roy Beck of Numbers USA, a proponent of immigration controls, accused Bank of America of "unpatriotic greed." Callers on talk radio have suggested the company change its name to "Bank of Mexico." Syndicated columnist Michelle Malkin argued that the company is defying federal immigration law by "aiding and abetting illegal activity." Funny thing. I've had credit cards for more than 20 years, and I don't remember feeling aided and abetted. Preyed upon, maybe.

This circus is not what Javier Palomarez expected. The advertising veteran has spent nearly 20 years helping Fortune 500 companies tap the Hispanic market. In 2002, he was working for Bank of America as senior vice president of marketing when he proposed the idea. It's perfectly legal and logical.

The bank was already experimenting with its SafeSend program, which allows immigrants who open a checking account in the United States to transfer money to a bank in Mexico where it can be retrieved by a third party. Bank of America also offers mortgages for immigrants. Palomarez argued that credit cards were the next step. Not everyone in the company was sold, however, which could explain why it took several years to bring the idea to fruition. Some bank executives feared that illegal immigrants were bad credit risks. "That was the debate," Palomarez told me recently in an interview. "And additionally, the idea was, you know, it's still too close to 9/11."

Not this again. Let's not confuse terrorists with immigrants. Here's a tip on how to keep the two groups straight: One wants to do us harm; the other wants to do our cooking, gardening and child care.

The distinction escapes Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., an anti-immigrant demagogue. Tancredo fears Bank of America might unwittingly give credit to a terrorist. Get real. According to Palomarez, credit limits for illegal immigrants would be about $500. The 9/11 hijackers ran through tens of thousands of dollars in planning the attacks.

I wish critics would give the scare tactics a rest and come clean about what really bugs them: The fear that Americans are getting comfortable with illegal immigration and the concern that initiatives like this will take the steam out of enforcement efforts by making immigrants seem less threatening.

As for this being a giveaway, Palomarez says it was never any such thing. "There is a ton of money to be made," he said. Consider the interest rate. "Just imagine the worst there are," Palomarez said. "Twenty-one percent and up." Immigrants will pay it, he said, because they're grateful to have the card and to build up credit histories.

That's exactly where Bank of America landed — on an interest rate that can top 21%, which is higher than most people pay. As for the claim that illegal immigrants don't pay their bills, Palomarez disagrees. "These people went through a lot of trouble and expense and risk to get here," he said. "They didn't come here to mess it up."

But getting a credit card into the hands of a Latino is only half the battle. You still have to get him to use it. "We were raised that, you know what, if you can't buy it (with) cash, you can't afford it," he said. "That whole mentality hasn't left us yet as a culture."

So how does Bank of America hope to get illegal immigrants hooked on credit? We had millions of dollars worth of campaigns in place dedicated solely to the guy who got the card and hasn't used it," Palomarez said. "Mailers congratulating him on receiving his Bank of America credit card and reminding him of the benefits that the card afforded him, blah, blah, blah. … We knew what buttons to push."

How would they know? "If you've got a guy's debit card, or even his checking account, and you get activity on it, you have such robust data," he said, "because you are in his wallet."

Palomarez is no longer with Bank of America, but he still wants to be in your wallet. Now based in Dallas, he aims to get in there again with his latest venture — a pre-paid debit card, which he and his associates hope will revolutionize how Hispanics (particularly immigrants) handle remittances, purchases and ATM withdrawals. Other companies are doing the same.

It's an interesting idea. But it's not like immigrants are clamoring for debit cards, any more than they're demanding credit cards. That's the whole point. This controversy should dispel the myth that illegal immigrants come here with outstretched palms.

Credit cards aren't freebies, and it isn't immigrants who demand them. These things come along because someone wants to cash in. As with bilingual education and beer sales, this isn't something that is being done for illegal immigrants; it's something that is being done to illegal immigrants. It's such an obvious point that you'd have to be blind not to see it. Of course, fear and nativism have been known to cause a lack of vision in people.

Game With No Winner (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

It's almost enough to make us nostalgic for streaking and sitting on flagpoles. College students from Michigan to Florida have found a new way to get attention, offend others and make a right-wing statement all at once. It's a game with a name that says it all: "Catch the Illegal Immigrant."

The game is a variation on hide and seek: one player poses as the immigrant, and everyone else tries to find that person. There's a prize, usually $200 or less, which is not much, but enough to celebrate the cheap exploitation of a fellow human.

"Catch the Immigrant" is the brainchild of an intern with the College Republican National Committee, who lost her post after coming up with this and other campus recruitment gimmicks. Another game, called "Fun With Guns," invited young Republicans to fire BB guns or paint balls at cardboard cutouts of Democratic leaders. Republican Party leaders have tried to distance themselves from the games, but seem to have done little to stop them.

The right-wing organizers of the immigrant games — particularly Young Americans for Freedom and Young Republicans — have declared piously that they're just trying to spark debate. At that, they have succeeded. Protesters defending immigration and human dignity have outnumbered the game's players at the University of Michigan, Michigan State, Pennsylvania State and other campuses, including, most recently, at New York University.

The reaction from schools has been mostly tepid. Administrators are in a tough spot, trying to balance free speech with offensive behavior. More speech is the answer, including voices of authority pointing out the nastiness of this game as well as the inherent cruelty of hunting people for sport.

"Catch the Immigrant" also reflects a larger misunderstanding of the immigration issue. The more than 11 million illegal immigrants cannot be caught. Even if they could be, rounding them up and deporting them would be disastrous, economically and socially. Educators should teach the game players about the real world.

Minuteman Founder Wants Reins Back (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson

The Los Angeles Times, February 26, 2007

Jim Gilchrist, the Orange County accountant who gained national recognition as the co-founder of a citizen border patrol group, will ask a judge this afternoon to issue a restraining order in order to regain control of the Minuteman Project.

Earlier this month, Gilchrist was removed by his board of directors, which accused the charismatic anti-illegal-immigrant figure of abusing his power. Minuteman Project officials said they will detail their allegations at a press conference later this afternoon.

The rift, Gilchrist said, "could very well bring an end to the entire Minuteman Project. There are groups around the country with the name, but we are the most well known and the most powerful."

Gilchrist said he did nothing wrong. His opponents, he said, are motivated by "a greed for power and a false perception of an endless stream of money."

He said he plans to continue his work, which began in 2005 with a citizen border patrol that gained widespread media attention and a criticism from President Bush, who called them "vigilantes."

Robert Vasquez — a former county commissioner in Idaho who, in his elected position, sued companies that hired illegal workers — said top conservative leaders turned against Gilchrist. Among them is Barbara Coe, who heads California Coalition for Immigration Reform and co-authored Proposition 187, the ballot measure that sought to deny undocumented immigrants certain public benefits.

"Sometimes a position becomes bigger than the man," Vasquez said. "It's unfortunate that it has reached this point."

Gilchrist opponents filed a complaint against their former leader with the Internal Revenue Service, alleging that he did not obtain nonprofit status for the Minuteman organization and improperly used a discount postal rate to solicit donations.

Gilchrist said a direct mail organization was responsible to secure the nonprofit status and if it hadn't, it didn't amount to a criminal error on his part.

Board members voted to replace Gilchrist with Marvin Stewart, an African American minister. Gilchrist said the board members have no voting power and serve in an advisory capacity.

Semi-Truths (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

It's nice the U.S. government is finally getting around to meeting its obligations under a trade pact with Mexico ratified a mere 14 years ago. But even that is too fast for some protectionists.

Under the North American Free Trade Agreement, the U.S. was required to lift a ban on Mexican trucks traveling more than 25 miles inside the border. The deadline for doing so was 2000, yet seven years later the ban remains in place. Hence, when Mexican trucks reach the mileage limit, they must off-load and transfer the goods to American trucks, which carry them to their ultimate destination. You can understand why the Teamsters who represent American drivers favor this arrangement, however inefficient, but U.S. consumers pick up the tab.

Last week, the Bush Administration announced a plan to lift the mileage restriction, and unions and their supporters in Congress are predictably crying foul. Rather than acknowledging their protectionist agenda, opponents are raising bogus concerns linked to the supposedly poor "safety" record of Mexican rigs. Teamster President James Hoffa told reporters the Administration is "playing a game of Russian roulette on America's highways." Democratic Senator Patty Murray of Washington says she'll hold hearings.

If these arguments sound familiar, it's because Mr. Hoffa also used them in 2001, when the Bush Administration first tried to lift the mileage restriction to comply with Nafta. Oregon Representative Peter DeFazio warned that there would be "blood on the highway." And David Obey of Wisconsin intoned that "Nafta is a trade pact. It's not a suicide pact."

That hyperbole is just as phony now. It's common practice, both here and south of the border, to use older vehicles to travel short distances. And there's no evidence that Mexican long-haul trucks and drivers are more dangerous than their U.S. counterparts. The latest data show the safety records of the U.S. and Mexico are comparable.

According to the Transportation Department, 32% of Mexican trucks were pulled from the road for safety violations in 2001. Last year that number fell to 21%. Meanwhile, 21% of U.S. trucks failed safety inspections in 2001, versus 23% last year. Mexican drivers are less likely than their U.S. counterparts to be in violation of the law -- 1.2% in 2006, versus 7% for U.S. truckers.

A prohibition on Mexican trucks traveling more than a few miles into the U.S. has resulted in more congestion and pollution at the border. It also means that more investment is going toward shipping items from Point A to Point B than is necessary. Lifting the ban and giving these vehicles full access to the U.S. will streamline the process and reduce costs.

Mexican businesses have no incentive to send rickety trucks north of the border only to break down before reaching their destination. And behaving as if they do -- in order to mask an antitrade agenda -- is no way to treat a neighbor.

TAX:

Orem Man Sentenced In Federal Tax Fraud Case (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

SALT LAKE CITY An Orem accountant who bilked the government out of millions in taxes from money he garnered through phony investment schemes has been sentenced to five years in federal prison, the U.S. Department of Justice said Monday.

Lanny R. White was also ordered by U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart to pay $5 million in restitution and spend three years on supervised probation following his release.

White was indicted in 2003 along with 10 others for promoting and selling a fraudulent trust scheme through six phony investment companies between 1993 and 2004. More than 300 clients were told that placing their assets into the trusts would reduce tax liabilities.

All of the 11 indicted – among them four attorneys, one accountant and a former IRS agent – have pleaded guilty to felony charges including wire and mail fraud.

In a plea agreement White said his actions led to the filing of more than 2,000 false and fraudulent income tax and trust tax returns. White also said he knowingly placed clients money in unsound investments that would never pay returns.

The loss to the government is estimated between $7 million and $10 million.

Appraisers' Valuations For Tax Filings Come Under Microscope With New Law (WSJ)

By Arden Dale

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

It may soon become trickier to get an item appraised for tax purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0137426

The Pension Protection Act, passed in August, puts appraisers in the sights of the Internal Revenue Service by saying they can be penalized for valuations the agency later decides are off the mark.

The move marks a big change because taxpayers, not appraisers, historically have borne the brunt of a wrong valuation. One result: The cost of getting something appraised may well rise.

Appraisals are used for a number of purposes in tax filings. For instance, noncash assets donated to charity are often appraised so the donor can claim the value as a deduction on his income-tax return and lower his tax bill.

Examples might be an individual who donates to charity a share in a private company that is expected to go public later, or a business that gives a conservation easement to a local government by agreeing not to develop its real estate but to maintain the property for conservation purposes instead.

Now, the PPA has introduced penalties on appraisers, but they aren't alone in facing the music. Accountants, brokers, estate executors and others may also be slapped because of the broad brush with which it was written.

The rule is beginning to have a chilling effect on appraisers because it raises a host of questions, including which kind of tax -- gift and estate tax, income tax, or both -- is affected, and who may be hit by penalties.

The American Bar Association Section of Real Property, Probate and Trust Law have urged the IRS to clear up a number of uncertainties in the rule, which is included in Internal Revenue Code Section 6695A.

The IRS is reviewing these and other comments on the matter and plans to publish regulations later to spell out details of the law, according to an IRS spokesman.

"I've heard indirectly that some appraisers are holding back in terms of doing income- and estate-tax appraisals, or that they're limiting the scope of appraisals," says William Forsberg, a partner at Parsinen Kaplan Rosberg + Gotlieb P.A. in Minneapolis, and co-author of the ABA group comments.

Code Section 6695A simply refers to "any person" as being subject to the penalties. It's not clear whether the rule could extend beyond an appraiser to include, say, an attorney hired by the appraiser to opine on whether an entity is a limited partnership, for example.

"It's the uncertainty as to the exposure that's so troubling," says Hugh Drake, an attorney at Brown, Hay & Stephens LLP in Springfield, Ill. "Appraisers often have to rely on underlying opinions...where does liability begin and end?"

'Living Souls' Admit To Tax Evasion In Plea Deal (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 27, 2007

After months in jail, Sevier millionaire couple drops exempt defense

Maybe it was newfound enlightenment.

Perhaps it was skillful attorneys joining their side.

Or, it might have been a jail cell that did it.

Whatever the cause, a Sevier County couple who made millions in real estate ventures but insisted they were "living souls" and not U.S. citizens subject to income tax laws dropped their tax protestation convictions Monday and picked up tax evasion convictions instead.

Arnold Ray Schmid and his wife, Kathleen Schmid, pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court to charges that they refused to file income tax returns on money made from their highly profitable cabin rental and property development businesses for at least three years.

In a plea deal brokered between defense attorneys Richard Gaines and Ralph Harwell and federal prosecutor Jay Nanavati, the Schmids are admitting to a negotiated figure of $53,780 as the tax liability owed the government. The actual figure is likely much higher, according to court records.

The deal also will cut the potential prison terms both faced from years to months. As Gaines noted during Monday's hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Leon Jordan, the couple may already have served, if not the entirety of their respective sentences, then the bulk of them.

It's not as if they didn't earn that pretrial jail time, however. The couple had been allowed free on bond - despite repeated courtroom antics and protests and missed hearings - after their July 2005 arrests on federal tax evasion charges.

But they fled, hiding out for months in the Midwest before the U.S. Marshals Service rounded them up after a probe led by veteran fugitive hunter Deputy U.S. Marshal Becky Gambill.

In the couple's car, marshals found signs that the pair's courtroom antics and strange court filings in which they called themselves "living souls" and contended the government had no dominion over them may have been tactics to avoid prosecution, according to an earlier motion filed by Nanavati.

"In their car were handwritten notes in the defendants' handwriting that read, among things, 'pros and cons of leaving country or just stay in country but move around' (and) 'will they be watching airports?' (and) 'any problems in Venezuela government, are Americans well accepted' (and) 'whenever judge speaks to you pretend that he is speaking Chinese' and 'how do you get money out of the country,' " Nanavati wrote.

It was, ironically, tax deadline day - April 15, 2006 - when the pair were returned to Knoxville and ordered jailed pending Monday's trial. They had been behind bars ever since.

On Monday, however, Jordan agreed to release them despite their earlier flight. Gaines' contention that the two are senior citizens with health problems who already have spent 10 months in jail was a factor, the judge said. Nanavati, a Washington, D.C.-based U.S. Department of Justice tax evasion prosecution specialist, did not resist the move.

"I am going to require electronic monitoring," Jordan said. "I am going to increase your bond. I assure you, if you run again, this court will have no mercy on you."

It's not clear why the government struck a deal in the case. Last Thursday, however, Jordan dealt the prosecution team a blow when he barred them from using the Schmids' notes at trial or making any mention to jurors of the pair's flight to avoid prosecution.

They face sentencing May 24.

IRS To The Rescue (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

It's not often that the Internal Revenue Service plays the hero, but these days it's a regular Clark Kent for American expatriates. The agency has issued another round of tax relief for U.S. citizens working abroad hit by Congress's double-taxation laws.

Friday's Notice 2007-25 strikes a blow against a provision in last year's omnibus tax bill that cut tax exemptions on housing for Americans working overseas and substantially raised taxes on compensation above $82,500. The move came courtesy of Republican Senator Chuck Grassley, who apparently thinks Americans abroad are living the high life. Congress claims the tax will raise $2.1 billion for Uncle Sam over the next decade. But that doesn't factor in companies that will cut back on U.S. employees in favor of less expensive locals or third-country hires.

The IRS mitigated some of the damage in October, bumping up tax exemptions on housing in more than 100 specified cities. In the latest notice, Americans working in China and India will see the biggest benefit; special exemptions were instituted for Mumbai and Beijing residents, and several cities already on the IRS's list saw their deductions adjusted upward. A clutch of suburban London towns were also added, presumably because the local American Chamber of Commerce kicked up a fuss. But why is the IRS trying to work out which Yanks live in, say, London versus Surrey?

The U.S. is the only developed nation to tax its citizens abroad. Now China has picked up on Mr. Grassley's grand idea. From March 31, all mainland citizens working abroad will be taxed on their world-wide income. That might give some comfort to U.S. protectionists worried about China's labor competitiveness, even though mainland employees aren't so far a huge force abroad. But as America is now discovering, punitive taxation is an export that comes with a high price.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Urges Governors To Back Tax Reforms (AP)

By Robert Tanner

AP, February 27, 2007

President Bush encouraged governors Monday to support his call for changing the tax code to help more people buy private health care insurance, but did not address their pleas to increase funding for a health care program that insures millions of children of the working poor.

Still, governors said they heard words of at least partial compromise from the administration on a budget dispute that dominated private discussions among governors Sunday.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the larger challenge of the uninsured. All governors rely on the State Children's Health Insurance Program, intended to aid uninsured working families.

Bush, welcoming the governors after they met privately with several administration officials, did not offer any comments about the children's health program, talking rather about his larger proposals.

"I'm looking forward to working with Congress on health care. I firmly believe ... that states are often times the best place to reform systems and work on programs that meet needs," he said.

But Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt "made it clear that the administration will work with Congress as far as" short-term shortfalls, said North Dakota Gov. John Hoeven, a Republican. Governors say 14 states could run out of cash before October. In Georgia, it could happen as soon as March.

The governors want two things:

_Enough money to keep the program afloat through October. That is estimated at $745 million.

_Changes to Bush's budget. Analysts say his spending plan would shortchange the health program even if the number of people served did not grow. The long-term shortfall is put at $10 billion to $15 billion over the next five years.

Gov. Jon Corzine, a New Jersey Democrat, warned that the administration's budget promised illusory savings. "You end up paying for this in other ways — uncompensated care, emergency rooms," Corzine said. "This is pay me now or pay me later."

Corzine said he still wanted more clarity from administration officials on support for the short-term funding, but said Leavitt had offered words of compromise.

But the long-term issues over the program remained in dispute, governors said.

The program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

More than a dozen states have expanded SCHIP, with consent of the federal government, to cover adults in those families. The program now insures an estimated 639,000 adults among its 6 million.

Many governors said the administration's efforts to scale back the program would undermine state efforts to craft universal health care plans. Many of these have started with a target of insuring all children.

California, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania have developed some of the most ambitious proposals to try to get to universal health care coverage. Most states have just tried to strengthen their health care system to cover more people.

At their private session Sunday, governors said there was bipartisan support for help on the immediate needs and a long-term commitment to the current program.

Leavitt said Sunday that there is enough money among states to cover short-term shortfalls, if states with surpluses would share with those with deficits, an idea that has little support among governors. Bush wants SCHIP to remain focused on poor children, not all children and not adults, Leavitt said.

Gov. Ed Rendell, D-Pa., said he was confident that a compromise on the money can be found. He said the administration has been helpful to his efforts to expand coverage and approved a waiver that would let the state cover 180,000 more children. "I want to give the administration high praise," he said.

But most were worried. In Rhode Island, GOP Gov. Don Carcieri said aggressive enrollment efforts had boosted their combined Medicaid and SCHIP program so that 94 percent of children were covered, at its height, before administrative hurdles and other problems caused some backsliding.

"We built all that up," Carcieri said. "We don't want to pull the rug out."

Child Health Care Splits White House And States (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Governors clashed with the White House on Monday over the future of the popular Children's Health Insurance Program, an issue that some members of both parties said was as important as money for the Iraq war.

In the session at the White House, when President Bush reported on progress of the war, governors pressed him to provide more money so they could guarantee health insurance for children. In response, administration officials said states should make better use of the money they already had.

Gov. Sonny Perdue of Georgia, a Republican, said afterward, "Health care for children ought to be a priority, irrespective of anyone's views on the war."

Georgia will exhaust its allotment of federal money for the Children's Health Insurance Program within three months, Mr. Perdue said. Thirteen other states expect to run out by September, according to data released here at the winter meeting of the National Governors Association.

Governors said the Clinton and Bush administrations had encouraged them to expand children's coverage and had granted waivers allowing them to cover parents and even some childless adults.

Having successfully expanded the health insurance programs in their states, some governors now suggest that the Bush administration is pulling the safety net out from under many children.

DOJ_NMG_0137429

In his budget this month, Mr. Bush said he wanted to return the program to its "original objective" of covering children with family incomes less than twice the poverty level. Budget documents note that 16 states cover children above that level and that "one state, New Jersey, covers children up to 350 percent of the federal poverty level."

A family of four is classified poor if its annual income is less than $20,650.

An influential member of Congress said Monday that he would not be taking up White House proposals to restrict eligibility and financing for the child health program.

"I have absolutely no intention of moving the president's proposals through our subcommittee," said the lawmaker, Representative Frank Pallone Jr., Democrat of New Jersey.

Mr. Pallone is chairman of the Health Subcommittee of the Energy and Commerce Committee, which has authority over the children's program.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Monday that "Democrats in Congress understand the urgency" of the problem and would provide money to the 14 states that did not have enough to cover their current enrollment. Although Mr. Bush would reduce federal payments for adults and for children with family incomes above 200 percent of the poverty level, Mr. Pallone said states should have discretion to cover children above 200 percent of the poverty level and adults in some circumstances, too.

"In New Jersey, we made a decision to go up to 350 percent of the poverty level, because we have the highest cost of living in the country," Mr. Pallone said.

Likewise, he said, New Jersey found that covering adults increased the likelihood that their children would stay on the rolls.

"The hallmark of all this is flexibility," Mr. Pallone said. "A robust Children's Health Insurance Program is an important part of any effort to try to achieve universal coverage."

The federal government spends $5 billion a year on the program. Mr. Bush wants to continue that level, and he is seeking an "additional allotment" of $4.8 billion over the next five years.

States would need substantially more to continue their programs with current eligibility rules and benefits. New estimates from the Congressional Budget Office show that the states face shortfalls of $700 million this year and a total shortage of $13.4 billion from 2008 to 2012.

Gov. Jim Douglas of Vermont, a Republican, said the Bush proposals would jeopardize his state's phenomenal success in covering children. In Vermont, he said, fewer than 4 percent of the children are uninsured, and "we don't want to lose ground."

Bush administration officials emphasized that states received a fixed amount of federal money each year, and they said individual children did not have a legal entitlement to benefits. Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services, said he would work with Congress to find "a short-term solution" for states exhausting their allotments this year. He said states could avoid shortfalls by managing their programs better.

In his experience as governor of Utah, Mr. Leavitt said, "when we were out of an allotment, we just discontinued enrolling people until we had room." Likewise, he said, states could cover more people if they provided less comprehensive benefits.

Gov. Ted Strickland of Ohio, a Democrat, said: "If we don't get the money we need, children will go without coverage."

"In the meeting with the president and Secretary Leavitt," Mr. Strickland said, "when questions were raised about children maybe having to be removed from the program or eligible children not being able to participate, we were told that that was basically a management problem."

Gov. Jon Corzine of New Jersey, a Democrat, said that under the president's proposals "we will end up having fewer children covered." That prospect "was chilling to some of us," Mr. Corzine said, adding that states wanted to avoid "rationing health care to our most vulnerable and our most needy."

Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, said Mr. Bush's budget request was "clearly insufficient" to continue coverage for the six million children enrolled in the program.

Many governors want to expand the program, which they see as a foundation for their efforts to expand coverage generally.

Mr. Rendell framed the issue as a choice, asking: "Should we be giving tax cuts to billionaires and millionaires or should we be giving health care to children? Should we make health care for children, at the very least, an entitlement?"

Domestic policy is in a straitjacket because of the cost of the war, the cost of tax cuts and the president's plan to balance the budget within five years, Mr. Rendell said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, a Republican, said federal aid was essential to his $12 billion plan for universal health coverage. Mr. Schwarzenegger said that in a private meeting he told the president, "We need the federal government's help." He did not say whether he got a commitment.

Governors, Critical Of Bush, Seeking More Help From Congress For Children's Health Care (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — Governors from both parties are opposing President Bush's budget for a health care program that insures millions of children of the working poor, warning that failure to meet its spending needs will inflate the already high number of uninsured.

The budget dispute dominated discussions among governors Sunday, who promised to bring the matter to Bush and his Cabinet officials at private meetings Monday.

At stake is coverage for 6 million people, overwhelmingly children, as well as the hopes of many governors in tackling the larger challenge of the uninsured. All governors rely on the State Children's Health Insurance Program, intended to aid uninsured working families.

"It's a matter of doing the right thing," said Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue, a Republican. "It's non-partisan. It's bipartisan."

Gov. Jon Corzine, a New Jersey Democrat, warned that the administration's budget promised illusory savings. "You end up paying for this in other ways — uncompensated care, emergency rooms," Corzine said. "This is pay me now or pay me later."

Georgia and New Jersey are two of 14 states that are expected to run out of money for the program before the next budget year begins in October; in Georgia, it could happen as soon as March.

The governors want two things:

_Enough money to keep the program afloat through October. That is estimated at $745 million.

_Changes to Bush's budget. Analysts say his spending plan would shortchange the health program even if the number of people served did not grow. The longterm shortfall is put at $10 billion to $15 billion over the next five years.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said he had met privately with governors, and would keep talking. But he offered little hope that the administration would accept governors' demands.

Bush welcomed the governors to a formal dinner at the White House Sunday night and said he looked forward to talking with governors about health care, along with homeland security and immigration. "I believe if we work together we can do a lot of good things," he said.

The program, approved in 1997, covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

More than a dozen states have expanded SCHIP, with consent of the federal government, to cover adults in those families. The program now insures an estimated 639,000 adults among its 6 million.

Many governors said the administration's efforts to scale back the program would undermine state efforts to craft universal health care plans. Many of these have started with a target of insuring all children.

California, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania have developed some of the most ambitious proposals to try to get to universal health care coverage. Most states have just tried to strengthen their health care system to cover more people.

At their private session Sunday, governors said there was bipartisan support for help on the immediate needs and a long-term commitment to the current program.

Leavitt said Sunday that there is enough money among states to cover short-term shortfalls, if states with surpluses would share with those with deficits, an idea that has little support among governors. Bush wants SCHIP to remain focused on poor children, not all children and not adults, Leavitt said.

Gov. Ed Rendell, D-Pa., said he was confident that a compromise on the money can be found. He said the administration has been helpful to his efforts to expand coverage and approved a waiver that would let the state cover 180,000 more children. "I want to give the administration high praise," he said.

But most were worried. In Rhode Island, GOP Gov. Don Carcieri said aggressive enrollment efforts had boosted their combined Medicaid and SCHIP program so that 94% of children were covered, at its height, before administrative hurdles and other problems caused some backsliding.

"We built all that up," Carcieri said. "We don't want to pull the rug out."

Bush Seeks Governors' Support For Health Plan (USAT)

USA Today, February 27, 2007

President Bush met with the nation's governors to encourage their support for his proposal to change the tax laws to help people buy private health insurance. He did not address their pleas for more money for a program that insures millions of children of the working poor.

DOJ_NMG_0137431

The governors say Bush's budget for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 doesn't provide enough money for the State Children's Health Insurance Program, which covers uninsured children whose families earn too much to fall under Medicaid, the joint state-federal health care service for the poor.

"You end up paying for this in other ways: uncompensated care, emergency rooms," said New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine, a Democrat.

Bush wants to encourage more Americans to buy health insurance by offering tax deductions that would be financed by a new tax on employer-provided health insurance. Families would get a standard tax deduction of $15,000 a year; individuals would get $7,500. The value of employer-provided health benefits exceeding the deduction would be taxed as income.

Former House aide guilty in bribery probe

A onetime chief of staff to former congressman Bob Ney pleaded guilty to a federal conspiracy charge stemming from a congressional bribery scandal.

William Heaton, 28, admitted accepting favors from disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff or his associates and then, in return, helping their clients. No date was set for sentencing.

Ney, R-Ohio, was sentenced in January to 2½ years in prison for trading political favors for campaign donations and personal gifts.

Journalists honor Frederick Douglass

Frederick Douglass, a runaway slave who became the first black reporter in the Capitol press galleries, was remembered Monday as a pioneering journalist who championed equal rights.

The committee of reporters that oversees the Capitol's media areas dedicated a plaque and portrait to Douglass, who was a member of the congressional press galleries from 1870-74.

Douglass came to Washington in the 1870s after he was asked to lead the New National Era, which chronicled the progress of blacks throughout the country. He later bought the newspaper after it ran into money trouble, but the enterprise collapsed in 1874 after a post-Civil War financial crisis wiped out many businesses in the city.

Bush Vows To Fight Democrats On War Funds (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

President Bush yesterday said he would take on congressional Democrats who hope to hamstring his use of war funds.

"I'm looking forward to a healthy debate. I'm also looking forward to defending, strongly defending the budgets we send up to Congress," Mr. Bush said during a morning White House speech to the National Governors Association, which is holding its annual meeting this week in the District.

The president said he wants to "make sure those troops who are in harm's way have the resources and that we have the flexibility necessary to ... execute the plan we've laid out."

Mr. Bush later spoke at the Republican Governors Association gala, which raised $10.4 million for the group, telling a crowd of several hundred at the National Building Museum last night that "failure in Iraq is unacceptable."

"Soon the United States Congress will have to make a decision that will have real consequences -- whether or not to fund the troops we have sent into harm's way," Mr. Bush said.

Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, Kansas Democrat and chairman of the Democratic Governors' Association, will appear today with Senate Democrats to criticize "an escalation policy that is stretching the National Guard to the limit."

House Democratic leaders have said they plan to restrain the president's use of war funds by attaching restrictions to appropriations bills, starting with the supplemental-funding bill next month.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat and chairman of the House Appropriations defense subcommittee, announced his plan to bar funding for Mr. Bush's Iraq troop surge, unless the military meets certain requirements on training and equipment that Mr. Murtha said it could not.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, have indicated that they favor Mr. Murtha's plan to the more drastic approach of cutting off funding all together.

Republicans have labeled the Murtha plan a "slow-bleed strategy" and have said it will deprive U.S. troops of needed reinforcements and funding.

House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, yesterday called on Mrs. Pelosi to reject Mr. Murtha's plan.

Senate Democrats, meanwhile, have indicated that they favor repealing the 2002 authorization of force and writing one that would withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq by spring 2008 and would limit remaining troops to noncombat missions. Democratic Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Carl Levin of Michigan are expected to announce the details of their plan today.

DOJ_NMG_0137432

However, Republicans have said that doing so would be "micromanaging" the war, and the White House has argued that the 2002 authorization still applies to the current conflict.

Mr. Bush acknowledged that many doubt the need for a continued U.S. presence in Iraq, during his morning speech to both Democratic and Republican governors.

"Obviously, there's concerns about the decisions I have made regarding Iraq, and I understand that," Mr. Bush said. "But you've just got to understand ... if we leave Iraq before the job is done, the enemy will follow us here."

O'Malley: Governors' Concerns Not Addressed (BSUN)

By David Nitkin

The Baltimore Sun, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON // Gov. Martin O'Malley sat tight-lipped through a White House meeting with President Bush Monday and later criticized the president, saying he spent more time defending the administration's Iraq policy than addressing concerns about health care and immigration raised by the nation's governors.

O'Malley, who has been attending his first meeting of the National Governors Association since being elected governor, participated in two hours of morning meetings with Bush Cabinet officials, followed by a half-hour session with the president. Only the association's chairwoman, Gov. Janet Napolitano, an Arizona Democrat; and the vice chairman, Gov. Tim Pawlenty, a Republican from Minnesota, questioned Bush directly.

"President Bush answered each of them, and went back to vamping for about 15 or 20 minutes as to why he is exactly right in what he is doing with the decisions he has made to get us into Iraq and to escalate the war," O'Malley said. "What is the word we use now? Surge?"

O'Malley, a Democrat and former Baltimore mayor, criticized the Republican administration before becoming governor last month.

During remarks at a fundraiser for Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry in 2004, O'Malley drew rebukes after he said, "As mayor of the city, I was very, very worried about al-Qaida and still am. But I'm even more worried about the actions and inactions of the Bush administration."

In February 2005, O'Malley said Bush's budget was an attack on U.S. cities similar to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

O'Malley did thank the White House, however, for allowing him to take his daughter, Grace, to a state dinner Sunday night. His wife, Katie Curran O'Malley, did not attend.

The governors meeting, which ends today, has focused on education, immigration and, in particular, health care. A program that combines federal and state money to provide health insurance for children will expire this year, and governors want the program extended. Napolitano, Pawlenty and others sent the president a letter Monday requesting also that more money be available for states that will overspend their allotments this year.

Bush has proposed reducing the scope of the program so that it concentrates on only the neediest children -- those in families earning two times the federal poverty level. In Maryland, O'Malley is pushing for legislation that goes in the opposite direction, covering children in families that earn four times the poverty level.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday that the president's health care plan gives states money from a different source -- a proposal called Affordable Choices -- to continue covering wealthier children. "We believe in flexibility, too," Snow said.

But many health care analysts say the president's budget plan would remove children from the health insurance program because it contains insufficient funds.

The topic came up at the White House, but "they seem pretty rigid, and they seem pretty inflexible," O'Malley said.

In addition to defending his decisions on Iraq, Bush talked about immigration, the No Child Left Behind education law and alternative fuels.

Analysis: Health Reform Unites, Divides (UPI)

By Olga Pierce

United Press International, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 (UPI) -- Nine out of 10 Americans want healthcare reform, but they are divided over how much, what kind, and who they trust to do it, a new UPI/Zogby poll says.

As campaign season begins to pick up steam, an equal percentage of respondents, 45 percent, said they supported major reform and minor reform. They were similarly split between wanting market-based and government-based solutions.

Less than one-third said they trust President Bush to handle healthcare issues, but the Democratic Congress, at 45 percent, did not have the trust of a majority of voters either. One in five of those surveyed said they do not trust either of them.

What that means, many experts say, is that successful reform proposals will reach across the political spectrum to incorporate both government and private-sector reforms.

"People want change, they just don't agree about it," Harvard health policy professor Robert Blendon told United Press International.

"The momentum for reform is not enough to make something happen," he said. "There has to be a hybrid proposal and political leadership.

"They're not wedded to the way experts and parties have defined the debate."

The poll's results support that theory: 56 percent of those surveyed said they support a plan enacted in Massachusetts and a similar proposal in California that require individuals, the government and employers to all chip in to cover the uninsured.

While the public will not support purely government-funded reforms, Blendon said, they are also not enthused about Bush's plans to lower costs through tax reforms and greater consumer responsibility. That is because they are concerned about the "pocketbook issue" of being able to afford insurance, not the broader social problem of rising overall healthcare costs.

"Consumers are saying, 'Help me pay for healthcare,' not, 'Give me a plan with a $2,000 deductible to hold down healthcare costs,'" Blendon added. People see Bush's proposal as a "smaller vision in a world that's about to have a larger debate. Republicans are likely in 2008 to talk more broadly than just the president's plan."

The division between those who prefer government-based and market-based plans is not new, said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, a healthcare consumer advocacy group.

What is new is the willingness to compromise, he told UPI, as evidenced by unlikely coalitions of labor unions, employer groups, insurance companies and healthcare provider associations to cover the uninsured.

"People have found virtue in a second-favorite approach rather than nothing. Before, every group came in with a top-priority proposal, and if it wasn't possible, they walked away from the table."

The poll data also obscure an area of remarkable consensus, he said, around making sure all children have health insurance -- an issue Congress will have to address this year when the State Children's Health Insurance Program comes up for reauthorization.

That new spirit of compromise, however, may not make it into the next election, Pollack said.

"During the campaign season is not the time when you get thoughtful compromise. You try to attract and motivate different constituents.

"But concern about healthcare has been catapulted to the top of the agenda. Any thoughtful candidate who wins will have to do something that involves a mix of approaches to get reform through Congress."

The public's range of opinion, combined with the upcoming election season, could also open up an opportunity for voters to learn more about the various plans on the table, James T. Kahn, professor of health policy at the University of California, San Francisco, told UPI.

"The new crew of politicians have an option to look at everything on the table and see what works best. This is a chance to act on the flexibility the public is giving them," Kahn said.

"There is an educational process even in the politically charged election season. The public wants to know whatever choice there is will make them do as well or better."

The downside of election season is that some groups may try to sway the public away from the center, he said. "These policies are hard to understand, and political groups may try to influence the public one way or the other."

Bush Launches Fundraising Campaign (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, February 27, 2007

Returning to campaign mode, President Bush on Monday began his fundraising drive to help Republicans regain the power they lost less than four months ago.

"My political agenda is this: more Republican governors, take back control of the House and the Senate and make sure we keep the White House in 2008," Bush told cheering donors at a private reception for the Republican Governors Association.

The annual event raised a record $10.4 million for GOP gubernatorial candidates.

Bush said Republicans belong to "the party of ideas" and predicted voters would come back if they see results. "That's how we got the majority, and that's what it's going to take to get the majority back — standing on principle," Bush said.

Voters last November put Democrats in control of the House and Senate, weakening Bush's ability to push through legislation. The 2006 election also saw Republican governors lose the majority of governorships they had held since 1994.

Bush, despite sagging popularity, still raised more than $193 million at about 90 events in the last election season. His final fundraising chapter as president continues Friday with an event in Kentucky for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

DOJ_NMG_0137434

In his 25-minute speech at the cavernous National Building Museum, Bush energetically defended his agenda. "I'm proud of our foreign policy," Bush said. "And for the next two years, I will conduct it with all my soul, with all my might, because I believe it's in the best interests of the United States of America."

The president again warned Congress not to try to cut off funding for troops in Iraq or limit his military options.

The House has already passed a nonbinding measure to oppose Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq, although Senate Republicans recently thwarted two Democratic attempts to pass such a resolution in that chamber.

"Our men and women in uniform risk their lives to carry out our plan to support this new democracy and to secure Baghdad," Bush said. "And wherever members may stand on my decision, we have a solemn responsibility to give our troops the resources and the flexibility they need to prevail."

Republican governors have mostly been supportive of Bush, who was once part of their ranks. But some have acknowledged concern about the war's impact. And most have joined with Democrats to complain about potential Bush budget cuts on Medicaid, education and homeland security, as well as a reliance on the National Guard.

Lawmakers To Scrutinize Walter Reed (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Several House and Senate committees will begin oversight hearings into how Walter Reed Army Medical Center subjected wounded soldiers and Marines to bureaucratic indifference and allowed them to live in squalor.

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), chairman of the Defense Appropriations subcommittee and a leading critic of the Iraq war, has scheduled a closed hearing on Friday and Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), an Oversight and Government Reform subcommittee chairman, announced yesterday that he intended to conduct a field hearing to Walter Reed next Monday.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has planned a hearing for the following day and the House Armed Services Committee is also planning an oversight hearing.

The Washington Post reported earlier this month on the deplorable conditions at Walter Reed. For example, a soldier accepted a Purple Heart in his gym clothes because the Army did not replace his torn uniform; soldiers have had to prove that they fought in Iraq; and some wounded soldiers have lived in substandard housing.

The reports drew bipartisan condemnation from Defense Secretary Robert Gates and lawmakers.

“It probably didn’t occur to my colleagues that you should do a physical inspection of the building,” Tierney said, adding that he has requested documents and government reports and plans to interview social workers, families, administrators and troops to understand “how these things came to be, why didn’t they know earlier.”

The hearings could foreshadow Democratic tactics as they craft a budget resolution and political message to keep President Bush on the defensive for his conduct of the war in Iraq and, more specifically, over a $2 billion proposed cut to veterans’ healthcare. Democrats will also make the point that pre- and post-war planning has been inadequate.

A Washington Post-ABC News poll found that Americans trust Democrats by a 54-34 percent margin to handle the Iraq war. Democrats have slipped seven points in the past month, while the number of Americans who have no confidence in either party shot up five points.

“This reflects a culture of disregard, almost contempt for the men and women in the military. My view is that the same lack of planning in the run-up to the war is being repeated,” said Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.), who called for hearings shortly after the news reports appeared.

“Congress is going to jump all over this … Whoever is responsible for this debacle at Building 18 — their heads should roll,” Welch said, referring to a deteriorating Army-owned residence that housed wounded soldiers.

Welch was among the first group of lawmakers to call for hearings last week when he sent a letter to Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.).

Tierney took the initiative and told Waxman in a letter yesterday that he intended to hold a hearing on March 5 at Walter Reed.

“This is an investigative first hearing so that we can eventually unwind this thing so that systemic changes can be made,” Tierney said.

An e-mail and phone call to Walter Reed’s public affairs office were not returned. A spokeswoman for Murtha said he would conduct a press conference later this week, but for now he was not speaking to reporters.

Rep. Harry Mitchell (D-Ariz.), who is scheduled to visit wounded soldiers from Arizona at Walter Reed on Friday, proposed holding a joint hearing with House Armed Services Oversight subcommittee Chairman Marty Meehan (D-Mass.).

Mitchell and Meehan spoke after Meehan returned from a six-day visit to Iraq, Jordan, Kuwait and Brussels, Belgium. But the full committee had decided to conduct a hearing, said an aide to Meehan.

DOJ_NMG_0137435

The big question for lawmakers is how to get answers about why so many Army leaders were unaware of the conditions at the hospital.

For Welch, the Iraq war has hit home hard: Vermont has the highest per-capita death toll of any state, in part because it has one of the highest enlistment rates in the National Guard.

He visited a Veterans Affairs clinic yesterday in Colchester, Vt., and found the conditions were clean and the services adequate. Welch said that most of the complaints he has heard have been minor ones.

A Firsthand Report On The Wounds Of War (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 26 -- At the moment of impact, when the roadside bomb sent shrapnel and rocks hurtling into his face, Bob Woodruff says, "I saw my body floating below me, kind of a whiteness."

"Am I alive?" the ABC anchor asked the crew accompanying him in the Iraqi tank 13 months ago.

He was, but just barely.

When Woodruff awoke from a 36-day coma, he couldn't remember his brothers' names, couldn't even remember that he had twin 6-year-old daughters. The top of the right side of his head was missing, after surgeons were forced to remove part of his skull.

By contrast, the man who met reporters here Monday was upbeat, lucid and funny, if still unable to fully comprehend what happened. "In so many ways it's a miracle," Woodruff said.

He was, like any journalist, determined to tell his story. But in an hour-long special that airs Tuesday night at 10, Woodruff does more than that. He visits with Iraq veterans who also suffered traumatic brain injuries, documents their painfully slow progress and accuses the Pentagon of withholding information about how widespread these debilitating wounds have become.

Woodruff's reporting packs an emotional punch because he is, quite simply, a man who cheated death. Never before had an anchor for an American broadcast network been injured in war. Woodruff instantly became a symbol of the dangers that journalists face in Iraq, and is trying to use his higher profile to illuminate the plight of soldiers who struggle with these injuries far from the spotlight.

When he talks to these men, when he calls them "brother," when he hugs their loved ones, the bond is unmistakable.

Woodruff, 45, is launching a multimedia campaign that includes appearances Tuesday with Oprah Winfrey and on "Good Morning America," and the release of a book ("In an Instant") written with his wife, Lee, about their ordeal.

Lee Woodruff is the emotional heart of the television special as she recalls, in a narrative punctuated by home video, talking to doctors about her husband's condition. "I remember asking if he was going to be blind or deaf, and they didn't know," she says.

Each day, she says, she tried to "calibrate how much hope I was going to have that day." Before Bob came out of the coma, she worried that he would not recognize her. "Will he still love me?" Lee recalls asking a doctor.

After a screening of the program Monday, Bob Woodruff said: "Every time I see my wife crying, it kills me a little bit."

In January 2006, Woodruff, a lawyer who had switched to journalism in hopes of becoming a foreign correspondent, had just begun as co-anchor, with Elizabeth Vargas, of ABC's "World News." The plan was for them to alternate on the road.

"Bob was on top of the world," Jon Banner, executive producer of "World News," says on the program. "He was riding this wave."

When Woodruff arrived in Baghdad for his seventh visit since 2002, he and three crew members embedded themselves with an Iraqi unit to examine whether the country's soldiers were ready to assume more of the burden from the U.S. military.

Woodruff was taping part of his report Jan. 29, standing in the turret of a tank, when an improvised explosive device, or IED, went off. He and cameraman Doug Vogt, who was less seriously injured, were airlifted to a field hospital in Balad. Woodruff was in surgery 37 minutes after the explosion.

A CT scan of Woodruff's skull taken two days later showed rocks and debris lodged in his face and neck. One half-dollar-size rock narrowly missed severing a key artery. The explosion damaged the part of the brain that controls speech.

Woodruff continued his recuperation at Bethesda Naval Medical Center. In the documentary, he begins to cry when he returns to the hospital months later to thank the staff, and his wife shows him the bed where he was confined.

Woodruff is seen with his four children, struggling in the early months of his recovery to relearn everyday words. Looking at flash cards, he cannot remember what a hammer is called until prompted with the letter H. He struggles, with the children's help, to pronounce "belt buckle." At first he could not lift his left arm.

When physicians gave Lee a pessimistic prognosis, she recalled saying: "You don't know my Bob. He's a fighter."

His progress, which stunned his doctors, contrasts sharply with that of the other brain-damaged veterans who struggle to speak when Woodruff interviews them and their families. Some of that footage is hard to watch.

The ABC program says the veterans receive good care at the Veterans Administration's regional medical centers but that local VA hospitals are often ill-prepared to deal with traumatic brain injuries. The patients have, in the bureaucratic language of an inspector general's report, "sub-optimal access to care." One young man, who had been making progress at a larger VA facility, is seen losing some speech and motor skills as a paperwork snafu blocks his admission to a hospital back home.

VA Secretary Jim Nicholson tells Woodruff that his agency is devoting considerable resources to brain-injured patients. But the program charges that military officials are withholding information on the extent of such injuries among Iraq veterans, and that many soldiers also suffer from "invisible" brain injuries that go undiagnosed for long periods. A veterans' advocate accuses the Pentagon of issuing "gag orders" on discussing traumatic brain injuries, and Woodruff reports that the department declined to release some information for "operational security reasons."

Woodruff, for his part, still fumbles occasionally for the right word. At Monday's press briefing, he said he had "news" when he meant "knowledge," then stopped and corrected himself.

Woodruff said he did not regret having gone to Iraq, but that he would "have to be an idiot" not to think about what he could have done differently.

Asked if he would return to Baghdad, Woodruff refused to rule it out, but ABC News President David Westin did it for him. Given Woodruff's brain injury, Westin said, "it would be the height of recklessness. . . . It would be insane." Westin praised Woodruff's "resilience and strength of character."

Woodruff's facial scars are no longer visible; doctors glued a synthetic piece of skull where the missing piece had been. He plays tennis, swims and skis -- limited by blindness in the upper-right corner of both eyes -- but his wife has barred him from basketball and soccer.

While he may try to return to anchoring one day, Woodruff said, "I love reporting, and that is plenty for me." He plans to keep focusing on the problems of veterans.

"Will I get back to 100 percent? Probably not," Woodruff said. "But if I get in the 90s, that's pretty good."

'I'm Lucky,' ABC's Bob Woodruff Says (USAT)

By Peter Johnson

USA Today, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK — Spend some time talking to ABC's Bob Woodruff, and it's nearly impossible to tell that he was almost been killed by a roadside bomb in Iraq on Jan. 29, 2006, and sustained such severe brain trauma that it required removing part of his skull.

"I'm lucky," Woodruff told reporters Monday in his first interview since he was wounded. "This turned out a lot better than it could have."

His face, some scars aside, looks about the same as it did when he co-anchored World News Tonight for just 27 days, until the 28th nearly cost him his life as he rode atop a tank in Taji, north of Baghdad.

Woodruff says he still has difficulty remembering certain words, but as he fields questions, his mind — he's a lawyer — seems as sharp as ever. That prompts questions of whether he'll ever anchor World News Tonight again.

ABC News president David Westin doesn't rule it out. "Every time there has been a juncture in Bob's progress, he has exceeded it. I think we would be really foolish to underestimate Bob. I think we should assume the best."

But Westin says he will not send Woodruff back to Iraq because Woodruff would be more vulnerable, having already suffered severe trauma. "It would be the height of recklessness."

Woodruff says he's optimistic about his future. "When I woke up, I couldn't remember a single state in this country. I couldn't remember my brothers' names, and I couldn't remember my two youngest daughters — not just their names but their existence.

"You can see the change from then to now is significant, but there's still more to do," says Woodruff, who has gone from five to six days a week of therapy down to one. "Will I get to 100%? Probably unlikely, but maybe if I get to somewhere in the 90s, that would be pretty damn good."

Such are the wonders of modern trauma-treatment techniques as practiced by U.S. military doctors on Woodruff and his cameraman, Doug Vogt, after they were severely injured while reporting on American efforts to hand over military responsibilities to the Iraqis.

But many others — from soldiers who also have suffered severe head traumas from bullets and bombs in Iraq to their families now coping with those injuries — have not been so lucky.

DOJ_NMG_0137437

In an emotional ABC special tonight, To Iraq and Back (10 ET/PT), Woodruff reports on what happened to him, on his recovery and on the severe care crisis facing thousands of injured soldiers who have suffered brain injuries and are now under the care of the U.S. government.

"It was very important to me for the story to be about others who had gone through the same thing," Woodruff says. This type of severe head injury "happens to Marines and soldiers every day, but a lot of times it won't get covered (by the media) because no one is there to see it happen."

Woodruff, 45, says he plans to continue covering the story in future ABC News specials. He's not worried about remaining objective on an issue close to his heart.

"It's impossible to remain objective on many stories, but I've always reported what I thought was truthful, no matter how I got the story," he says. "A lot of questions need to be asked about what is going on with the treatment of soldiers who come back injured."

One Man's Survival Story Becomes A Rallying Cry (NYT)

By Alessandra Stanley

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

It was many weeks before ABC's Bob Woodruff realized how lucky he was to survive a roadside bomb explosion in Iraq in January 2006. It took months for him to understand how lucky he was to recover as fully as he did.

Few do. And that is one of the more sobering lessons of "To Iraq and Back," Mr. Woodruff's account of his ordeal on ABC tonight. Many veterans with similar traumatic brain injuries may never fully regain their ability to speak, walk or pick up a glass of water.

"I've seen probably less than five that have actually been able to walk back into the I.C.U. and thank us for what we did," Alison Bischoff, one of the nurses who treated Mr. Woodruff at the Bethesda Naval Hospital in Maryland, says in this documentary. "So, to me, he's a miracle."

Mr. Woodruff, who makes a point of saying he was privileged to receive the "best civilian and military care in the world," wants viewers to know that veterans with traumatic brain injuries who rely solely on Veterans Affairs medical centers do not always receive the same quality of care.

"To Iraq and Back" is remarkably compelling, mostly because the documentary, while moving, is not just a heart-wrenching portrait of one man's courageous struggle. Mr. Woodruff and his wife, Lee, have published a book about their experience, "In an Instant: A Family's Journey of Love and Healing," and will soon be telling their inspiring tale to Diane Sawyer, Oprah Winfrey and others.

On this ABC News special, Mr. Woodruff tells his story with candor and restraint, then turns the focus to the men and women who return badly wounded from Iraq and Afghanistan and do not heal as thoroughly.

Mr. Woodruff was named co-anchor of "World News Tonight" less than a month before he went to Iraq. His injury was a huge story and a milestone in the public's perception of the war; it was already all too obvious that soldiers, American and Iraqi, were wounded and killed by roadside bombs and ambushes every day. But the explosion that injured Mr. Woodruff and, to a lesser extent, Doug Vogt, a cameraman, dramatically brought home how vulnerable all Americans, even visiting anchors, are over there.

Like celebrities who battle cancer, H.I.V. or Parkinson's disease, Mr. Woodruff decided to put his fame and experience to public use. And like so many people fueled by a sense of mission, he seeks government accountability.

The film notes that the Department of Defense puts the number of men and women wounded in Iraq and Afghanistan at about 23,000, while the Department of Veterans Affairs has recorded treating more than 200,000 veterans of those two wars. Paul Sullivan, the director of programs at the advocacy group Veterans for America, says, "What you have are two sets of books."

Mr. Woodruff politely asks the secretary of veterans affairs, R. James Nicholson, to explain the discrepancy. Citing department reports that list 73,000 mental disorders, 61,000 diseases of the nervous system and others, Mr. Woodruff says, "These are huge numbers beyond the 23,000."

Mr. Nicholson, a Vietnam veteran and a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, replies, "A lot of them come in for, for dental problems."

Mr. Woodruff illustrates quite graphically that some veterans are sent home to recuperate in smaller cities that do not have veterans' hospitals equipped to handle the growing number of those returning with severe traumatic injuries. He interviews a young soldier who is slowly but steadily recovering at a state-of-the-art veterans' polytrauma rehabilitation center in Tampa, Fla., then checks in on him weeks later in his hometown in Texas, where he has noticeably regressed.

DOJ_NMG_0137438

Mr. Woodruff's own recovery took time, hard work and the best medical care Mount Sinai Medical Center in New York City could provide.

The earliest images of Mr. Woodruff on a hospital bed, filmed with a home video camera by family members, are alarming: he lies in the intensive care unit at Bethesda with the left side of his skull bashed in like a dented car. Even after the doctors send him home in a helmet, Mr. Woodruff has trouble identifying a pair of scissors or recalling the word Iraq. He says he still has trouble retrieving words and remembering names. He has almost no memory of the explosion itself.

On even the most serious network news programs, a correspondent's conversations with wounded veterans or disaster victims are almost always hard to watch; the interviewer's cloying displays of compassion grate. Mr. Woodruff speaks to wounded soldiers not as a visiting celebrity but as a peer and, perhaps most important, one whose mere appearance lends hope.

When asked by Mr. Woodruff how he is doing, Sgt. William Glass, a 23-year-old from Eugene, Ore., who suffered a traumatic brain injury during his second deployment in Iraq, replies, "Pretty well." Actually, he looks terrible: his face is as swollen and his head as squashed as Mr. Woodruff's were a year earlier.

Mr. Woodruff asks the soldier if he remembers what happened to him in Iraq, but Sergeant Glass is staring at Mr. Woodruff's smooth cheek and unscarred brow. "You look great," he says wonderingly.

It's impossible not to hope that Sergeant Glass will also be as lucky. "To Iraq and Back" makes it clear that the odds are against him — and that the government should do more to improve them.

Vietnam Pilot Honored After Deferring To Wingman (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, February 27, 2007

Forty-one years after repeatedly leading a two-helicopter team into a region of Vietnam dubbed the "Valley of Death," retired Army helicopter pilot Bruce Crandall received the Medal of Honor on Monday at a White House ceremony.

Crandall, 74, might have been eligible to receive the award — the nation's highest military medal — years earlier. But he withdrew his name from consideration in the 1990s because he worried his quest for the medal might take precedence over that of his wingman and friend, Ed Freeman.

"If only one of them were to receive the Medal of Honor, he wanted it to be his wingman," President Bush said in the East Room before placing the blue-ribboned medal around Crandall's neck. "Today the story comes to its rightful conclusion: Bruce Crandall receives the honor he always deserved."

Freeman received his medal in a 2001 ceremony at the White House. Crandall, of Manchester, Wash., attended the event. Freeman, 79, couldn't attend Crandall's ceremony because his flight from his hometown in Boise was snowed in.

The two have been friends since basic training. On Nov. 14, 1965, they teamed up during a vicious battle later memorialized in a book and the Mel Gibson film We Were Soldiers.

On that day, about 450 American troops had landed in a remote area of Vietnam near the Cambodian border. They were unaware that their landing in the Ia Drang Valley was amid a major sanctuary for the North Vietnamese Army.

The Americans were surrounded by about 2,000 North Vietnamese soldiers and came under intense attack. Crandall and Freeman flew the injured out to a base and returned with troops and ammunition. They kept making trips back and forth even though they were being shot at by enemy fighters, sometimes only 30 yards away.

They flew through a cloud of smoke and a wave of bullets, Bush said. Ground commanders ordered a halt to the airlifts because of the danger, but Crandall kept going, and Freeman joined him.

"We knew that if we didn't do it our guys would go down," Crandall said in an interview last week.

The two men made 22 trips over 14 hours. Crandall switched helicopters three times after the aircraft were shot up.

The two men pulled more than 70 Americans out of the battle zone. The battalion lost 79 men, but the North Vietnamese were overcome.

"For the soldiers rescued, for the men who came home, for the children they had and the lives they made, America is in debt to Bruce Crandall," Bush said. "It's a debt our nation can never really fully repay, but today we recognize it as best as we're able."

An unarmed helicopter pilot who flew through a hail of bullets to rescue 70 wounded Americans in one of the fiercest battles of the Vietnam War was awarded the Medal of Honor, 41 years later. The pilot, Lt. Col. Bruce Crandall, 74, received the nation's highest military honor for his valor in repeatedly flying into enemy fire to bring in ammunition and supplies and evacuate the wounded. His actions in Ia Drang Valley were depicted in the 2002 movie "We Were Soldiers," adapted from the book "We Were Soldiers Once ... And Young." President Bush, in a White House ceremony, said Colonel Crandall had to fly three different helicopters over the course of the mission.

Business And Labor Square Off On Bills (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Business and labor lobbies square off this week over a House measure that would make it easier for workers to form unions, which have struggled for years with declining membership.

The Democratic-dominated House is expected to pass the Employee Free Choice Act on Thursday — a legislative victory for labor in a body that business interests dominated during the 12-year Republican reign.

But House Democrats and their labor allies face the same problem House Republicans and their big-business friends faced: the Senate filibuster. As a result, the bill has much tougher chances in the Senate than House. The administration is another obstacle. President Bush has indicated he will veto the bill if it arrives on his desk.

Despite these factors, business interests are still nervous as they face the new political reality on Capitol Hill. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Manufacturers Association and other business groups have formed a new coalition to oppose the measure.

"The concern is widespread in the business community," said Jade West, a lobbyist for the National Association of Wholesalers-Distributors, one of the business groups lobbying against the bill. West described it as a "monumental shift" in how unions are organized.

With 234 cosponsors, the measure is expected to pass in the House. But business groups are trying to keep the margin of victory relatively small to build momentum for the real battle in the Senate. West describes herself as "relatively comfortable, not overconfident" that the legislation's supporters will not find the 60 votes needed to deny a filibuster.

The lobbying strategy of big business has focused in particular on the measure's provision that negates the need for a "secret ballot" for workers to register anonymously their position on whether to unionize.

Such a provision may sound undemocratic. But labor groups argue that businesses exploit the secret ballot to delay and frustrate organizing. In addition, employers can mount expensive campaigns before the day of the vote, and they have more access to workers than labor leaders often do.

Under the House bill, a union would be certified if a majority of workers openly sign union cards. That can happen now, but the employer has the right to either accept the cards outright or require that workers vote again in a secret ballot.

Another bone of contention is a provision that would introduce a third-party arbiter to manage the collective-bargaining process if business and labor have not reached compromise after 120 days of negotiation.

Labor groups argue that foot-dragging by employers can delay an agreement for years. But West said the third-party arbiter would have too much power. For example, it could introduce new rules that neither the union nor the employer had contemplated, West said.

The bill would also increase the financial penalties if employers try to intimidate workers from joining a union. Labor groups say such penalties are a key piece of the bill: "There are numerous examples of workers [who are] denied a fair right to organize," said Stephanie Mueller, a spokeswomen for the Service Employees International Union.

Fewer and fewer workers are members of a union these days. In 2006, 12 percent of employed wage and salary workers were unionized, down from 12.5 percent the year before, according the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The actual number of union workers fell by 326,000 to 15.4 million in 2006. In 1983, more than 20 percent of workers were union members.

If business interests lose the union vote, they may score a win with another measure in the House. On Wednesday, the body will take up a measure to update the rules governing the Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S. (CFIUS), which was obscure until a company called Dubai Ports World made a bid last year to oversee American ports.

That sparked a push to toughen federal reviews of deals involving foreign investments as well as dozens of press conferences and media appearances featuring outraged lawmakers. In the end, though, the 109th Congress was unable to deliver a bill. Congress will try again this year, and business interests hope this time it will succeed.

CFIUS is charged with reviewing foreign investment deals with national-security implications. While the pending bill has the potential to make reviews more stringent — for example, by requiring an additional 45-day review if the purchaser is owned or controlled by a foreign government — business believes the bill will reduce the political sensitivity that surrounds foreign investment.

"It's a good product," said Todd Malan, the president and CEO of the Organization for International Investment.

DOJ_NMG_0137440

Last year, the GOP-governed House agreed. It passed a similar measure on suspension (that is, with no amendments), with nary a "no" vote. This year, it is expected to come to the floor under an open rule. Accordingly, there is some concern on K Street that members like Reps. Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.) or John Murtha (D-Pa.) could add amendments to alter the measure significantly. But most believe this is unlikely, even though negotiations were continuing at press time.

The measure now "threads the needle," Malan said, when it comes to encouraging foreign investment while balancing national-security concerns.

In this case, business interests fear rather than welcome the role that the Senate could play. The Senate took up its CFIUS bill shortly after the Dubai issue broke last year and passed a tougher measure than the House. Several key Democrats told The Hill two weeks ago they favored their original bill.

Labor Votes To Intrude On War, 9/11 Debates (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Just because everyone on Capitol Hill will be talking about, thinking about and posturing over Iraq this week doesn't mean that Members of Congress can't multitask — and if all goes well for the Democratic majorities in both chambers, they'll be able to take their jabs at President Bush over the Iraq War and pass a few measures designed to boost union membership, too.

While the maneuvering for the perfect rebuke of the president's Iraq policy continues in the House and Senate, both chambers are expecting major battles over organized labor this week.

And Republicans are planning a fierce push-back on bills they say would hamper homeland security, restrict democracy and lead to the harassment and coercion of average workers.

"The theme is clearly going to be the Democrat 'payback' for union support," said Ryan Loskarn, spokesman for the Senate Republican Conference.

The House plans to vote Thursday on a bill to relax union organizing rules — allowing a union to form if a majority of workers sign cards authorizing it, rather than the current practice of holding federally supervised, secret-ballot votes.

Democrats say corporations for years have used intimidation to prevent unions from even getting a vote, and that the bill would level the playing field for workers.

But with the backing of the business community's lobbying juggernaut on K Street, House Republicans say they may not be able to prevent the Employee Free Choice Act from passing that chamber this week, but that their public relations offensive will set the stage for its ultimate demise in the Senate.

"House Democrats have the votes to pass the Employee Free Choice Act, but Republicans will win the debate," said one House Republican leadership aide.

Chief among the Republicans' talking points on the bill is that the measure would "kill private voting rights altogether" and that "card checks" could allow union organizers to unfairly pressure workers to join, said the House GOP leadership aide.

Republicans also point to a 2001 letter that some House Democrats sent to Mexican officials as proof that supporters of the bill are "shockingly hypocritical."

The letter, signed by House Education and Labor Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.), stated, "We feel that the secret ballot is absolutely necessary in order to ensure workers are not intimidated into voting for a union they may otherwise not choose."

But Democrats say the "bipartisan bill is part of Democrats' efforts to ensure that all Americans have a fair shot at the American dream, including a good job and fair wages," according to Stacey Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.).

Bernards also noted that the measure has 233 co-sponsors, seven of whom are Republicans.

Still, the bill faces major obstacles in the Senate, where Republicans already are planning to lay down their markers this week on a much less sweeping bill allowing airport screeners to unionize.

Ostensibly, the Senate will be debating a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, but Republicans are agitated by a provision, added in committee, that would allow employees at the Transportation Security Agency to join a union.

"Much of the Republican effort will be to oppose that," said one knowledgeable Senate GOP aide.

Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) will lead the Senate GOP effort against the provision, with Republicans arguing that allowing airport security screeners to join unions could imperil national security if employees were to walk off the job or stage "sick outs" over failed salary negotiations.

"The rationale for unionizing security employees is difficult to discern — but the American people will recognize that it has zero to do with improving security and everything to do with rewarding Democrat donors," said Loskarn.

DOJ_NMG_0137441

The push-back on the Democratic side is likely to come from none other than Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Chairman Joe Lieberman (ID-Conn.). Though Lieberman has been at loggerheads with his fellow Democrats over Iraq — he supports the war, they don't — he actually offered the TSA proposal to the 9/11 bill in committee earlier this month.

Democrats contend that TSA workers should be able to have collective bargaining rights along with other Department of Homeland Security employees, such as customs and border control agents.

Meanwhile, Senate Republicans may also offer an amendment to the 9/11 bill that would legalize the president's now-defunct warrantless wiretapping program. After federal courts ruled it unconstitutional, the Bush administration agreed to submit its requests to spy on Americans' overseas phone calls and e-mails to the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court.

A Shield Against Corporate Bullying (WP)

By Lance Compa

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

A proposal to let American workers decide in peace and quiet about whether to join a union has provoked a torrent of crocodile tears from corporate executives. The Employee Free Choice Act, which the House is due to vote on this week, would permit an employee to choose union representation by signing a membership card. If a majority of workers in a defined "bargaining unit" opted for it, employers would have to bargain in good faith with the workers' union.

Business spokesmen shout that the act deprives workers of their right to an election held by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB). But what companies really prize is management's power to exploit the election procedure to mount aggressive, one-sided attacks on workers' freedom of association.

Why the sudden concern for democracy in a culture of otherwise unilateral employer dominion? We don't hear companies calling for secret-ballot votes on management decisions or CEO stock options, or to elect worker representatives to boards of directors. Bosses' democratic impulses appear only when workers want to exercise their right to organize.

Current labor law puts employers in control of what should be employees' concern. Even when by a big majority workers join a union to bargain collectively, employers can force a vote run by the NLRB. During the weeks it takes to set up the election, management can launch a devastating campaign to thwart workers' choice. Employers say they are just telling employees the downsides of organizing. But they go way beyond that point, hauling workers into mandatory meetings and threatening to shutter the workplace or to permanently replace workers who exercise the right to strike.

Imagine a campaign for president where legally just one candidate can spend an unlimited amount of money for TV advertisements and the other candidate can only pass out flyers at highway intersections. Imagine a campaign for Congress in which every employer in the country can force its employees into a mandatory meeting to tell them: "If you vote for the candidate of Party A, I'll have to close the business; vote for Party B if you want to keep your job." Imagine a campaign for governor where every employer in the state singles out and fires employees who support the candidate whom management opposes.

These examples parallel the reality of union election campaigns under current law. Employers have unlimited access to harangue workers against organizing, while union representatives are relegated to passing out flyers to workers speeding out of parking lots and asking time-stressed employees to attend evening or weekend meetings. Employers have unlimited power to hold captive-audience meetings where they can legally "predict" workplace closure, as long as they don't illegally "threaten" it (a Supreme Court decision created the distinction, though many understandably have trouble differentiating between the two). And though it's illegal, employers routinely fire worker activists to frighten others into submission, knowing it will take years for reinstatement orders to take effect.

A card-based system for choosing union representation is already allowed under current law. Many fair-minded employers use it. But most nullify it, forcing workers into the NLRB election process. These managements say they need an opportunity to offer their version of union "facts," but their presentations are often threat-filled diatribes.

Nothing in the proposed legislation prevents employers from presenting their views -- including their diatribes. Actually, employers are entitled to mount union-avoidance campaigns starting on Day One of a worker's employment. Their campaign is the wages and benefits they pay and the way they treat employees. If workers turn to union representation, it should be their business, not the company's.

Workers should be able to organize without fear-mongering by bosses or, by the same token, pressure from union organizers. This is how the card-based system already works; safeguards against undue pressure from any side are built in. It includes rapid arbitration to resolve any disputes, compared with years of dragged-out NLRB proceedings and federal court appeals.

Many companies have agreed to a card-based system. They find that when workers choose bargaining, a more peaceful, productive negotiating-table dynamic results than in the case of negotiations that follow an NLRB election war. Congress should build such positive labor relations into the architecture of our labor laws by passing the Employee Free Choice Act.

Lance Compa, a senior lecturer at Cornell University's School of Industrial and Labor Relations, wrote the Human Rights Watch report "Unfair Advantage: Workers' Freedom of Association in the United States Under International Human Rights Standards."

An Assault On Corporate Speech (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Good for Adrienne Eaton of Rutgers University's Labor Studies & Employment Relations Department. Her forthright description of a central issue in the debate about the Employee Free Choice Act, which she supports, clarifies why that legislation is symptomatic of a disagreeable tendency in today's politics.

Labor unions hope this exquisitely mistitled act, which the House of Representatives probably will pass this week, will compensate for their dwindling persuasiveness as they try to persuade workers to join. It would allow unions to organize workplaces without workers voting for unionization in elections with secret ballots. Instead, unions could use the "card check" system: Once a majority of a company's employees signs a card expressing consent, the union is automatically certified as the bargaining agent for all the workers.

Unions say the card-check system is needed to protect workers from anti-union pressure by employers before secret-ballot elections. Such supposed pressure is one of organized labor's alibis for declining membership.

There are, however, ample protections against employer pressures that really are abusive. Tellingly, the act would forbid employers from trying to influence -- pressure? -- employees by improving their lot: It would fine employers that, to reduce the incentive to unionize, give workers "unilateral" -- not negotiated -- improvements in compensation or working conditions during attempts at unionization. Clearly, the act aims less to help workers than to herd them as dues-payers into unions.

Under the card-check system, unions are able to, in effect, select the voters they want. It strips all workers of privacy and exposes them, one at a time, to the face-to-face pressure of union organizers who distribute and collect the cards. The Supreme Court has said that the card-check system is "admittedly inferior to the election process."

Repealing a right -- to secret ballots -- long considered fundamental to democratic culture would be a radical act. But labor is desperate. The card-check shortcut to unionization comes before Congress after last month's announcement that union membership declined, yet again, in 2006, by 326,000.

The percentage of employees in unions fell from 12.5 to 12, down from 20.1 percent in 1983 and 35 percent in the 1950s. The growth area of organized labor is among public-sector employees, 36.2 percent of whom are unionized, compared with just 7.4 percent of private-sector employees.

Today's workforce is marvelously flexible. People entering the labor market at age 18 will have, on average, 10 employers by the time they are 38. Such mobile workers often do not see what value union membership would add to their lives.

What unions are trying to sell is decreasingly attractive to potential members, so unions are doing what declining businesses often do: They are seeking government protection, in the form of a law to insulate them from the rigors of competition. They want government to allow them to, in effect, silence the employers' side of debates about the merits of unionization.

This is where Professor Easton -- again, she favors the Employee Free Choice Act -- is pertinent. Avoiding the sort of circumlocutions that Washington policymakers often use to conceal their thoughts, she said this to the New York Sun: "Because employers wield so much power, it's hard to figure out what kinds of lines to draw about employer speech."

The Employee Free Choice Act would short-circuit the process of persuading workers through a public debate between unions and employers, the winner of which would be determined by workers casting secret ballots. Welcome to the political culture that the McCain-Feingold campaign finance law is shaping. That law, which regulates the quantity, timing and content of political speech, is making it increasingly acceptable for interest groups to attempt to advance their social agendas by limiting their adversaries' speech.

Senate Democrats might not find 60 votes to bring this Orwellian legislation -- "free choice," indeed -- to a vote. But if it does reach the president's desk, he will veto it. He should have vetoed McCain-Feingold. Its speech restrictions -- applauded as virtuous by the (exempt) media -- have legitimized talk about "drawing lines" to circumscribe the speech rights of entire categories of Americans, in this case employers.

Much recent academic writing about the First Amendment, and much of the jurisprudence about it, has "balanced" speech rights against other social goods and has valued speech rights primarily as instrumental for other social goods. So there are, alas, ample precedents for this legislative attempt to truncate employers' speech rights.

Still, herewith a modest proposal: Any member of Congress who was elected by a secret ballot should oppose the Employee Free Choice Act.

Budget Strain (WSJ)

By David Malpass

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

The U.S. tax outlook is unraveling fast. An increasing number of existing tax rates are temporary, and to keep them from rising automatically, Congress and the president will have to agree on new hard-to-pass laws.

Unfortunately, Washington's inclination is to add additional taxes to pay for the theoretical "cost" of keeping tax rates at their current level. As more of the tax system falls into this trap -- adding permanent new taxes annually in order to keep other tax rates from going up -- it will soon create a strong enough tax bias to slow growth. By 2010, the magnitude of the tax increases needed simply to maintain current rates will amount to over $400 billion per year, a looming economic train wreck.

The logic is strong for new tax-writing procedures to stop the upward tax ratchet. The budget is moving rapidly toward balance due to the flood of tax payments from private sector jobs and profits. The growth and asset price gains from current tax rates are readily apparent, and foreign countries are cutting tax rates to gain competitiveness.

Even so, the odds have shifted heavily toward annual tax hikes. Under the guise of budget neutrality, President Bush now seems likely to sign two tax increases in 2007 and another in 2008, each presented by Congress -- deceptively -- as a tax cut. This sets the precedent for similar treatment and much bigger tax hikes in the next administration, whether Republican or Democrat, as it confronts the scheduled 2011 tax increases on income, dividends and capital gains.

How can a tax increase be called a tax cut? Washington's tax-scoring magic.

Budget bean-counters measure tax hikes from a baseline that assumes tax rates are going up. Thus, merely extending the existing rates is called a tax cut and gets headlines as such -- even though the extension just maintains the status quo.

Permanent new taxes are then attached to the so-called cuts and labeled "offsets," a technical term for a tax hike. But these new taxes often get little attention. Adding to the size of the offsets, the growth benefits of maintaining current rates (and the harm from letting the rates rise) are arbitrarily excluded from the congressional scoring process.

The net effect of the current system is a strong upward ratchet in tax rates and tax complexity. Even many anti-tax Republicans seem to have acquiesced. Budget baselines build in repeated tax increases, as if those are normal, and assume that economic growth, stock prices and home prices are unaffected by higher tax rates. A more pro-growth Congress could pay for maintaining existing tax rates, if it thought that was necessary, by restraining the budget's built-in spending increases. But this choice seldom, if ever, materializes.

The first 2007 tax increase is attached to the minimum wage bill. To garner Republican votes, Congress is likely to continue existing provisions, which allow small businesses to expense some purchases rather than depreciate them over time. It will be trumpeted as a tax cut, but is mostly just the extension of current tax treatment.

By itself, this provision is a good idea, fostering small business investments and counteracting some of the job losses from the higher minimum wage. However, the proposed legislation pairs the small business provision with tax increases in other areas. The result will be higher tax rates and payments in 2007 than 2006 -- but it will be called a tax cut.

The congressional Joint Committee on Taxation makes clear the artifice in its scoring of the Senate and House bills. It labels one section "Provisions that Raise Revenues," amounting to $8 billion in the Senate bill and $1.4 billion in the House bill. But JCT is careful not to label the other section a tax cut, instead calling it "Small Business Provisions."

The second likely 2007 tax hike involves the alternative minimum tax, AMT. Each year, it needs to be patched -- by increasing the amount of income excluded from the tax -- so that the number of people charged the AMT penalty doesn't escalate. Congress typically treats the patch as a tax cut even though it doesn't reduce anyone's taxes. But in the same bill, Congress will probably add permanent new taxes amounting to as much as $50 billion as an "offset."

Unless the president or Congress calls a halt, even larger tax increases will be needed in 2008 to offset the AMT's expansion. The upward trend is large enough that the AMT-related tax increases alone may begin to undermine U.S. competitiveness and growth even before Congress and a new administration confront the much bigger 2011 tax increases.

Sen. Grassley has called for repealing the AMT for individuals without adding other taxes. In the unlikely event this un-Washington approach wins the day, it would be a pro-growth coup for U.S. competitiveness -- breaking the upward tax ratchet, significantly simplifying the tax code, leaving more money in the private sector to encourage work and innovation, disappointing the lobbyists whose livelihood depends on annual expansions of the tax code, and, most importantly, setting a pro-growth precedent for future tax legislation.

Sen. Grassley is probably asking too much of a system designed to add taxes, not repeal them. At the root of the problem, Congress's tax-writing procedures are based on the static scoring assumption that higher tax rates don't slow growth or taxable income. It's as if the taxes come from thin air rather than from people's paychecks and profits.

One pro-growth step Congress could take this year, short of repealing the AMT, would be to acknowledge that economic growth will be faster with the AMT patch than without it. The added tax receipts from patch-dependent economic growth could be used to offset some or most of the revenue loss attributed to the patch, reducing the offsets and limiting the upward tax ratchet. By Washington standards, this would be revolutionary.

The tax hikes making their way through Congress in 2007 and 2008 could well be large enough to reduce the attractiveness of investment in the U.S. relative to fast-growing, tax-cutting economies abroad. More worrisome, the procedures being used point to more onerous tax hikes in the next administration, enough to stop the expansion. If the likely 2007 AMT process -- adding new taxes to extend current rates -- is applied to the 2010 expirations, it would be the biggest tax increase in history. The irony is that the upward tax bias has become more entrenched at a time when the fiscal deficit is nearing balance in substantial part due to current tax rates.

Washington's 2007 decisions on the AMT patch are especially important because they will influence the market's thinking on the 2010 expiration of the 2003 tax cuts. If it looks like the 2003 tax rates, critical to economic growth and asset price appreciation, will expire in 2011 or will be maintained through offsets, this will point to recession.

Tax changes should add to economic growth and employment and simplify the code, factors not given much weight in the current tax-writing procedures. Congress and the president should break the upward tax ratchet, starting with the AMT. A pro-growth, pro-jobs approach would permanently index AMT for inflation without adding new taxes.

Even better, repeal the AMT -- neither political party likes it -- acknowledging that the economy will do better without it. The surprise repeal of an ineffective tax would make clear to global investors that the U.S. plans to avoid the economic train wreck facing its tax code.

Fight Over Fiscal Discipline Begins With Bush's Budget (RC)

By Ernest Istook

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

There's a two-front battle between Congress and President Bush. While they feud over who will direct policy in Iraq, an inch-by-inch slugfest continues over who will control the domestic policy turf.

"It's the spending, stupid!" was as big a message as Iraq last fall. Bush's proposed budget is pivotal, despite efforts to demean it as irrelevant.

With one simple pronouncement the president showed that he "gets it" even if others don't: He embraced the too-long-abandoned goal of balancing the budget without raising taxes.

It's been an orphaned issue for many years in Washington, D.C.; 1996 saw the last Congressional vote on a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. Yet that was the top item in the "Contract with America" before the Republican majority shifted to less-ambitious objectives. Nor did Bush embrace it during his first six years in office. That opened the door for Democrats to campaign successfully on fiscal discipline.

Preservation of the Democrats' new majority may hinge on whether they will embrace balancing the budget without a tax hike — or even accept the goal of balance when spending on entitlements is set to skyrocket as baby boomers age. Bush knew that when he set the bar so high. And Republicans in Congress know they can now voice support for the goal without being in charge of the tough decisions.

Cynics rightfully note that the next president will inherit much of the heavy lifting. But that means every 2008 candidate for the White House must now address the issue.

Early indicators show an effort to bury the issue by attacking the tough decisions promoted by the Bush budget. Critics of spending controls rushed to the microphones more quickly than supporters did.

Bush's proposals to rein in Medicare and other government-paid health care were quickly condemned. Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.) called them "an exercise in make-believe." Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich (D) said it would hamper his "All Kids" program to provide government-paid health care for every child, regardless of income.

But Rep. Joe Barton (R-Texas) properly questioned why the federal government pays billions extra to states that give free health care to families with income three times the poverty level, while others draw the line at two times. Imagine the cost if states could abandon all income restrictions like Blagojevich wants.

States feel entitled to federal funds just as individuals do, even though 45 states reported in the fall that their budgets are meeting or exceeding their projections. Homeland security has joined health care and education as a way to justify a multitude of state requests. Federal funds now provide training and equipment to first responders “just in case” they face a cataclysm, yet the funds often will be used to address auto accidents and fires instead.

One example was voiced by Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Texas), who said it is “completely appalling that the [Bush] administration seems to be unwilling to act on rail and mass transit security until we are faced with another disaster.”

Yet if it’s a federal duty to provide security for large gatherings at rail stations or bus stops, then why not at every mall and sports arena? (This differs from aviation, where a hijacked and fuel-laden plane becomes a guided missile.)

The Bush budget spotlights tough choices like these, while Congress often avoids them as the price of achieving a majority vote. But the elections weren’t just about Iraq. Democrats claim they also were about “underfunded” priorities, but more voters seem to understand that overfunded priorities were a bigger problem.

If Democrats want to claim the low-spending high ground along with Bush, they must avoid gobbledygook and speak with equal clarity. They should state their spending goal clearly, without carefully crafted modifiers or qualifiers. And if their goal is to balance the budget by raising taxes, they should say so.

Republicans should follow the same advice of clear-speaking. The GOP challenge is less over what to say but whether it will be believed, since voters decided they lacked fiscal discipline in recent years. But embracing the president’s goal is a necessary first step to regaining trust.

Women's Health Office Funds Cut (WP)

By Rick Weiss

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

When is $4 million really $2.8 million?

One answer is "When you're a woman," as the Labor Department has repeatedly found that women earn about 75 cents for every dollar that men earn for the same work.

But this week's answer is "When you are the Office of Women's Health" within the Food and Drug Administration. That office, which was at the center of a politically damaging storm over the emergency contraceptive "Plan B," just had more than one-quarter of this year's $4 million operating budget quietly removed, insiders say.

The office funds research on male-female biological differences to ensure that women receive the most appropriate drug doses and treatments. It also produces heavily requested health information about menopause, pregnancy, birth control, osteoporosis and other topics.

The administration had requested -- and Congress had budgeted -- $4 million for the office in fiscal 2007, just as they have for several years running.

Last week, however, word came down that the FDA intends to withhold $1.2 million of that, apparently for use elsewhere in the agency. Because the remaining $2.8 million has already been spent or allocated for salaries and started projects, the office must effectively halt further operations for the rest of the year, according to a high-level agency official with knowledge of the budget plan, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the official is not authorized to speak publicly.

FDA spokesman Robert Ali said in an e-mail that, as a matter of policy, the agency does not discuss its spending plan until Congress has had a chance to review it and comment. However, he added, "the spending plan for the agency is to allow our operating components to spend at least at their 06 level" -- in other words, the full $4 million.

But FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza quickly corrected that statement in a follow-up e-mail, saying the spending plan for the agency is "INTENDED" to allow spending of at least the 2006 level, acknowledging that the spending plan is not ironclad.

Women's health advocates inside and outside the agency suspect they are witnessing, at least in part, a long-anticipated payback for the trouble the office stirred during the prolonged debate over nonprescription sales of Plan B. Taking a position that chafed the administration's conservative base, the office had stood up for scientific research that had backed the safety and appropriateness of such sales.

In 2005, the office's then-director, Susan Wood, resigned in protest over the issue, a major embarrassment to the agency. A compromise was finally reached last August that allowed over-the-counter sales of the drug to people at least 18 years old.

Martha R. Nolan, a vice president at the Society for Women's Health Research, a Washington advocacy group, said that big budget bites in Washington are often the beginning of the end and that she worries that this is retribution for the Plan B controversy.

"We fear this is the first step toward eliminating the Office of Women's Health," Nolan said. "We must not allow this office to be eliminated or reduced to an empty shell that has no program funding."

DOJ_NMG_0137446

The office was created in 1994 amid growing evidence that some sex-based differences in biology warranted special regulatory attention -- and a recognition that other offices within the FDA did not have the time, money or expertise to focus on women's special needs.

More than 200 research articles based on studies funded by the office have appeared in scientific journals since 1994, and the office's fact sheets and other publications have generated record-breaking responses in recent years.

FDA Commissioner Andrew C. von Eschenbach is to appear today before the Senate appropriations subcommittee to discuss the agency's 2008 budget. Tomorrow, he will have a repeat performance before the House.

GSA Chief Seeks Probe Of Inspector General's Office (GOVEXEC)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, February 27, 2007

A private attorney working for the head of the General Services Administration has asked a presidential ethics committee to investigate the agency's inspector general office to see whether employees there leaked sensitive information.

Michael Nardotti, a lawyer with the Washington law firm Patton Boggs who is representing GSA Administrator Lurita Doan, wrote in a Jan. 31 letter obtained by Government Executive that "confidential and protected GSA IG investigative information and documents were leaked to outside sources," compromising the IG investigative process and "extraordinarily" harming Doan.

Doan has been the subject of an IG investigation since she allegedly attempted to award a no-bid contract to a friend's firm in July 2006. While the contract was never issued, the agency's IG opened a review about one month later. According to the letter, senior IG investigators said on Jan. 9 that the probe would continue for at least another five weeks.

"The leak of confidential and protected file information in the midst of an ongoing investigation constitutes a clear and gross abuse of authority," Nardotti's letter stated.

He argued that there "may be a connected pattern of leaks of confidential information from the GSA IG's office that are deliberately designed to cause reputational harm to Ms. Doan." The damage is such that it cannot be undone, Nardotti stated.

Nardotti sent the letter to James Burrus, chairman of the integrity committee within the President's Council on Integrity, a group made up of presidentially appointed inspectors general. Burrus is also assistant director of the FBI's Criminal Investigative Division.

Burrus said the integrity committee has yet to meet to decide whether to pursue an investigation.

The request for an investigation is another development in an ongoing battle between the head of the GSA, the government's procurement and property management agency, and officials at GSA's audit branch.

In December, a spokesman for the IG said a recommendation from Doan that the office perform only half of its proposed fiscal 2007 audits was "an extraordinary effort to reduce serious scrutiny of the agency." The two sides also have disagreed over the IG office's budget.

The IG office did not respond to requests for comment for this story.

A Feb. 2 letter from Kevin Messner, associate administrator of GSA's Office of Congressional and Intergovernmental Affairs, to House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., stated that the IG investigation of the administrator remains open and that Doan's actions have been mischaracterized.

A spokeswoman for Waxman said the committee has received other documents from GSA relating to the issue and is reviewing them.

In a statement, a GSA spokeswoman said that under the rules of professional responsibility, government attorneys may not represent agency officials in their personal capacities unless specifically detailed pursuant to special authority. Accordingly, Doan has assumed personal financial responsibility for private counsel, the spokeswoman said. She said that commenting on PCIE matters would be inappropriate.

The FBI's Burrus said it is not uncommon for senior government officials to obtain their own legal counsel in matters that could affect them personally.

Doan also has personally obtained the services of Mark Corallo, founder and principal managing member of Corallo Media Strategies LLC, an Alexandria, Va., crisis communications media services firm.

Pelosi Falls Short On Election Promises (POL)

By Daniel W. Reilly And Jim VandeHei

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi is discovering the cold truth about governing with a slim majority: It's much easier to promise behavioral change for Congress than to deliver it.

DOJ_NMG_0137447

Pelosi vowed that five-day workweeks would be a hallmark of a harder-working Democratic majority. So far, the House has logged only one. Lawmakers plan to clock three days this week.

The speaker has denied Republicans a vote on their proposals during congressional debates -- a tactic she previously declared oppressive and promised to end. Pelosi has opened the floor to a Republican alternative just once.

Pelosi set a high standard for herself when she pledged to make this "the most ethical Congress in history" -- a boast that was the political equivalent of leading with her chin. And some critics have been happy to hit it.

She is drawing fire for putting Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), who had $90,000 in alleged bribe money in his freezer, on the Homeland Security Committee. And The Washington Post reported during the weekend that she is helping chairmen raise money from donors with business before their committees.

Pelosi can count several big changes designed to curb abuses that plagued the Republican majority before it was dethroned in last fall's elections, including new limits on gifts from lobbyists. But her debut has not quieted skeptics who see her and the new majority failing to make the clean break with the deeply ingrained congressional culture.

"She has done exactly what she said she would do," said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly.

For example, he noted, while the House is not always in session five days a weeks, many committees are working throughout the week. Pelosi promised an ambitious start to the new Congress, he said, and she had determined the best way to proceed was by limiting debate.

"In the future," Daly said, "we will do business in the regular order."

Pelosi seems to be following a familiar pattern. Twelve years ago, Speaker Newt Gingrich promised to reform the House and govern by principles of fairness and transparency. But, for leaders of both parties, the reality of ruling with a narrow majority translates into tight controls over floor debate, cozy relations with lobbyists and accommodating the needs of lawmakers (who hate working long weeks).

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a congressional watchdog organization, said Jefferson's reelection put the new speaker in a bind.

"Pelosi had to put him somewhere," said Sloan, who has also worked as minority counsel for the House Judiciary Committee for then-ranking member John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.). "But I am troubled by the fact ... that (Jefferson) is the kind of guy who could not pass a security clearance test and yet now he has access to top-secret government info."

Sloan also took issue with Democrats' use of committee chairs for fundraising efforts, a tactic Republicans often abused in the last Congress.

"Given the scandals of last Congress, particularly involving (disgraced former lobbyist Jack) Abramoff, it doesn't look good," Sloan said. "It is very hard for people to understand the difference between what's legal and what's illegal."

Republicans are cutting Pelosi less slack than that. Eager to brand her a hypocrite, GOP strategists are closely tracking what they call a growing list of "broken promises" and are encouraging their members to attack her for them.

"She promised the most open and honest Congress in history and by any objective score, (Democrats) have fallen short," said Rep. Adam Putnam (R-Fla.).

Pressed on whether voters will care about procedural complaints, such as lack of floor votes for GOP proposals, Putnam said: "I think voters do care if you shut down the process to the point people cannot even offer an alternative, and you are stifling debate …You don't want to be constantly complaining about the process, but bottom line, they are abusing it."

Some Democratic lawmakers privately warn that Pelosi could blow a rare opportunity to change voters' perception of the party and Congress if she reverts to old Republican ways.

In a recent newspaper commentary, former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana expressed concern "that the new Democratic majority in the House, which certainly understands the sting of unfair treatment, has on occasion yielded to the temptation of its newfound power to shut down Republican participation."

So far, the GOP has been shut out of virtually every big debate. The most recent example was the House fight over the war in Iraq, in which Democrats broke their promise to allow the GOP a vote on its nonbinding resolution supporting the troops.

Pelosi sympathizers said Republican critics are laying it on a bit thick.

"Oh, cry me a river," said former Democratic Rep. Tony Coelho. "For six years they ran a system that was autocratic, that didn't give the minority a shot at offering anything and now are saying 'mistreatment' …They never even let the Democrats have a voice."

Still, Pelosi's experience with the recent Iraq debate illustrates her challenge. She calculated that it would be harder to build bipartisan support for a Democratic resolution condemning the administration's troop "surge" if the debate were muddied by a generic, support-the-troops vote. In essence, she determined it was riskier, in the short term, to keep her pledge than to break it.

There is a practical reason for this approach, too. Alternatives are ripe for mischief. The minority party often puts together legislation designed to either embarrass or divide the other side.

DOJ_NMG_0137448

That means there is almost always a temptation to backtrack on pledges of reform. Gingrich and his self-proclaimed "revolutionaries" roared to power in 1994 with promises to undo the feather-nesting and strong-arm tactics that had come to mark the Democratic reign -- then discovered that what they once deemed outrageous seemed more defensible once their party was in charge.

In light of this history, say some congressional scholars, Pelosi soon will be facing a choice.

"If we don't start seeing some opportunities for Republicans to offer real amendments on floor and to see some effort at collaboration that is genuine," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution, "then she and Democrats will properly be subject to criticism."

For Hoyer, A Life Of Quiet Victories, Redefined Purpose (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

His father abandoned him. His stepfather was an alcoholic. By his sophomore year at the University of Maryland, Steny Hoyer was short of cash, getting D's and drifting.

Then one spring day in 1959, a Pontiac convertible cruised past him on campus, carrying a familiar figure. Hoyer followed it to the student center. Spellbound, he listened as Sen. John F. Kennedy appealed to young people to get involved in government.

"It was just like that," Hoyer says, snapping his fingers as he sits in his U.S. Capitol office. "Just like that." The next week, he switched his major from public relations to politics. He started getting A's and went on to law school.

"You know the rest," he says.

The rest is this: At 27, Hoyer became a state senator. At 35, president of the Maryland Senate. At 41, a U.S. congressman. And, last month, he captured the second-most powerful post in the U.S. House of Representatives: majority leader.

At 67, Hoyer seems the very image of the Washington political insider, with his starched white shirts and patrician cap of silver hair. He is known as a pragmatist, skilled at navigating the legislative maze and wooing K Street lobbyists. A workaholic who makes the trains run on time.

Yet there is another side: The man who quietly fought for Soviet Bloc dissidents. The husband of a teacher devoted to the poor. The idealist who keeps a bust of Kennedy in his office.

The one-time pol from Prince George's County now stands at a historic juncture, as he tries to steer the resurgent Democrats' agenda through Congress. With a record as a moderate consensus-builder, he could be key to keeping the party together and coaxing Republicans to cross the aisle.

"I aspired throughout my life to make a difference in the things I cared about," says Hoyer, his brown-and-white springer spaniel at his feet. And to make a difference, you "try to be in a position where you can effectively advocate for what you believe is best."

Hoyer rarely talks about his childhood. When the new Democratic-controlled House was sworn in, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) threw a four-day extravaganza highlighting her roots in Baltimore's Little Italy. Hoyer held a quiet reception in his office.

Steny Hamilton Hoyer was born in Manhattan, the only child of a Danish immigrant and a high school dropout whose family fortune collapsed in the Depression. He is named for his father, Steen.

"He was a very arrogant, opinionated person," Hoyer says. "What I remember was not particularly happy."

The young Hoyer bounced around. At 4, to Texas, when his dad got a job with the military. At 6, to Massachusetts, for prep school. At 9, back to New York, when the money ran out and the father took off.

"I think I saw my father maybe two or three days in the next 20 years," Hoyer says. But the memory of that prickly, apathetic man would haunt him.

"He didn't want to be like his father," says the congressman's daughter Anne Hoyer. "That's what really drove him -- to be not just good, but strive to be the best you possibly could be."

By the time Steny Hoyer was 16, his mother had married an Air Force sergeant and the family settled near Andrews Air Force Base. His stepfather's alcoholism roiled the home. But, entering Suitland High School, the outgoing youth found the two interests that would define his life.

He got involved in politics, running unsuccessfully for vice president of the student government. And he started dating Judy Pickett, a warm, energetic schoolmate who was class secretary.

Judy's home became like his own. Her mother bought him new shoes, cooked for him when his stepfather was on a bender. Judy was at his side through the rocky start in college and the Kennedy epiphany.

She married him at 21, becoming, Hoyer says, "an example and guide."Success, Then Failure

DOJ_NMG_0137449

Fresh out of Georgetown's law school in 1966, Hoyer launched his campaign for state Senate from Prince George's. He was an underdog, a liberal reformer in a county still heavily white and rural. But he had an army of volunteers: classmates, friends from the statewide Young Democrats, interns from the U.S. Senate, where he worked part time.

"It was a youth corps onslaught," laughs Hoyer.

When Hoyer arrived in Annapolis, "he was a ball of energy," recalls Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin (D-Md.), then a state representative. But the young reformer quickly befriended the older senators. "Rather than fight the establishment, he really co-opted it," Cardin says.

Hoyer pushed for better treatment of rape victims and funds for lower-income schools. His wife was a strong influence.

But he became better known for his hard-nosed grasp of politics. He and his allies replaced the Prince George's Democratic machine with an organization called the Breakfast Club. Over coffee and Danish, they met with party factions to plot strategy, pick candidates and dole out judgeships and other posts.

Hoyer's life was a whirl of dinners, negotiations, debates in the marble-columned Senate. But in 1972, the past came knocking. His father showed up, by then a 70-year-old drifter in threadbare clothes, suffering from lung cancer.

"I felt a responsibility because he was my father," says Hoyer. "But I was certainly not enthusiastic."

Hoyer got him a small apartment in Washington, where the elderly man lived until his death in 1974.

Hoyer's own life went from success to success. In 1975, he became the youngest Senate president in Maryland history. His political organization was the most powerful in the state. He and Judy bought a three-bedroom home in a subdivision called Friendly, near Clinton, and were blessed with three daughters. In 1978, the "golden boy" of Maryland politics ran for lieutenant governor, the latest move in a career exploding like a bottle rocket, higher, higher . . .

And then he lost.

He and gubernatorial candidate Blair Lee III, the political insiders, were upset in the primary by a reform ticket led by Harry R. Hughes.

For two years, Hoyer practiced law. Then the local congresswoman, Gladys Noon Spellman (D), suffered cardiac arrest, and her seat was vacated. Hoyer reactivated his formidable political network.

"I remember the day he called me to say, 'I'm running for Congress,' " says Peter F. O'Malley, a close ally. "The joy was back in his voice."Working the System

Hoyer won the congressional race and quickly ingratiated himself with the Democratic leadership in the House, working overtime to round up votes and fundraise. He landed on committees such as Appropriations and played the levers of power like a maestro.

Hoyer was so successful at steering funds to projects such as Metro and NASA's Goddard Space Flight Center that they became known as "Steny dollars."

Not everyone was a fan. The nonpartisan Citizens Against Government Waste eventually gave him a 12 percent career score -- "hostile." A Hoyer spokeswoman says voters have shown time and again that they appreciate "the federal investment he secures."

Then there were the whispers in Congress: that Hoyer was too ambitious, too slick. After rising in the House hierarchy, he lost a race for whip -- the No. 3 job in the party leadership -- to the lower-key David E. Bonior (Mich.) in 1991.

As Hoyer fought the political battles, Judy was his sounding board. She accompanied him to the political dinners, flashing her warm smile. But her heart was in Prince George's, where she oversaw early-childhood education, including programs for disadvantaged kids. As the years went by, she wearied of politics.

"She thought it was in some ways superficial," Hoyer says. "She was really into substance."

Yet she always supported her husband's goals: civil rights, helping the less fortunate.

In 1985, Hoyer joined the congressional Helsinki Commission, which monitored human rights in the Soviet bloc. With little publicity, he flew red-eyes to Eastern Europe and Russia for the next eight years, visiting dissidents, lobbying officials to release political prisoners.

It was a chance, Hoyer says, to help "people who otherwise were powerless."

He spoke out for such causes as gays in the armed forces, even after his district was redrawn to include Southern Maryland, the home of two military bases, as well as parts of Prince George's and Anne Arundel counties.

One day, Hoyer and his wife were at an event, when a coffee cup suddenly flew from Judy's hand. "It scared her greatly," Hoyer would later tell a crowd. It was epilepsy.

Hoyer shepherded the Americans With Disabilities Act through the House, broadening rights for epileptics and others.After Tragedy, Change

After losing their 40-year grip on the House in 1994, Democrats turned to Hoyer to help with a comeback effort. He hopscotched across the country, recruiting candidates, focusing laserlike on Election Day: Nov. 5, 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0137450

The bombshell came in October. Judy had stomach cancer. Four months later, she was dead at 57.

Hoyer plunged into grief.

"You really do reflect back on all the things you did, all the travel I did overseas, all the time that was not spent with Judy and the family," he says.

"He's got all this energy; he's working 12, 16 hours a day -- that was what life was to him," says his daughter Stefany Hemmer. "My mother's death sort of jerked him into reality and said . . . there's something else out there other than Congress."

But Hoyer couldn't quit. "I sort of threw myself into work more," he says.

And the next step was the race for minority whip, against a formidable opponent: Pelosi. In 1999, they began a grueling, two-year battle. Hoyer cast himself as the pro-defense, pro-trade moderate. Pelosi promised to give the party a new face -- its first female whip.

Pelosi won.

And yet Hoyer realized the defeat wasn't as devastating as it might have been. "In comparison with losing a loved one, that loss is not nearly comparable."

Something was changing. Friends felt he'd become a better listener. His eldest daughter, Susan Taylor, says her father was "a little more interested in the human relation, not just the global relation." Hoyer began establishing "Judy Centers," fulfilling his wife's dream of creating one-stop facilities to offer poor families health, literacy and other services. Maryland now has 24 centers.

Hoyer finally rose to minority whip in 2002, when Pelosi moved up. But the "angst of ambition," he says, was easing.

"I suppose the fear of failure was not nearly as great," he says.

And then came the November 2006 earthquake that ousted the Republicans. Hoyer was the favorite to become majority leader. But Pelosi suddenly threw her support to Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.).

This time, Hoyer won.

All those nights on the road paid off, for Hoyer and the party. In the 2006 campaign alone, Hoyer helped raise $8 million for Democrats and traveled to 33 states.

"I feel a sense of accomplishment," Hoyer says. But reaching the top meant something different than it once had.Stage Presence

One recent Friday, Hoyer visited the Riderwood retirement community in Silver Spring. He strolled the stage with a microphone like a talk-show host, calling out to friends. The white-haired residents rose, clapping and cheering.

Hoyer turned somber when he spoke of the Democrats' plans to pass laws on homeland security, energy, the minimum wage. He emphasized that Pelosi sets the policy. "My job is to implement it."

Occasionally, he weaved in his own story. How he and Judy bought that first house in Friendly for $28,000. How he just became a great-grandfather.

These days, he told the crowd, "I live alone, with a wonderful woman named Charlotte."

She's a 15-year-old springer spaniel, he explained to laughter.

Though she's in failing health, he takes her everywhere. She was Judy's dog.

Staff writer Rosalind S. Helderman and staff researchers Magda Jean-Louis and Rena Kirsch contributed to this report.

Accusations Of Agency Error In Disaster Loans (NYT)

By Ron Nixon And Leslie Eaton

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Last September, the Small Business Administration, which provides most long-term rebuilding aid to disaster victims, accelerated its lending to homeowners and businesses in the Gulf Coast, responding to criticism that it had been slow to respond to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita of 2005.

But now federal investigators are looking into accusations that in speeding up its work, the agency made thousands of loans without following its own rules to avoid fraud. Current and former employees of the agency have told investigators that agency workers failed to secure proper proof that borrowers owned the houses they were supposed to rebuild or had the required insurance.

Caroline Pankove, who worked as a lawyer for the disaster-loan program at the agency from June through December of last year, complained to the agency's managers and its inspector general that employees were improperly pressured to approve loans quickly.

Loan policies were applied inconsistently, Ms. Pankove said, and disaster victims' paperwork was often misplaced or mailed out with errors.

"The rush to disburse loans put everyone at risk: the taxpayer, the agency and especially the borrowers," Ms. Pankove said in an interview. "The people that we needed to serve the most were the ones getting hurt the most."

Her complaints were echoed by Brian Cook, who worked at the agency as a paralegal last year, and by others who spoke on the condition that their names not be used because they were still employed by the agency at the disaster loan office in Fort Worth.

A spokesman for the agency's inspector general confirmed that his office was looking into the accusations but said he could not comment on a continuing investigation.

Agency officials said that they were taking the complaints seriously, but that the problems described by Ms. Pankove and others were isolated, not systemic.

"We never pushed for disbursement to be made without the proper documentation," said Steven C. Preston, who promised to reform the troubled disaster loan program when he was appointed administrator of the agency last summer.

The agency was trying to empower managers to make case-by-case judgments about loan documentation, Mr. Preston said, adding, "We can't have a cookie-cutter approach."

Mr. Preston also disputed the possibility that efforts to speed the process had opened the door to abuse. "Of course we want to get the disbursements out faster," he said, "but it's very dangerous to assume that this would lead to fraud and losses to the taxpayer."

When Mr. Preston took over the agency in July, he inherited a huge backlog of loan applications, which had grown to 94,000 by September, according to the agency. Since then, 51,000 people have received all the loan money they qualified for, 19,000 have gotten some, and 24,000 have canceled their applications.

The agency has made more than $5 billion in hurricane-related disaster loans, more than half of them since Mr. Preston took over, said Sean Rushton, the assistant administrator for communications.

One way the agency reduced its backlog was by rewarding the employees who got money into the hands of the largest number of borrowers. E-mail messages obtained by The New York Times promised cash bonuses and overtime to the most productive workers, even though at least one supervisor acknowledged that this emphasis made people uncomfortable.

"I will be honest," a supervisor, Michael V. Cremer, wrote in an e-mail message in October. "Disbursements = cash awards & overtime opportunity. I don't like it, you don't like it... but it is what it is." The message continued, "Work with your people to make these numbers look good."

Mr. Cremer did not respond to voice mail messages left at his agency office in Texas.

Leaders of the House and Senate committees overseeing the agency said they were concerned about the accusations of improper lending.

"I'm worried that there may have been too much of a focus on quotas over quality of service for disaster victims," Senator John Kerry, Democrat of Massachusetts and chairman of the Committee on Small Business and Entrepreneurship, said in a statement.

"And if that's true, it's unacceptable," Mr. Kerry said. "If in a rush to get paperwork off their desks the S.B.A. shifted the burden to borrowers who have lost everything to Katrina, that's not a policy, that's an abdication of responsibility."

Despite the agency's new emphasis on speeding the lending process, disaster victims say they continue to experience problems. Donna Colosino, whose family owns a small company in Louisiana that sells power generation equipment, told the House Small Business Committee earlier this month that more than 20 loan officers had dealt with her case. And she said she sent the same documents to the agency more than a dozen times.

"Working with S.B.A. after a disaster is like having a second job," Ms. Colosino said. "I swear to you on my father's grave that this is the story. I am not an anomaly."

Hearing Urged On Guard Woes (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

The ranking Republican on the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee has called for a hearing to examine the Defense Department's "chronic deficiencies" in supporting homeland security and civil support missions by the National Guard.

The request by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia comes in the wake of two reports by the Government Accountability Office (GAO) saying that Defense has not adequately addressed Guard equipment and training requirements and that Army units charged with chemical and biological attack response are understaffed and underequipped.

"As we continue to ask more of the National Guard, it's our job to make sure they're adequately staffed, equipped and trained to perform their missions at home," Mr. Davis said in a letter to committee Chairman Rep. Henry A. Waxman, California Democrat.

"I'm asking for these hearings because it's abundantly clear they are not," he said. "First, we don't give them the training and equipment they need. Then we subject them to uncaring and uncoordinated care when they're wounded. Hearings on these issues should be a top priority for Congress."

Mr. Davis said one of the GAO reports noted that even though 12 of 15 "national planning scenarios" issued by the White House Homeland Security Council involve chemical, biological, radiological, nuclear or high-yield explosive response, the ability of Army chemical and biological units, especially National Guard and Reserve units, to concurrently perform both their original war-fighting chemical and biological defense mission and their homeland-defense mission is doubtful.

On Jan. 30, the GAO said that five years after the September 11 attacks, the Defense Department has not moved effectively to identify National Guard homeland-defense equipment and training requirements.

Mr. Davis said that the types and quantities of equipment the National Guard requires to perform domestic missions have not been identified in any systematic way and that the Defense Department has not acted on comments from state officials about growing strain on equipment and personnel.

On Feb. 20, a second GAO report said management actions were needed to "close the gap" between Army chemical unit preparedness and national priorities. The report, which focused on the readiness of Army units assigned to chemical and biological preparedness and response, said most are National Guard and Reserve units that are "woefully unprepared, understaffed and underequipped."

Mr. Davis sponsored the National Guard Empowerment Act of 2007 to allow the chief of the National Guard Bureau to establish common requirements and a budget that would allow the Guard to be equipped and trained for crucial homeland missions.

Honoring The Stars Of Government (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

The Oscars are over. It's time to pick up the red carpet and move on to the Sammies.

Nominations for the 2007 Service to America Medals, presented annually to honor government employees for their achievements and commitment to federal service, are being accepted at the nonprofit Partnership for Public Service.

The deadline for submitting nominations, at http://www.servicetoamericamedals.org, is March 8. The medals, which are presented at a gala dinner, are accompanied by cash prizes -- from $3,000 to $10,000.

Unlike the stars of the silver screen, most federal employees work behind the scenes and rarely on camera. Previous medal winners include the Federal Trade Commission team that created the National Do Not Call Registry, a federal scientist leading the effort to prepare for a catastrophic flu pandemic, and an Internal Revenue Service employee responsible for the e-file system that speeds tax refunds.

Nicole Nelson-Jean of the Energy Department won the award in 2004, when she was 28, for leading a U.S. delegation to negotiate an agreement with Russian officials to help secure Russian nuclear weapons. She went on to serve as director of the Energy Department's Asia office in Tokyo and currently heads the department's North and South American threat-reduction office.

Winning the award, she said, renewed her appreciation for government service and has brought her opportunities to speak up for public service. "It is an unfortunate image of federal workers, or the civil service, that you get stuck in a job that is bureaucratic, and not fun, and that you don't meet interesting people," Nelson-Jean said. "That is so untrue. It is so not that."

The partnership was founded by businessman Samuel J. Heyman in 2001 to call attention to the importance of federal service and to help improve the way the government works. Max Stier serves as the partnership's president and chief executive.

The group recently received a $4 million grant from the Annenberg Foundation to finance two projects over the next four years.

Stier said the partnership will launch the Walter and Leonore Annenberg Federal Leadership Institute, and the Walter and Leonore Annenberg Public Service Speakers Bureau this year. The late Walter H. Annenberg was an ambassador to London, and Leonore Annenberg was the U.S. chief of protocol during the Reagan administration.

The leadership institute will focus on mid-level federal supervisors and help build their management skills, while the speakers bureau will send federal employees to college campuses to talk up government careers.

The 2007 winners of the Service to America Medals will be honored at a Washington gala in September. Campbell Brown, a NBC News anchor and correspondent, will be the master of ceremonies, the partnership said.Tempting Target

Federal retiree health benefits just keep showing up on budget-cutting tables.

A "Budget Options" report from the Congressional Budget Office, released over the weekend, includes a recommendation that would reduce the government's subsidy for retiree health-care costs. President Bush proposed a similar policy change in his fiscal 2008 budget, sent to Congress early this month.

The CBO and Bush administration proposals would reduce subsidies for premiums for retirees who had relatively short government careers. Federal retirees can now continue in the federal employee health program if they carried insurance during their last five years of service and are eligible to start collecting retirement benefits.

The CBO, in its report, said that basing retiree health benefits on length of service would "help bring federal benefits closer to those of private companies.

"Federal retirees' health benefits are significantly better than those offered by most large private firms, which have been aggressively paring or eliminating retirement benefits for newly hired workers," the report said.

For new retirees, the CBO proposed that the government's share of premium costs be cut by 2 percentage points for every year of service fewer than 20. The CBO said that about 14 percent of the nearly 85,000 retirees who continue in the federal health-care program each year have careers shorter than 20 years.

The proposal would create savings of about $770 million over 10 years, the CBO said.

The government currently picks up about 70 percent of the federal retiree premium, and the Bush proposal would require employees to have 10 years of government service to keep the subsidy. Under the Bush plan, the government would pay half of the subsidy for those with five years of service and would phase in higher contributions for those with service of more than five years but fewer than 10.

Although Congress is looking for ways to reduce federal spending, it seems unlikely that House and Senate Democrats and moderate Republicans would take up politically sensitive budget cuts that roll back promised benefits. A similar proposal in 2005 by a group of House conservatives, the Republican Study Committee, to help pay for Hurricane Katrina relief and recovery, went nowhere.

No Worries: Banks Keeping Less Money In Reserve (WSJ)

By Robin Sidel And David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Banks might be putting too much faith in their borrowers.

As more consumers and companies start having difficulty paying their debts, the funds that banks set aside to cover soured loans stand at the lowest level since at least 1990.

The situation is causing consternation among regulators. And as credit quality begins to deteriorate from unusually strong levels, the issue also is causing jitters on Wall Street, where analysts predict the need to boost loan-loss reserves will cut into banking-industry profits this year.

Banks establish reserves for a portion of loan portfolios or big individual loans that they estimate could go unpaid. The reserves ensure that banks have enough capital to cover any losses from loans that go bad.

But each increase in those reserves results in a charge that cuts into banks' profits.

Typically, investors and regulators fret that banks overestimate these charges during good times so they will have a cookie-jar to dip into when times are rougher. Now, though, the worry is that banks haven't put aside enough money to cover bad loans because times have been so good and because they haven't wanted to damp profit growth.

In a December advisory, regulators reminded bank executives that they should use the leeway available to them in calculating reserves because "we do believe there is risk building in the system," says Kathryn Dick, deputy comptroller for credit and market risk at the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which regulates banks.

That guidance "was a heads up, a shot across the bow, if you will, to the banks," said Lynn Turner, managing director of proxy advisory and accounting-research firm Glass Lewis & Co. and a former chief accountant with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The low reserve levels aren't triggering any concern about the financial soundness of the nation's banking system. Bank failures are quite rare. When regulators closed a small bank near Pittsburgh this month, it was the first bank failure since June 2004.

Still, the current level of loan-loss reserves is reigniting a longstanding debate among regulators about how banks calculate the amount of money to put aside for bad loans and the appropriate time to do so. The Financial Accounting Standards Board has recently started to consider whether banks should be required to disclose more information to investors about the way they calculate reserves.

Banks set aside an average of 1.09% of the total value of their loans at the end of last year, according to data from 518 publicly traded banks compiled by SNL Financial for The Wall Street Journal. That is a dip from 1.14% in 2005 and from 1.63% in 1992 and 1.48% in 1990. The SNL figures date to 1990.

"There is a growing concern about loan quality and it isn't reflected at all in the reserves," says Brian Shullaw, an associate director at SNL, a Charlottesville, Va., research firm that focuses on the financial-services industry.

According to SNL, the nation's three biggest banks had above-average reserves at the end of 2006: 1.32% at Citigroup Inc., 1.28% at Bank of America Corp. and 1.51% at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.

Some large regional banks' reserves are well below average. Among them: SunTrust Bank Inc.'s 0.81%, First Horizon National Corp.'s 0.87% and Washington Mutual Inc.'s 0.60%, SNL says.

"Our reserve levels are reflective of our strong credit culture and what we believe to be the lower loss-risk profile of our loan portfolio," said a SunTrust spokesman.

Marlin Mosby, chief financial officer of First Horizon, said the bank's reserve level reflects the high percentage of its collateralized loans -- such as second mortgages -- which have a lower likelihood of default than other unsecured loans. He also noted that the bank increased its reserves in 2006 as the economy cooled somewhat.

Said a spokesman for Washington Mutual: "At year end, WaMu's reserve levels were appropriate considering that our loan portfolio primarily consisted of the highest-quality loans."

Investors will feel the pain if banks boost reserve levels.

Over the past few years, investors have benefited from the lower reserve levels because they helped boost profits. The banks say that they have been draining their reserves because few borrowers have defaulted on their loans. From 2004 to 2006, the nation's biggest banks received 37% of their earnings growth from reductions in their loan-loss reserves, according to a Feb. 12 Morgan Stanley report. Big regional banks got a bigger boost, with the freed-up reserves accounting for 52% of earnings growth, according to Betsy Graseck, a Morgan Stanley banking analyst.

A number of banks have drawn down their reserves for bad loans to "apparently unsustainably low levels," according to a recent report from the Center for Financial Research & Analysis, a Rockville, Md., accounting-research firm.

Indeed, banks are expected to soon start reversing course and building reserves amid growing expectations that the boom times are drawing to an end. Although loan defaults and charge-offs remain at historically low levels, bank executives predict that credit quality, which has weakened, will erode further this year.

Ms. Graseck, who is predicting that big-bank earnings will rise 5% this year, estimates that a 10% increase in reserves could reduce that earnings growth by four percentage points.

The trend comes at a time when bank profits are also expected to be hurt this year by short-term interest rates going higher than long-term ones -- the so-called inverted yield curve. Banks typically profit by borrowing short-term and lending long-term, so when the yield curve inverts, profit margins get squeezed.

"All of these banks are perfectly sound, but I do think a number of banks will miss earnings estimates based on rising loan provisioning," says Kevin St. Pierre, a banking analyst at Sanford C. Bernstein & Co.

Historically, banks tend to see their provisions for bad loans increase when interest rates start to rise because higher rates cause problems for weaker borrowers and slow the economy. But that hasn't yet happened, even as the Federal Reserve has steadily raised rates to a current level of 5.25% from historic lows.

Whether and when banks should take additional provisions for loans that might not be repaid is a point of contention among bankers, regulators and accounting rule makers. Many bankers would like to set aside funds for possible bad loans in good times, forming a cushion for when things get tough. But that isn't permitted because such moves can be abused to manipulate earnings.

As a result, accounting rules generally don't allow banks to use provisions as "rainy-day funds." Instead, they require banks to take a provision when it is "probable" that a loan has gone bad. So, a bank can't establish a provision for, say, 2% of a loan portfolio just because that is the amount that typically tends to turn bad. Instead, it must assess an array of events that lead it to believe a loss is probable.

Greenspan, Even Out Of Fed, Still Steals The Stock Show (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Alan Greenspan isn't Federal Reserve chairman any more, but he still can move markets.

After Mr. Greenspan told a Hong Kong business conference, via satellite, that a recession is "possible" later this year, U.S. stocks slumped and bond yields declined, pushing bond prices higher.

The Greenspan news, together with a two-month closing high in oil futures, overshadowed investor excitement over the latest massive dump of private money into stocks: the planned $32 billion acquisition of Texas utility TXU by a group of investors.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average, down for the fourth consecutive day after hitting four consecutive records, fell 15.22 points, or 0.12%, to 12632.26. It is up 1.4% this year, more than 150 points from the latest record finish of 12786.64 hit Feb. 20.

"Greenspan talking about a possible recession gave a little bit of an impetus to sell here," said Jay Suskind, director of trading at brokerage firm Ryan Beck in Florham Park, N.J.

Mr. Greenspan didn't predict a recession, but said he couldn't rule one out. Corporate profit margins "have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of" the business cycle, he said. That reinforced fears about the weak housing market and defaults in the subprime lending market.

The stock declines were modest, however, as investors await data due this week on home sales, inflation, economic growth and manufacturing.

Oil futures rose 25 cents to $61.39 a barrel, the fifth increase in six sessions. Traders blamed the latest winter storm, which could increase energy demand.

Treasury-bond yields fell on concerns that a soft economy would hold down demand for credit, driving market interest rates lower.

Concerns about the economy's direction also showed up the gold market, which is a refuge in times of worry. Gold futures hit a nine-month high in New York, rising $3.40 to $686.50 a troy ounce. Gold now is $33.30 from its 26-year closing high of $719.80, hit May 11, 2006.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 0.13%, or 1.82 points, to 1449.37, up 2.2% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.42%, or 10.58 points, to 2504.52, up 3.7% in 2007.

Excitement over the TXU deal did push the Dow Jones Utilities Average to another record, up 2.6% at 493.71. It has risen 8.1% this year.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.40%, or 1.02 points, to 255.85.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks retreated1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.75 billion shares, as 1,649 stocks rose and 1,658 fell.

Bond prices gained2. The 10-year Treasury note rose 12/32, pushing the yield down to 4.631%. The 30-year bond was up 25/32 to yield 4.733%.

The dollar weakened3. Late in New York, it traded at 120.57 yen, down from 121.09, while the euro rose to $1.3184 from $1.3166.

Gasoline Prices Continue Climbing (USAT)

By James R. Healey, Usa Today

USA Today, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK — The average price of gasoline in the U.S. jumped 8.7 cents the past week to $2.383 a gallon for regular, the fourth consecutive weekly increase and the highest average price in five months, the U.S. Energy Information Administration reported Monday.

The U.S. average is 12.9 cents more than it was a year ago.

Prices were up in all regions, EIA reported. Increases ranged from 6.3 cents per gallon in the Rocky Mountain area to 10.3 cents along the Gulf Coast.

Highest area average in the continental U.S. was $2.796 in California. Lowest — despite the big jump — was in the Gulf Coast: $2.234.

EIA doesn't break out Hawaii, where prices usually are highest. According to travel organization AAA, Hawaii's statewide average Monday was $2.859. Two of the state's metropolitan areas averaged more than $3.

EIA forecasts monthly averages won't break $2.50 this year, and discounts talk of a third consecutive year when the weekly U.S. average tops $3.

DOJ_NMG_0137456

The last two years were extraordinary, says EIA analyst Mike Burdette. In 2005 "there was the hurricane (Rita); '06 was driven by (high) crude oil prices. This year we have crude oil staying at about $60 a barrel, down from peaks of $77."

Assuming no catastrophes, he says, "we don't see any reason to expect a run-up in crude oil prices this year."

EIA says the price of crude oil makes up about 54% of the retail price of gasoline.

The price of benchmark West Texas Intermediate, also called light, sweet crude oil, rose 25 cents a barrel in Monday trading, to $61.39 a barrel. That's the highest closing price since Dec. 22.

Snowy weather's implied increase in demand for heating oil was partly behind the jump.

Even if the price of oil were to suddenly drop, gasoline would continue to rise. Retailers say they're far from recovering the staggering increases in their wholesale costs.

"My laid-in cost right now is $2.26 (a gallon) and most of my stores are at $2.21 or $2.23," says Sam Turner, president of Calfee of Dalton in Dalton, Ga. He operates 129 Favorite Markets and Com-Pac convenience store gasoline stations in three states.

"It'd take us 10 days to catch up to the 17 cents (in increased wholesale cost) they gave us just last week. And that's if nothing changed. But we got another two cents tonight," he said late Monday.

Retailers are notified of new wholesale prices late in the afternoon. Some retailers raise prices immediately; others hold off temporarily.

Gasoline retailers say they can't raise prices as fast as their costs go up because they'd lose business to stations willing to sell for less. So they often lose money on fuel sales and recover it on coffee, snacks, newspapers and the like.

"I'm in the gasoline business for experience and the convenience store business for profits," Turner quipped.

A Lawyer's Speech Opens A New Venue In Ongoing Battle (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

When Texas plaintiffs' lawyer Anthony Buzbee gave a provocative address last year to maritime defense attorneys in Lake Las Vegas, Nev., he says he had no idea that an audience member about 20 feet away from him was taping the speech.

Now, in the ongoing battle between businesses and the lawyers who sue them, his words are coming back to haunt him as pro-industry lobbyists and Texas legislators use the speech to push for limits on where workers may file lawsuits if they're hurt at sea.

According to a transcript, Mr. Buzbee told the small gathering that he was particularly fond of Starr County, on the western edge of Texas' Rio Grande Valley. "That venue probably adds about seventy-five percent to the value of the case," he said. "You've got an injured Hispanic client, you've got a completely Hispanic jury, and you've got an Hispanic judge. All right. That's how it is."

In other parts of Texas, Mr. Buzbee went on, a plaintiff may have the burden of showing "here's what the company did wrong, all right? But when you're in Starr County, traditionally, you need to just show that the guy was working, and he was hurt. And that's the hurdle: Just prove that he wasn't hurt at Wal-Mart, buying something on his off time, and traditionally, you win those cases."

To his opponents, this was clear evidence of "venue shopping," a pervasive source of controversy in the legal world where one side seeks the friendliest locale to try a case. To Mr. Buzbee, he was just describing the advantages of a uniquely flexible provision in Texas law that allows plaintiffs in maritime cases the convenience of bringing suit in the county where they live. He was also making it clear to frequent courtroom opponents what he saw as the benefits of settling quickly rather than going to trial in places like Starr County.

In the past five years, thanks in part to Mr. Buzbee, there has been a surge in the Rio Grande Valley of lawsuits on behalf of seamen alleging injuries on dredging vessels from Florida to New Jersey to Bahrain. The predominantly Hispanic and relatively poor region in southern Texas has gained a national reputation for large jury verdicts. Mr. Buzbee says he has won several recent dredging verdicts in the Valley, ranging from $450,000 to about $1.4 million, and notes that he has settled many more for confidential amounts.

Congress and various states have passed laws limiting plaintiffs' flexibility to choose favored venues. But "personal-injury lawyers can still often shop cases as fast as their little legs will carry them," says Darren McKinney, a spokesman for the pro-business American Tort Reform Association.

A former marine who served in the Persian Gulf and later graduated second in his class from the University of Houston Law Center, the 38-year-old Mr. Buzbee specializes in personal-injury cases. Lawyers describe him as bright, aggressive and flamboyant -- he is a fan of cigars and vintage automobiles. "He's the kind of guy who wants his presence to be felt when he walks into a room," says James Watkins, a Galveston, Texas, lawyer who has defended cases against Mr. Buzbee.

Last May, Mr. Buzbee was invited to speak at the three-day seminar at the Ritz Carlton in Lake Las Vegas hosted by law firms that defend maritime cases, the people he usually squares off against in court -- a circumstance that's not unusual in the legal profession.

Mr. Buzbee says his comments in Nevada reflect the fact that "under maritime law, a plaintiff is supposed to win if he gets hurt at work." In conservative Texas locales, however, he says, plaintiffs often must meet a higher burden, even though it's not required by law. He says that juries in places like Starr County do a better job of following the law.

The immediate reaction to his speech was muted. But late last year, Mr. Buzbee says, he was in court in Galveston, where his firm is based, when a colleague told him that he had heard about his Nevada speech. Since then, Mr. Buzbee estimates, 35 to 40 lawyers and state legislators have called him, saying that they heard about the speech or had seen a transcript of it.

The pro-business Texans for Lawsuit Reform has been aggressive in circulating a transcript of his remarks. "Mr. Buzbee is describing why we have to fix the [venue] system," says Denis Calabrese, a spokesman for the group.

In civil matters, plaintiffs generally must file suit where an alleged wrong occurred or where a defendant is based. That is also generally the case in maritime matters, and there are complex rules for figuring out which venue is closest to the site of an accident at sea. Texas, though, has a uniquely flexible rule, allowing maritime plaintiffs to file suit in the county where they reside. Maritime companies that hire workers are thus exposed to lawsuits.

Maritime companies report a recent surge in Valley suits. Illinois-based Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. faced its first-ever Valley suit in 2002, but says that it has since been sued 33 times there. "We have been hiring Valley workers for 20 years," says David Simonelli, a company vice president who says he recently bought cowboy boots, because he is spending so much time there. "There is no logical reason for the explosion of suits."

Weeks Marine Inc., based in Cranford, N.J., was sued three times in the Valley prior to 2003, but says that it has since faced 17 suits there, the majority based on dredging incidents that occurred outside Texas, says Thomas Langan, a risk manager for the company. Filings increased, once "attorneys realized what a lucrative judicial hellhole exists down there," he says.

Mr. Buzbee counters that he has filed more Valley suits recently because more Valley workers are getting injured. He says he believes that budget crunches at dredging companies have caused them to be less safe.

On Feb. 16, Corbin Van Arsdale, a Republican legislator from Houston, introduced a bill that would amend state law so that only in rare cases is a plaintiff's county of residence an appropriate venue for maritime-injury suits. Plaintiffs' lawyers "like the Valley, because they get more frequent and larger verdicts," says Mr. Van Arsdale, who says he has heard about the Buzbee speech but hasn't seen a transcript.

Texas plaintiffs' lawyers argue that injured maritime plaintiffs will have a harder time vindicating their rights if they are forced to travel to the venue of an accident or to a defendant's home base. "Most of us want to try lawsuits where we live, as a matter of convenience," says John Stevenson, a Texas lawyer who has filed many dredging suits in the Valley. "In the Valley," he adds, "the juries and judges are professional."

Still, not all plaintiffs' lawyers are rallying behind Mr. Buzbee. Texas plaintiffs' lawyer Ronald Krist says he faults Mr. Buzbee for stirring the venue pot. "Lawyers are always looking for a more favorable venue, but to say in a public forum that notwithstanding the evidence, an Hispanic jury and judge will allow you to win undermines public confidence" in the system, he says. "Those are the sorts of things you shouldn't whisper to your wife in the middle of the night."

Mr. Buzbee, however, says he never expected his speech to reach the multitudes. As he approached the microphone at the Ritz Carlton last year, Mr. Buzbee recalls saying to an attorney who had helped organize the event: " 'This isn't going to be recorded, is it? You want me to speak candidly, don't you?' " Mr. Buzbee says the attorney assured him there would be no recordings.

Earlier this month, Mr. Buzbee filed suit in Galveston state court, alleging that Great Lakes Dredge & Dock's Mr. Simonelli, "surreptitiously recorded" the speech. Later, Mr. Buzbee claims, the Dredging Contractors of America, a D.C.-based nonprofit, disseminated a transcript of the speech "throughout the state of Texas." The suit asserts that Great Lakes and the Dredging Contractors violated anti-eavesdropping laws.

The Dredging Contractors of America declined to comment. Mr. Simonelli says he taped many sessions at the Nevada event. "I did not know of any agreement prohibiting the recording of any seminar," he says.

Paul Yetter, counsel to Great Lakes, shines a light back on Mr. Buzbee. "He has no one to blame but himself for saying those things."

Judge Rejects Cap On Awards In Ferry Crash (NYT)

By Andy Newman

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

A federal judge yesterday rejected New York City's attempt to use an obscure 19th-century maritime law to cap its liability in the 2003 crash of a Staten Island ferry at $14 million.

The ruling exposes the city to tens of millions of dollars in potential damage awards to relatives of those killed and to scores of people injured when the ferry, the Andrew J. Barberi, crashed into a maintenance pier at the St. George Ferry Terminal on Staten Island.

The city had argued that the accident was covered by an 1851 act, aimed at encouraging investment in the shipbuilding industry, that limited a boat owner's liability to the value of the boat minus the repair costs — in this case $14.4 million. The judge ruled, however, that the 1851 law did not apply if the city's managers had been negligent, and he found that they had been.

The city has already paid $27.6 million to settle two-thirds of the 186 damage claims. Of the 11 people killed in the crash, the estates of only two have settled with the city, for $3 million and $450,000.

The amounts of many settlements were held down, lawyers for the plaintiffs said, by the city's argument that if it succeeded in capping the liability, the plaintiffs stood to win relatively little.

"The courthouse door is now open for all of the claimants to get just and proper compensation," said Anthony Bisignano III, a lawyer for 10 of the remaining 65 plaintiffs.

Mr. Bisignano said that in addition to the nine outstanding death claims, there were many claims from passengers with serious injuries, including amputations and paralysis.

The city said it would consider appealing.

Mr. Bisignano said that the 1851 act was the same one cited by the owners of the Titanic in an attempt to "limit the amount of damages to the value of a couple of dozen lifeboats."

On the afternoon of Oct. 15, 2003, the ferry slammed into a pier at top speed after the assistant captain operating it, Richard J. Smith, blacked out during the last half mile of the trip from Manhattan to Staten Island. The accident, one of the worst mass transit disasters in the city's history, ripped the side of the 3,300-ton boat open. People were crushed, mangled and decapitated.

A city rule requiring that two captains be in the pilot house in the front of the ferry while it is in motion was not followed. The captain, Michael J. Gansas, was on board at the time of the crash, but in the pilot house that faced Manhattan, not in the one that faced Staten Island, as he should have been.

The city had also argued that because its two-pilot rule was stricter than required by general negligence principles, the violation of the rule did not constitute negligence. In any case, the city said, individual crew members, not the city, were at fault.

But the judge, Edward R. Korman of United States District Court in Brooklyn, rejected those arguments. He wrote that by adopting the two-pilot rule, the city acknowledged a serious risk of accident if the pilot were incapacitated, and that knowledge of that risk required the city to remedy it.

And he found that it was the city's fault that the two-pilot rule was disregarded.

The city's former director of ferry operations, Patrick Ryan, who pleaded guilty to seaman's manslaughter in 2005, said then that he had not taken adequate steps to make sure that crews knew the two-pilot rule and to enforce it.

Judge Korman wrote, "The blame for this laxity lies squarely on the shoulders of the city."

Kathleen Healy, a mother of four whose husband, John Healy, 44, a lawyer, was killed, applauded the judge for holding the city accountable.

"It wasn't just one person passing out behind the wheel of a ferry," she said. "This was about an entire crew, an entire department, up to the commissioner of transportation."

Mr. Smith, the assistant captain, said he was suffering from extreme fatigue and was on painkillers when he passed out at the helm. He pleaded guilty in August 2004 to 11 counts of seaman's manslaughter. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison. Mr. Ryan was sentenced to a year and a day.

The city released a statement yesterday reiterating its position that Mr. Smith was entirely to blame for the accident, because he "took over the operation and navigation of the ferry when he was unfit to do so, and did not disclose that fact to anyone."

Lloyd Joseph, a construction worker injured in the crash who has required three operations on his legs and now walks with a cane, said he hoped the city would not try to delay the day of reckoning any further.

He said he had pulled one of his two children out of college because he could not afford tuition without his wages.

"I'm very pleased today with the decision by the judge," said Mr. Joseph, 65. "My whole bank account is exhausted."

Schwarzenegger Urges End To Divisiveness In Washington (MCT)

By Clea Benson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON - Sounding more like a motivational speaker than a politician, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Monday urged Democrats and Republicans in Washington to put aside their partisan differences and get to work for the good of the country.

The Republican governor told an audience at the National Press Club that Congress and the White House should follow the example of California, where Democrats and Republicans have worked together recently on environmental legislation and infrastructure issues.

Schwarzenegger urged President Bush and Congress to move toward the political center. He also said they should just try to be friendly.

"How come Democrats and Republicans out here don't schmooze with each other?" he asked.

The Austria-born governor is constitutionally barred from running for president. But that hasn't stopped him from claiming a piece of the national spotlight during a presidential campaign season. He's planning to give speeches nationwide this year, preaching an approach to politics that he calls "post-partisanship." And he's using a visit to Washington this week for the National Governors Association conference as a national platform.

"Post-partisanship," he said, "is the new concept of Republicans and Democrats giving birth to new ideas together."

Schwarzenegger also urged federal lawmakers to move toward the political center on the issue of illegal immigration, calling for enhanced security at the borders and a guest worker program.

"What about being realistic and just actually solving the problem?" he told the Press Club audience.

As a governor, Schwarzenegger has limited power over some of the issues he talks about, such as the war in Iraq. But his movie-star fame gives him a unique ability to draw attention. At a signing ceremony Monday for the Western Regional Climate Action Initiative - a regional agreement by California, Oregon, Washington, Arizona and New Mexico to reduce greenhouse gas emissions in their states - a huddle of media descended on Schwarzenegger. Meanwhile, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who's seeking the Democratic nomination for the presidency, waited in the background.

Schwarzenegger, citing his failed 2005 campaign to pass several Republican-leaning ballot initiatives, said he doesn't think he's perfect. "I contributed to the polarization," he said.

But he took a chiding tone with Washington lawmakers.

"All of this energy is being spent on bitterness; all of this energy is being spent on maneuvering," he said. "Imagine if that same energy were put into working together to build a consensus."

The key to his success, he said, was his focus on building relationships.

"In the courtyard of the state Capitol, I have a politically incorrect smoking tent," he said. "People come in, Democrats and Republicans, and they take off their jackets and they take off their ties, they smoke a stogie and they schmooze."

He had advice for everyone: Democrats should stop "running down" the president. Republicans, he said, should stop questioning the motives of Democrats who oppose the war in Iraq.

"To the president," he said, "I say get yourself a smoking tent."

Arnold Pushes 'Centrist' Immigration Approach (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger yesterday punctuated a three-day media blitz in the nation's capital -- one in which he said he is open to running for the U.S. Senate -- with a National Press Club speech on how his "post-partisan" approach can fix the immigration problem.

"It is time that we reintroduce the concept of the mainstream back into the American political life, and the place to start it is immigration," said Mr. Schwarzenegger, a Republican.

Mr. Schwarzenegger, in town for the annual National Governors Association meeting, promoted his feel-good centrism on Sunday talk shows and in exclusive newspaper interviews over the weekend.

Then, at a lunchtime press club speech yesterday, minutes after leaving a meeting with President Bush in the Oval Office, Mr. Schwarzenegger said there is "a totally reasonable, centrist approach to the whole [immigration issue]."

The Austrian-born former film star said what Mr. Bush and many lawmakers have said: The U.S. should "secure our borders" and provide "a guest-worker program and [give] everyone citizenship who is already in the country and meet a certain criteria."

Mr. Bush reiterated his position on immigration yesterday, with an emphasis on securing the border, during a speech to nearly all the country's governors in the White House State Dining Room. Mr. Bush has previously said he supports a guest-worker program. Congress is set to take up the issue this spring.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's proposal, while not original, is part of his carefully crafted message of "post-partisanship" that appears aimed at a national audience, and dependent on the stratospheric fame and name recognition of the Mr. Olympia bodybuilding champion and star of the "Terminator" film series.

The governor is also receiving national attention for a recently approved energy plan and is working on reforming California's health care policies.

Mr. Schwarzenegger might be laying the groundwork for a run at national office in the future, although he is disqualified from running for president because the Constitution limits the office to U.S.-born citizens.

In an interview with the Politico published online Saturday, Mr. Schwarzenegger indicated that he is open to running for the U.S. Senate or for mayor of Los Angeles, after his second term as governor expires in 2011.

Republican hopefuls for president in 2008 -- Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani -- have also courted Mr. Schwarzenegger, in the hopes that the action hero's appeal might help them win a state that traditionally tilts Democratic.

In his speech, Mr. Schwarzenegger dispatched advice to Democrats and Republicans in Congress and to Mr. Bush, on how to handle the current Iraq war debate.

"To the Democrats, I say stop running down the president, and just tell the people what you would do. And to the Republicans, I say stop questioning the motives of the Democrats on the war and accept their right to believe in what they want," Mr. Schwarzenegger said.

Then, Mr. Schwarzenegger -- who has erected what he called a "politically incorrect smoking tent," where Democrats and Republicans "schmooze" together at the governor's mansion in Sacramento -- recommended that Mr. Bush follow his example.

"And to the president I say, get yourself a smoking tent," Mr. Schwarzenegger said to laughter in the packed ballroom.

White House spokesman Tony Snow did not respond to a request for comment on the likelihood of a White House smoking tent.

Democrats May Try To Curb 527s (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 27, 2007

Senate Democrats are considering placing curbs on soft-money 527 groups amid evidence that they are beginning to lose the political advantage these largely unregulated funds have given them over Republicans.

This is a move Democrats had strenuously opposed during the last Congress, when they were believed to benefit from the lion's share of 527 money, but now there is evidence that more of the money from these groups, named for a clause in the tax code, is flowing to the GOP.

Meanwhile, the second-ranking Senate Democrat, Assistant Majority Leader Dick Durbin (Ill.), is planning to introduce legislation in the next few weeks that would provide public funding for congressional candidates who qualify. He will unveil his bill in mid-March alongside Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), who has introduced similar legislation in the last several Congresses.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has weighed in by announcing that she supports public funding of congressional races, an idea that has not received serious consideration since 1993. And influential Democratic chairmen such as Appropriations Chairman David Obey (Wis.) and Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (Mass.) also support it.

Senate Rules Committee Chairwoman Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) is expected to hold hearings on a broad array of potential campaign-finance reforms. She will look closely at the activities of 527 groups, which exploited a loophole in election law to raise more than $500 million in unregulated political funds in the last four years.

"I promised a group of people that we would do some hearings on it," said Feinstein. "We'll take a look at the 527, what it is today and where it appears to be going. I'd like to know exactly what 527s are doing. My exposure to them is necessarily limited, as it is for most members. It's when you have a 527 weighing in against you that you want to know where this money is coming from."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has also said he is open to supporting new regulations for 527 groups, which can raise unlimited amounts of money to spend on federal elections. Reid, however, said that proposed legislation must be viewed with other proposals, such as restrictions on non-profit advocacy groups that have ramped up their spending in national races.

"We have to look at all of it — it can't be the only one," Reid said of 527 reform. "As long as it's part of an overall package on campaign-finance reform."

Though Democrats are approaching 527s cautiously, that they are approaching it at all represents a policy shift.

"The whole dynamic on the 527 issue obviously has changed," said Meredith McGehee, the policy director of the Campaign Legal Center, who played a central advocacy role when Congress last passed landmark campaign reform in 2002.

While Democrats overwhelmingly supported the 2002 legislation, they have largely opposed efforts since then to curb 527s.

"The last time, those of us who supported efforts to deal with 527s got most of our support from the Republican side," said McGehee. "What we've heard subsequent to the election is that Democrats were rethinking where they were on 527s because they were not getting the bang for the buck they expected and it was an equal-opportunity problem. Some Democrats are beginning to question whether Republicans may be better off in the long term [unless the law is changed]."

In the 2006 election cycle, the Republican Governors Association (RGA) raised significantly more money than any 527 group, according to Political Money Line, a nonpartisan group that tracks political spending. The RGA raised $42 million, nearly $14 million more than the second-biggest group, the Democratic Governors Association. The fourth-richest 527 was the Republican State Leadership Committee, which pulled in $19 million.

The conservative Club for Growth, which raised $6.4 million, ranked 10th among 527s in the last cycle. The Economic Freedom Fund, which also advocates for lower taxes and less government regulation, raked in over $5 million.

Steve Weissman, the associate director for policy at the Campaign Finance Institute, another group tallying political spending, said that Republican gains are less dramatic when 527s that spend money for state elections are set aside.

He said that 527s concentrating on federal races gave more than twice as much to Democrats than Republicans in the last election cycle. But he said the disparity was even wider in the run-up to the 2004 election, when Democratic-allied groups outspent GOP-allied groups by a three-to-one ratio.

Advocates of reform such as Joan Claybrook, the president of Public Citizen, said there is pressure on Democratic leaders to act because many newly elected lawmakers had signed pledges to "clean up Congress," to reduce the influence of lobbyists, and to provide public financing to candidates who agree not to accept public contributions.

Publicly financed campaigns and 527 reform go hand in hand because groups that have the ability to spend millions in unregulated funds threaten to overwhelm candidates who vow to abide by clean election laws.

"I'm real happy about it," said Claybrook of Democrats' new willingness to review 527 reform. "They were resistant in the past. I'm really pleased that they're reconsidering that."

Claybrook said that many new members won election to Congress in November because "the public was disgusted with lobbyists controlling the process."

Howard Gantman, Feinstein's spokesman on the Rules Committee, said his boss would work with Durbin on public financing legislation and explore ways to reduce the costs of campaigning.

"We're going to be looking at a number of issues. The issue she is most focused on is high cost of TV advertising in federal campaigns," he said. "Sen. Feinstein believes the airwaves are public airwaves and there should be a way to get more information about candidates to the public."

Gantman said she would also look at reforming leadership political action committees, which lawmakers use to distribute funds to their colleagues, and reforming the presidential public financing system.

Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) has introduced legislation that would restructure presidential public financing for the 2012 election as well as legislation that would require that Senate candidates file electronic campaign finance reports, which are easier to review than paper forms.

States Work On Proposals To Make Voting Easier (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON — Proposals designed to make voting easier and ballots more secure are beginning to advance in several states.

The proposals range from allowing voters to register until Election Day to expanding the use of absentee ballots and early in-person voting. Several states and Congress also are promoting paper trails for electronic voting machines.

The trend follows several years in which states passed tighter restrictions, such as requiring photo identification and proof of citizenship. Opponents of those restrictions, some of which were blocked by court action, are behind the push to bring more voters to the polls.

"There will be some legislatures that will be more receptive to those ideas," says Doug Chapin of Electionline.org, a non-partisan news and research organization.

The trend toward making it easier to register and vote could help Democrats in 2008, particularly in battleground states that will decide who wins the White House. Minorities and the poor would benefit the most, and they tend to vote for Democrats, says Kimball Brace of Election Data Services, a political consulting firm.

Democrats won six more governor's offices and 10 more state legislative chambers in November. They hold 28 governor's offices and control 23 legislatures, compared with 15 legislatures run by Republicans. Power in the others is shared. Action in the states includes:

·Iowa. Would-be voters could register on Election Day under a bill pending before the Senate State Government Committee. Seven states have same-day registration laws. Democrats took over the state House of Representatives and Senate in November. "I think the Legislature has the votes to do it," new Democratic Secretary of State Michael Mauro says.

·Maryland. The House and Senate have approved putting a constitutional amendment before voters in 2008 that would make Maryland the 16th state to let voters cast ballots in person before Election Day. Differences between the bills remain to be worked out.

·Minnesota. A proposal to automatically register voters when they get driver's licenses is set to begin moving through the Legislature this week. Democrats won the House in November, giving them full control of the Legislature. "Citizens are looking for ways to have more accessibility," new Democratic Secretary of State Mark Ritchie says.

·Florida. New Republican Gov. Charlie Crist wants printers added to electronic voting machines so voters can check ballots. The paper trail, under consideration in many states and Congress, is a response to recent problems at the polls, including a disputed congressional election in Florida last year.

Several states, including Colorado, Hawaii, Idaho and Indiana, are beginning to act on legislation paving the way for more voting by mail. Oregon and most counties in Washington vote by mail.

In Congress, Rep. Rush Holt, D-N.J., wants paper trails on electronic voting machines to verify that all ballots are counted.

Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., wants to crack down on campaign fliers and phone calls intended to mislead voters.

Because Democrats control the House and Senate, those bills have a better chance of moving this year.

McCain Firm On Iraq War Despite Cost To Candidacy (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C. — The Sugar 'n' Spice Drive-in is so jammed with supporters and prospective supporters that Arizona Sen. John McCain climbs onto a chair next to the soda fountain to be heard.

"Obviously, I have to talk to you about the war in Iraq," he says somberly as the crowd quiets. "All of us — all of us — are frustrated. All of us are angry because of the mishandling of the war. All of us are saddened by the loss of our most precious asset, and that's American blood."

Even so, the costs of retreat would be higher, fueling chaos in Iraq and drawing terrorists to U.S. shores, he says. "I want us to have patience. I want us to succeed."

There's no doubt about that. At stake in Iraq is not only President Bush's legacy but also the 70-year-old McCain's last hope for the White House. In a crowded field of candidates, he is the only full-throated defender of the increase in U.S. troop levels and the war itself.

In a turn that's nearly Shakespearean, McCain — Bush's chief rival for the Republican nomination in 2000 and a critic since then on everything from tax cuts to torture — finds his fate inextricably tied to the fortunes of his onetime adversary and the increasingly unpopular war he is prosecuting.

McCain's unyielding stance on Iraq has bolstered him with Republican regulars but eroded his standing among the independents and crossover Democrats who boosted his presidential bid seven years ago. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday, one in four independents and two in three Democrats say they're much less likely to support him as a result.

Last fall, McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani were tied in the lineup of GOP hopefuls in the USA TODAY poll. Now Giuliani leads McCain 40%-24%.

McCain has "taken a very hard stand — that we need more troops — and that's not where the American people are," says James Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at American University. "He's isolated over there in a position he can't really change easily, even if things go more poorly on the ground."

On other fronts, McCain has trimmed his sails in ways that suit his ambitions. The nation's most prominent political maverick is cultivating his party's conservative power centers, including some he derided the last time he ran.

He voted against Bush's tax cuts in 2001; now he promises to extend them. He called evangelical leaders Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson "agents of intolerance" in 2000; now he is reaching out to Falwell and other prominent conservative Christians. He declares that Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion nationwide, should be overturned — a different position than he took in a 1999 interview.

But on the issue that dominates the 2008 election — and with a determination that could be seen as steadfast or stubborn — McCain continues to argue that the invasion of Iraq was justified and the war there must be pursued.

"He's no fool; he knows this is not a popular position to take," says Robert Timberg, a McCain biographer and editor of Proceedings: The Magazine of the U.S. Naval Institute. "But when it comes to a matter of national defense, when it comes to being behind the troops — those are issues that ultimately have no meaning politically to him."

McCain's bloodlines aren't in politics, Timberg notes. He is the son and grandson of Navy admirals.

Orson Swindle, a Marine pilot shot down over North Vietnam in 1966, says the years he and McCain spent together in a POW camp forged a fierce resolve to avoid the mistakes that they believe damaged the United States then.

"John above all others has that sense of history," Swindle says. "He knows we cannot afford to lose or be perceived as losing."

'I don't think about it'

McCain is on the Senate floor on a recent day, arguing for debate on his resolution supporting Bush's increase in troop levels in Iraq. His comments finished — there will be no debate today, or in the near future — he sits for a brief interview.

Will Iraq be the defining issue of the 2008 campaign?

"I don't know, because I don't know what the situation in Iraq will be when the campaign really cranks up," he replies. "If things got under control in Iraq, if we are showing success, I'm not sure that it will be the biggest issue."

What is the political impact of the war on his campaign?

"I don't think about it," he says. Period. Usually the most quotable of candidates, he seems determined to utter as few words as possible on the topic. He sits almost completely still and speaks so softly it's hard to hear what he's saying.

Even though he does want to be elected president?

"Sure, but not so badly that I would let it affect this issue," he says, then repeats a line he has used before: "I would rather lose an election than lose the war."

Still, when told that a USA TODAY poll shows his support among independents has declined, he seems to have considered the question. His campaign's surveys show his standing among independents "steady," he says. He adds he often has been a critic of Bush, "including the conduct of the war."

Does it seem ironic he's being nicked for being too loyal to Bush?

"It was Jack Kennedy that said life isn't fair," he says with a tight smile.

Life may seem particularly unfair to McCain these days. During a campaign stop in South Carolina, he tells an audience in Hilton Head that former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld "will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history." His critique isn't new. McCain began saying he had "no confidence" in Rumsfeld's leadership in 2004, after the Abu Ghraib prison scandal.

Even so, the comment triggers attacks from both sides. Within hours, the Democratic National Committee issues a news release headlined "Why Voters Don't Trust McCain," accusing him of trying to have it both ways on the war — supporting it while blaming Rumsfeld. The next day, Vice President Cheney curtly dismisses McCain as "wrong" and suggests the senator apologize.

Democratic contender John Edwards has dubbed Bush's increase in troop levels "the McCain doctrine," and the liberal group Move On.org has aired an anti-war TV ad in Iowa and New Hampshire — where the first presidential contests will be held — that shows McCain and Bush embracing.

"The McCain plan to escalate," the announcer calls it.

Since August 2003, five months after the invasion of Iraq was launched, McCain has been arguing that more U.S. troops were needed there. Bush dismissed his objections for more than three years but now has committed 21,500 additional U.S. troops.

Even if that move turns out to be too little, too late, McCain will find it difficult to distance himself from the calamity likely to follow, allies and opponents say.

"Substantively, there are big differences between what McCain has wanted to do in Iraq and what the Bush administration has done, but try explaining that kind of nuance to voters on the campaign trail," says Dan Schnur, a top aide to McCain in 2000 who hasn't endorsed a candidate this time. "It's a tough spot to be in."

McCain's chief strategist, John Weaver, sees a silver lining. Voters "are looking for people who are not poll-tested or driven by the prevailing winds but someone who will do the right thing," he says. The debate on Iraq "reinforces" the sense of principle and strength that voters appreciate in McCain.

"He's also been spelling out what kind of catastrophe that could follow in Iraq — and if there is failure in Iraq, there will be political consequences, too," for those who advocated pulling back, Weaver says. "Nobody is talking about that."

McCain is still popular among Americans but less so than he used to be, and the assessment that he would be the strongest Republican in a general election has faded a bit.

In the USA TODAY poll, independents by a healthy 56%-26% now say they have a favorable impression of McCain. Still, compared with February 2000, during his last presidential campaign, his favorable rating among those voters has dropped 11 percentage points and his unfavorable rating has doubled.

His leading rivals for the Republican nomination, Giuliani and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, support the war and have endorsed the increase in troops. Neither was in Congress to vote to authorize the invasion, however, and neither is so clearly identified with the conflict. Both have left some wiggle room in their comments about it.

In announcing his campaign, Romney said the United States should continue to "seek stability" in Iraq "so long as there is a reasonable prospect of success." During a trip last month to New Hampshire, Giuliani said, "There are no sure things" and Americans should prepare for the possibility of failure.

Independents' flight

New Hampshire was the site of McCain's breakthrough victory during the 2000 campaign. He trounced Bush in the primary by 18 percentage points thanks to independent voters. Six in 10 unaffiliated voters — they can cast their ballot in either party's primary — voted in the GOP contest. Surveys at polling places indicated they backed McCain over Bush by 3-1.

Now, a statewide survey by the University of New Hampshire this month found seven in 10 independents plan to vote in the Democratic primary in 2008. McCain, who led the GOP field in six previous UNH polls the past 20 months, is neck-and-neck with Giuliani.

"A key component of the McCain base from 2000 is evaporating," says Dante Scala, a political scientist at Saint Anselm College in Manchester and author of Stormy Weather: The New Hampshire Primary and Presidential Politics. "Which means he's going to have to work on those core Republicans."

So McCain assiduously is courting economic and social conservatives, some of them skeptics who remember his jibes from before. The morning after his stop at the Sugar 'n' Spice, McCain hosts a reception at the National Religious Broadcasters convention in Orlando. Falwell is listed as a co-host.

That evening, McCain flies on a small charter down the Florida coast to Vero Beach, a stronghold of suburban Republicans. Nearly 2,000 people show up for two question-and-answer sessions. The issues they raise range from immigration to health care to trade.

And, of course, Iraq.

"I like that he's for the president and not knocking him" when it comes to the war, says Eleanor Harpring, 87, a Republican.

Her daughter, Lisa McLaughlin, 48, a lawyer and political independent, isn't sure she agrees with McCain, though. "I just have questions with the direction we're going with the war," she says. "I think it may be irretrievable."

On stage in Vero Beach, McCain is confident and teasing, showing the dash of the decorated Navy pilot he once was. At the drive-in in Spartanburg, he sports a brown leather bomber jacket. To some, he has hero status: People in the audience hold cellphones over their heads to snap a picture and push forward copies of his best-selling Faith of My Fathers to be autographed.

"I admire what he stood up for as a POW" during the Vietnam War and his support for the president on Iraq, says Frank Horton, 68, a retired Navy man who has driven from nearby Boiling Springs to see McCain. Still, Horton worries that the boost in troops won't work. If so, he cautions, "we're going to have to rethink the whole thing."

McCain is a candidate on a tightrope. The exuberant insurgent from 2000 who seemed ready to speak his mind regardless of the consequences has been replaced by a more calculating candidate who is seeking support from the party's base and defending a war where victory is far from assured.

"This is not Luke Skywalker here," says South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, a key supporter for both bids, referring to a joking allusion McCain often used to refer to himself in 2000. "This is a totally different campaign."

McCain Strategy Courts Middle (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

Sen. John McCain is playing both sides against the middle as he supports sending more than 21,500 additional troops to Iraq while trying to distance himself from President Bush by labeling the war a "train wreck."

But election analysts and pollsters say the new tack is costing him independent voters, once his strong suit.

DOJ_NMG_0137465

As the Arizona Republican, long popular among the liberal media, seeks to secure religious and social conservatives by espousing a hard line against homosexual "marriage" and abortion, independents are abandoning him in droves, a trend election analysts say could be fatal to his 2008 presidential hopes.

"It's almost bipolar," said pollster John Zogby, who has done work for Mr. McCain in the past.

"He walks a very thin line here. What made John McCain so popular was the maverick, independent, anti-party establishment, war-hero status. He was popular among independents, Democrats, and not unpopular at all among Republicans. But in the process of redefining himself from the hawkish, pro-surge, hug-the-president McCain, the redefinition has un-defined him," Mr. Zogby said.

Courting both sides while seeking the middle can be dangerous, Mr. Zogby said.

"You risk alienating both sides, and a strong case can be made for winning from the center this year. McCain, though, is not just making small moves. His is much more like a huge pendulum swing, and thus far, it has not been helping him in the polls," he said.

Mr. McCain began this month moving hard to the right, declaring his opposition to same-sex "marriage" and saying that he favored the overturn of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that made abortion a constitutional right. Asked in Seattle on Friday whether he was simply seeking to curry favor with conservatives, Mr. McCain said frankly: "I'll probably get into trouble, but what's wrong with sucking up to everybody?"

"He had 49 percent of the independent voters in New Hampshire a year ago, but that has dropped ... to 29 percent now," said Mr. Bennett, who heads New Hampshire's leading polling company.

Mr. Bennett said Mr. McCain is employing a "calculated" move not uncommon in Republican campaigns -- lock down the conservative base, even at the expense of some independents, and then move back toward the middle in November, hoping to draw back some lost supporters.

"He's still able to get those independents back. The real trick is, how far to the right can he go without losing those independents forever? And that's an unknown, but he's shown in the past he knows where the line is and that he can navigate that successfully," he said.

Mr. McCain also stands out among Republican candidates in his continuing support for the Iraq war and as the leading Senate advocate for Mr. Bush's "surge" plan.

Thus, Democratic National Committee spokesman Luis Miranda said, Mr. McCain may have difficulty distancing himself from Mr. Bush on the war, which many Americans have come to see as a losing effort.

"He is trying to have it both ways by criticizing a war he always supported, while also trying to stick close to the president," the spokesman said.

But Charlie Black, a prominent adviser to Mr. Bush, said Mr. McCain can benefit by sticking to his core beliefs, which voters like.

"John McCain is taking a position that he thinks is right, and probably there's not much political strategy behind it. That said, it might help him in primaries, but it's a potential problem in the general election, really depending on what happens in Iraq in the next year and a half," he said.

Mr. McCain has been unequivocal in his support for the surge plan, telling voters in Iowa last week that the president's proposed solution is the only way the U.S. can salvage a win in Iraq.

"I've said all along I cannot be concerned and will not be concerned about whether it helps me or hurts me with anyone. It's an issue that transcends any political ambition I might have," he said in Des Moines.

A Gallup Poll released yesterday shows that his convictions may pay off. The president's approval rating among Republicans is 76 percent, despite the somewhat unpopular surge plan. Thus, taking a position against the president puts Republicans at odds with the base.

But he is also clearly concerned with his plummeting support among independents, and in recent days has delivered some stern criticism to the president and his administration.

Mr. McCain on Wednesday said in a joint appearance with California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in Los Angeles that his objections started three years ago "when I saw that this train wreck was taking place, and that we needed more troops, and we needed a different strategy." During a South Carolina visit last week, he harshly criticized former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld as "one of the worst secretaries of defense in history."

"We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement -- that's the kindest word I can give you of Donald Rumsfeld -- of this war," Mr. McCain told a crowd of 800-plus supporters at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.

Although the senator risks losing hawkish conservatives, his criticism of Mr. Bush may make him more palatable to independents. Although he drew some Democratic support in his 2000 presidential bid, he does not risk losing them this time, Mr. Zogby said.

"In this atmosphere, if you're pro-surge, there's virtually no Democrats to get anyway," he said.

Warner Endorses Possible McCain '08 Bid (AP)

Republican Sen. John W. Warner, the former chairman of the Armed Services Committee, on Monday endorsed Sen. John McCain for the Republican presidential nomination.

The five-term Virginia senator cited McCain's service in the Navy and his familiarity with military issues in a statement backing his longtime friend, who is expected to formally announce his candidacy next month.

"America's next president will be challenged by a range of diplomatic and security issues of unprecedented complexity largely due to growing, worldwide terrorist threats," Warner said in the statement, released by McCain's presidential exploratory committee. "Senator McCain's long experience with, and understanding of, our military coupled with his proven, unquestioned courage and leadership, provide him with the essential qualifications for our next president."

Warner, a former Navy secretary and until last month the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has agreed with McCain on a number of national security and defense issues, but differs with him on President Bush's Iraq war policy.

McCain backs the president's plan to increase U.S. troops while Warner drafted a bipartisan resolution opposing the buildup.

WASHINGTON (AP) — Vying for the support of a key Democratic constituency, presidential hopefuls Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama have signed on to speak at an annual civil rights commemoration in Selma, Ala., on Sunday at the same time and just a few doors down from each other.

State Democratic leaders and event organizers said they couldn't remember a time when two leading presidential candidates spoke at the Bridge Crossing Jubilee, held annually in honor of the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march.

"It's a first," said Tarana Burke, a spokeswoman for Selma's National Voting Rights Museum and Institute, which sponsors the event. "Both of them are directly affected by the voting rights movement, and we're glad they appreciate that enough to come and help us commemorate."

Clinton, a Democratic senator from New York, is scheduled to headline the 10 a.m. service at First Baptist Church and to represent her husband, former President Bill Clinton, at his induction into the museum's hall of fame, Burke said.

Obama, a Democratic senator from Illinois who is black, is slated to speak at a "Unity Breakfast" and deliver the event's keynote address at the 10 a.m. service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church.

Both churches were sites where organizers and marchers met in the historic protests that helped lead to greater ballot access across the South for blacks.

State Democratic leaders estimated 40 to 50 percent of Democratic primary voters in Alabama are black.

Organizers say several dozen members of Congress also plan to attend, along with former presidential candidates Jesse Jackson and Al Sharpton. A spokesman for Clinton said the senator is still finalizing details of her visit.

BOSTON (AP) — Mitt Romney prepared for a major fundraising chase with a real run — against his family on a local track. He finished last.

The former Massachusetts governor said in a Web interview posted Monday that the night before a January fundraiser that raised $6.5 million for his campaign, he and his sons decided to race each other around the track at the high school near their Belmont, Mass., home.

"We were there at the dinner table and someone said, 'Hey, should we go have a 440(-yard) race at the high school?'" Romney told RealClearPolitics.com, a Chicago-based site that culls and posts an array of political news, commentary and polling. "Sure enough, we all went upstairs and found our respective jogging shorts, put on tennis shoes or running shoes, went over to the high school and had a 440 competition at the track."

While the 59-year-old Romney runs on a treadmill each day, he ended up losing to three of his five sons.

"I came in last," said the candidate. "I was thinking I could beat my son Ben but, boy, even though he's in medical school and has gotta be out of shape, he still beat me, darn it!"

Aides said Josh Romney finished first, Matt Romney second and Ben Romney third, with Mitt Romney fourth. Tagg Romney, the eldest son, and Craig Romney, the youngest, did not compete.

HIGHLAND HILLS, Ohio (AP) — On his first campaign trek across Ohio, Democratic presidential contender Barack Obama promised that he'd return — a lot.

The senator from Illinois raised more than $450,000 at fundraisers in Cincinnati and Columbus on Monday before collecting even more at an appearance in suburban Cleveland. A message seeking the amount raised was left at Obama's campaign headquarters in Chicago.

"I'm going to be spending a lot of time in Ohio so that people are familiar with me, so that by the time I'm the Democratic nominee they don't feel like I'm just parachuting in but that they've heard me and had a chance to kick the tires and lift the hood," Obama told reporters after the event in Columbus.

In his three stops to the state's largest cities, Obama covered a wide range of topics, including ending the war in Iraq — which received the loudest cheer at the Cleveland-area rally — developing universal health care and improving early childhood education.

More than 1,700 people filled a community college gymnasium in Highland Hills with chants of "O-bama!" A large banner overhead read "Obama Rocks!"

Giuliani Keys On The Economy And Taxes (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, February 27, 2007

Republican presidential hopeful Rudy Giuliani addressed his Democratic past on Monday and offered one reason for his political conversion — taxes.

"I don't think anything separates us more right now between Republicans and Democrats than how we look at taxes," the former New York mayor said. "What we understand as Republicans is that, sure, the government is an important player in this, but we are essentially a private economy. What Democrats really believe ... is that it is essentially a government economy."

In the days of President Kennedy, Giuliani said, Democrats understood the concept of the private economy and cutting taxes. But, he said, Democrats have "kind of lost that."

"It's one of the reasons that I used to be a Democrat and I'm now a Republican," Giuliani said before quoting Winston Churchill as saying: "If you're not a liberal when you're 20, you have no heart, but if you're not a conservative by the time you're 40, you have no brain."

The line prompted laughter from Giuliani's audience, a few hundred people affiliated with the Hoover Institution, a public policy center.

As he seeks the Republican nomination, Giuliani faces the challenge of winning over conservatives who make up the GOP's base and view him skeptically because of his moderate views on social issues and his past allegiance to the Democratic Party. In 1994, Giuliani endorsed Democratic Gov. Mario Cuomo over Republican challenger George Pataki.

Addressing his political about-face, Giuliani said he once was a Democrat, then spent five years as an independent before finding a home with the Republican Party.

"Ronald Reagan made only two changes. I was like Churchill, I made three," he quipped.

Turning serious, he said he struggled with his political identity while he was an independent.

"I would say to myself Democrats care about the poor and Republicans don't, and how can I join the party that doesn't care about the poor," Giuliani said. "I finally came to the conclusion that we care about the poor more."

Later, when questioned on whether he had the foreign policy credentials to be president, Giuliani sought to diffuse another potential stumbling block to the nomination.

"What makes you think that the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" Giuliani asked, as the crowd laughed and applauded.

Defending his record, he said he's traveled the world extensively since being out of office and grasped foreign policy issues while mayor in the 1990s.

"It's something that I think I know, I think I know as well as anybody else who's running for president, probably better than a lot," Giuliani said.

At an evening event in northern Virginia, the ex-mayor sought to buck up activists at a state Republican Party dinner a few months after the GOP sustained severe electoral losses at all levels of government.

DOJ_NMG_0137468

"You learn more from defeat than you do from victory," Giuliani said. "Our party has to be and should be the party of the future."

Rudy Defends Foreign Policy Capacity (NSDY)

By Craig Gordon

Long Island Newsday, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Rudolph Giuliani Monday defended his lack of hands-on foreign policy experience, telling a conservative audience that his time in City Hall, private business travels and paid speeches abroad helped prepare him to confront overseas threats.

"What makes you think the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" Giuliani said. "It's something that I think I know ... as well as anybody else who's running for president, probably better than a lot."

Giuliani also did a test drive of a series of domestic campaign themes before the group -- saying he would cut taxes, expand school choice and reform entitlement programs -- in a bid to explain his political conversion from Democrat to Republican.

He told the members of the Hoover Institution think tank that he believes the Republican philosophy of helping people help themselves trumps what he called the Democrats' big-government approach to taxes, schools and health care.

"I would say to myself, 'Democrats care about the poor and Republicans don't, and how can I join the party that doesn't care about the poor?'" Giuliani said, recalling how he pondered his party switch in 1980. "I finally came to the conclusion that we care about the poor more."

The speech was during the first half of a Washington swing that has Giuliani courting conservative activists, many of whom have been cool toward his campaign over his moderate stances on social issues. He also addressed an $85-a-person Virginia Republican party fundraiser last night before heading to a New Jersey fundraiser Tuesday.

On Friday, Giuliani will return to Washington to address the Conservative Political Action Conference, one of the largest gatherings of conservative activists in the nation.

Giuliani leads Republicans in recent polls, mainly among voters who remember him from 9/11 and give him high marks. But several leading conservatives have been critical of Giuliani, so he tried to soften that opposition Monday, mainly by highlighting his conservative approach to governing.

On foreign affairs, he has little experience and even gave up a spot in the Iraq Study Group last year as he prepared to run for president. Also, his main opponent, Sen. John McCain, is a Vietnam veteran who made a name as a foreign-policy expert. McCain picked up the endorsement Monday of another leading Republican on foreign affairs, Virginia Sen. John Warner.

But Giuliani held out his experience running the nation's largest city as part of his foreign policy portfolio. He also told a questioner that he has taken more than 90 foreign trips for his company, Giuliani Partners, spoken in about 35 countries and met a variety of world leaders -- though he barely touched on the biggest foreign policy challenge facing the next president: Iraq.

Giuliani's Mouth Is Running, But His Meter Isn't (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Looking for a bargain outing for the family? Consider a Rudy Giuliani speech.

The Republican presidential candidate and former New York mayor was charging $100,000 per speech before he announced two weeks ago that he was quitting the motivational lecture circuit. Now he can look forward to a year or more of talks like he gave yesterday to the Hoover Institution in the Willard ballroom -- earning nothing but applause.

Instead, the Hoover fellows got all this free, and more! Giuliani threw in bonus thoughts on foreign policy, such as "We clearly won the Cold War" (that two-second snippet had a market value of $71.58), and "We've never been a perfect country, we're never going to be a perfect country, but we're a good country, so we don't like war" ($214.74 for this six-second gem).

On the other hand, the value-conscious consumer apparently will have to pay full freight if Giuliani is going to say something controversial. The candidate said not a peep about abortion or gay rights. He skipped any mention of Iraq until a questioner asked him.

Finally pressed on Iraq, his two-minute, 28-second answer (a $5,297.04 value) included mentions of immigration, Social Security and class-action lawsuits. "I ran a hospital system, the second- or third-largest in the country. . . . We were paying out $500 million in claims, and settling claims that we just had to settle for amounts of money I would never thought you should give, and I'm a lawyer. That's what I really know about, even more than foreign policy."

DOJ_NMG_0137469

Had they been paying customers, the Hoover fellows, drinking Cakebread Chardonnay and Swanson Merlot at noon, may have asked for a small rebate when Giuliani, explaining his switch from Democrat to Republican, cited "Churchill's statement: If you're not a liberal when you're 20 you have no heart, but if you're not a conservative by the time you're 40 you have no brain."

"There is no record of anyone hearing Churchill say this," reports the Churchill Centre.

But this was not a hostile crowd. Though religious conservatives are suspicious about Giuliani, the market conservatives of the Hoover Institution are not. Hoover overseer Bill Simon introduced Giuliani as "hopefully the next president" and recalled his "grace under pressure" on Sept. 11, 2001.

Giuliani had the moves of an experienced motivational speaker. He used his roving microphone to step out on either side of the lectern in ever-lengthening strolls. And he had a few jokes prepared. "When I was a kid . . . snow was terrific," he said. "Then I became mayor of New York, and it's $1 million an inch." That went over well, so he followed with a second, third and fourth snow joke.

His first 30 minutes listed heavily toward platitude. "The founding principle of our party is freedom," he disclosed, further announcing that "our economy is not a government-dominated economy." He also discussed at length his experience with the New York City public schools ("I was very, very big on the Stat programs, ConStat programs, and HealthStat programs and JobsStat programs").

His brief foray into foreign affairs meticulously avoided Iraq. "We've got to say to the rest of the world, 'America doesn't like war, America is not a military country,' " he recommended.

Whatever Americans think about war, Giuliani clearly didn't want to talk about it. The first questioner tried to prod him by asking about those who have a "deep concern" about his lack of "experience in foreign affairs."

"Uh, what makes you think the mayor of New York City doesn't need a foreign policy?" he quipped. He then spoke about his business travel. "I've made about 91, 92 foreign trips and I've spoken in 34, 35 different countries," he said. "So I know the world."

He also would have pulled in a cool $3.5 million if those speeches were at the motivational rate.

Giuliani listed some of the things he learned from his travels: "My view of it is the American president needs to be our leader in foreign policy." And: "Foreign policy is also very much a part of our economy now." Those insights, at the customary rate of $35.79 per second, were worth $178.95 and $107.37, respectively.

The next questioner wanted to know about the Iraq-war resolutions in Congress (this produced Giuliani's answer about the New York City hospital claims) and his view on judicial nominees. "I would select judges based on my view of the Constitution, which is that the separation of powers is an important part of our freedom," he said.

"One more question?" asked the host. Nobody volunteered.

"Who wants to ask it?" Giuliani pressed. Finally, a woman near the front stood up.

"Where in your priority list would incentive pay be under your presidency?" she asked.

"Incentive pay," said a relieved Giuliani, "is critical to almost every institution."

Even to Giuliani himself, apparently. If you want a motivational speech, you're going to have to pay him for it.

Some Fans Clamor For Gore Sequel, But He Says No (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

LOS ANGELES — Al Gore has had a heartwarming February: a big night at the Academy Awards, a Nobel Peace Prize nomination and former president Jimmy Carter's endorsement for the 2008 presidential campaign.

Even so, these dream assets for a politician and the added pressure they're bringing to enter the race are unlikely to sway Gore to jump in, Democrats who know the former vice president said Monday.

Gore, 58, played with the idea Sunday night, when An Inconvenient Truth, the documentary on climate change that he stars in, won Oscars for best documentary feature and best original song. In pre-planned clowning, Gore had begun to announce a political "intention" when the band cut him off.

Two members of Norway's Parliament nominated Gore for the Nobel Peace Prize Feb. 1 for bringing attention to global warming. Carter told ABC News' This Week Sunday that "if Al should decide to run — which I'm afraid he won't — I would support Al Gore."

Backstage and at post-Oscar parties, the 2000 Democratic presidential nominee repeated his longtime assertion that he is not "planning" to run again. Political players read Gore's statement as falling short of an ironclad pledge to stay out. "He's obviously left a little crack in the window or the door," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist and Gore's 2000 campaign press secretary.

DOJ_NMG_0137470

"At no time did he say, 'I'm not running,' just three little words," said Monica Friedlander, spokeswoman for DraftGore.com, one of several grass-roots groups pushing for a Gore candidacy.

Friedlander said the Oscars would be "huge" in augmenting the 42,000 signatures the group has collected for a petition asking Gore to run. An additional 1,000 signatures came in Sunday, she said.

Allies of Gore said they take him at his word. "I would like him to run, but I haven't been very persuasive, either," said Elaine Kamarck, a professor at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government and Gore's former policy adviser. She was one of a number of former supporters who met in Boston this month to consider how to jump-start a Gore campaign.

If Gore should decide to run, he'd be in a strong starting position. In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll of Democratic voters taken Feb. 9-11, Gore trailed only Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Though Gore was criticized during the 2000 campaign for a stiff manner, "clearly he's far more comfortable with himself" now, said Anita Dunn, a Democratic campaign strategist who worked for Gore's opponent for the 2000 nomination, Bill Bradley.

The new accolades "will fuel further enthusiasm for him to enter the race" but won't influence Gore, said Carter Eskew, a former campaign adviser to Gore.

Gore remains involved on global warming, serves on Apple's board and is an adviser to Google. "He has a full plate," Eskew said.

Carter told ABC that Gore is resisting the calls to re-enter politics. "I don't think he will," Carter said. "I've put so much pressure on Al to run that he's almost gotten aggravated with me."

Eskew said Gore is feeling as fulfilled by the growing impact of his efforts on global warming as he ever did in politics. "Our biggest audience in the 2000 campaign was the 20 million who watched his convention acceptance speech," Eskew said. "Well, (Monday) night a billion people were watching, so you really can have an impact outside of the normal boundaries. He is smart enough to understand how to leverage that."

Ginny Terzano, a former spokeswoman for Gore and now a spokeswoman for Microsoft, says, "He's getting a great deal of personal satisfaction out of changing lives without some of the strings and constrictions that you have running for public office."

"The guy is enormously happy, " Lehane said. "For him, the decision is: 'Let's see, could I make a lot of money and be on stage in front of a billion people, or would I want to be spending the next two years in a Holiday Inn in Dubuque, Iowa?' "

Gore's Oscar Fuels Call For Late Run (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 27, 2007

Former Vice President Al Gore's triumph at the Oscars is already stoking activists' pleas for him to make a dramatic late entry into the fractious presidential race, and some key strategists insist he could announce as late as September or October and still win the nomination.

"Honestly, this was the inaugural parade we all envisioned," said Donna Brazile, his former campaign manager. "Gore's political stock is hot right now. I don't know if I would cash in now with so many players still on stage. There's no reason to force him to declare tomorrow. "

Indeed, Brazile said the former vice president could wait as late as the time states begin requiring delegate slates and statements of candidacy, since he could raise money quickly and much of the campaigns' budgets are devoted to a long nominating process he would avoid. "This was one of those rare moments, similar to the civil rights movement, when you experience the ground shifting," she said. "Perhaps it's not a movement for a presidential run, but a moment for the debate to start for real change on how we live on planet earth."

Friends who talk regularly with Gore say that he believes what he tells the press – that he's not planning to run for president. Backstage on Sunday night, he repeated his mantra: "I do not have plans to become a candidate for office again." No draft movement is being authorized or encouraged, and there are no internal discussions of a campaign, the friends insist. But they say he has deliberately not closed the door. It just doesn't feel right to him and he's only 58.

So the crescendo will rise. Brazile, now the founder and managing director of Brazile and Associates, is neutral in the race but says she would work for Gore if he declared. She acknowledges that after the near miss of 2000, she was among those who said "hell, no" about a 2004 bid. But she feels very differently now.

"He could come in at the end of the day as a candidate who can truly unite his party as well as his country," Brazile said. "He can help repair our country's image abroad. He's someone who can go toe-to-toe with world leaders and doesn't need a crash course in diplomacy." She remembers back in the '80s when Gore was in Congress and used to often cite a quote from Gandhi, ""Be the change you want to see in the world." Brazile said: "I believe he has become that quote."

"An Inconvenient Truth" was based on Gore's traveling global warming show as he told audiences about what he calls a "planetary emergency." He threw himself into promoting the film, traveling to film festivals around the world and telling audiences he would take it “door-to-door” if necessary.” The movie includes his stock laugh line: "I'm Al Gore. I used to be the next president of the United States of America."

Michael Feldman, who served in the Clinton-Gore White House for eight years and was a senior adviser and traveling chief of staff to the vice president, said the Oscar means that “more people are going to see the movie and more people are going to get information about the issue of global warming, which will help build the collective political will to get something done on the issue.”

Feldman, a founding partner of the Glover Park Group, said Gore’s stroll down the red carpet “must have seemed like a little bit of an out-of-body experience to him,” but then much of the last year has been that way. “He still sees his job as trying to help create a better political climate for action on this issue,” Feldman said.

Gore is the chair of the Alliance for Climate Protection, funded in part by proceeds he has donated from “An Inconvenient Truth.” Others on the group’s governing council include Theodore Roosevelt IV, Carol M. Browner, and Brent Scowcroft.

The former vice president will be in the spotlight again with three major events in the next five months:

--On March 21, he’ll star at global-warming hearings in both the House and Senate, testifying before a committee he once served on. He will be the sole witness before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works. On the House side, he will testify at a Joint Subcommittee Hearing on Climate Change, held by the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Energy and Air Quality, and the Science and Technology Subcommittee on Energy and Environment.

--A new book by Gore, "The Assault on Reason: How the Politics of Fear, Secrecy, and Blind Faith Subvert Wise Decision Making, Degrade Our Democracy, and Put Our Country and Our World in Peril," is due out in May.

--On July 7 (7.7.07), he will be among the luminaries heading a 24-hour “Save Our Selves” (SOS) concert marathon across all seven continents. The “Live Earth” concert will bring together more than 100 of the world’s top musical acts and is designed to reach more than 2 billion people through attendance and broadcasts. SOS – The Campaign for a Climate in Crisis was founded by Kevin Wall, who won an Emmy as worldwide executive producer of the Live 8 concert marathon.

At 10:48 p.m. Sunday, when the nominees for “best documentary feature” were announced on the 79th annual Academy Awards broadcast on ABC, the clip from an “An Inconvenient Truth” showed professorial Gore intoning: “Global warming creates more evaporation off the oceans. It seeds the clouds. But it sucks moisture out of the soil.”

After Davis Guggenheim, the director, was announced as the winner, the camera in the audience showed him gesturing madly for Gore and the rest of the team to walk up with him. As they walked to the stage, the announcer said: “Davis Guggenheim and the cast were scheduled to shoot in New Orleans the night before Hurricane Katrina hit – an event that brought the threat and the impact of global warming.”

Reaching the microphone, Guggenheim said: “All of us who made this film – Laurie, Lawrence, Scott and Leslie – we did so because we were moved to act by this man.” He gripped Gore’s left arm and didn’t let go. “All of us were inspired by his fight for 30 years to tell this truth to all of us,” Guggenheim said, moving his arm into a hug. “Thank you, Al. We are so inspired, we share this with you.” He thrust the Oscar at the former vice president, who stepped into the spotlight.

“Thank you,” Gore said, clutching the gold statuette. “I want to thank Tipper and my family, thank the Academy, and everyone on this amazing team. My fellow Americans, (laughter and applause) people all over the world, we need to solve the climate crisis. It’s not a political issue, it’s a moral issue. We have everything we need to get started with the possible exception of the will to act. That’s a renewable resource. Let’s renew it.” He raised the 8.5-pound, 13.5-inch-tall, 24-karat-gold-plated Oscar as if in a toast, and he and the director hugged.

A little over an hour earlier, Gore made a surprise appearance after being teased by the ABC announcer as a mysterious “distinguished guest.” Gore and Leonardo DiCaprio announced a “Go Green” program showing the Oscar production was environmentally friendly, and DiCaprio teasingly asked Gore if he had a titanic announcement.

Gore, as deadpan as if he were a “Saturday Night Live” regular, responded: “I’m kind of surprised that the feeling’s so welling up here -- actually, you’ve been very convincing. And even though I honestly had not planned on doing this, I, I guess with a billion people watching, it’s as (theatrical pause) good a time as (sighs) any. So, my fellow Americans, (laughter as he pulls a vertically folded sheaf of papers from the breast pocket of his Ralph Lauren tux), I’m going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce – ”

Then the orchestra burst in with the swelling music that's used to usher off long-winded winners. “— My intention —” Gore continued, then was drowned out and walked off arm in arm with DiCaprio, to laughter and applause.

Between the former vice president’s onstage appearances, George Clooney, presenting the Oscar for best supporting actress, joked that he had been “drinking backstage” with Gore and added in mock confidence, “I don’t think he’s running for president.” The telecast cut to Al and Tipper Gore, laughing uproariously in the audience.

Gore arrived on the Kodak Theater red carpet a few hours before show time, spoke to foreign broadcasters and waved big as he posed with Tipper Gore, their son Albert Gore III and one of their daughters, Karenna Gore Schiff. The former vice president had told The Washington Post for a Sunday front-page story headlined “Al Gore, Rock Star” that he’s “old enough to know that a red carpet is just a rug.”

In case you missed it, here’s the how the Al and Leo Show went:

DiCaprio: So, Mr. Gore, we’ve, uh, got a big crowd out here tonight – an even bigger one at home. Is there, is there anything you might want to announce? (Laughter, applause, whoops and a shout from the crowd of , “Oh, yeah!”)

Gore: I’m just here for the movies. I’m just here for the movies, Leo. And on this occasion, I’m here to thank all of the talented people in this great industry who’ve been part of the mission to inspire a successful response to the climate crisis. And thank you, Leo, for being such a great ally in this effort. (Applause.)

DiCaprio: Thank you. The American film industry has always taken its obligations to society very seriously and it’s now stepping up once again. Tonight, we’re proud to announce that for the first time in the history of the Oscars, this show has officially gone green. (Applause.)

Gore: Which means that environmentally intelligent practices have been integrated fully into every aspect of the planning and production of these Academy Awards. And you know what: It is not as hard as you might think. We have a long way to go. But all of us can do something in our own lives to make a difference.

DiCaprio: Check out www.Oscar.com to get ideas from the Academy and the National Resources Defense Council, the NRDC, about how you can do YOUR part. And now, although our time is almost up, I just want to say I’m very proud to be standing next to such an inspirational leader in the fight against global warming. You are a true champion for the cause, Mr. Gore. (Big applause.)

Gore: Well, thank you. (More applause.)

DiCaprio: Now are you sure, are you positive that all this hard work hasn’t inspired you to make any other kind of MAJOR, major announcement to the world here tonight?

Gore: Well, I do appreciate that, Leo. And I’m kind of surprised that the feeling’s so welling up here -- actually, you’ve been very convincing. And even though I honestly had not planned on doing this, I, I guess with a billion people watching, it’s as (theatrical pause) good a time as (sighs) any. So, my fellow Americans, (laughter as he pulls a vertically folded sheaf of papers from the breast pocket of his tux), I’m going to take this opportunity right here and now, to formally announce (music crashes in) my intention – . (Swelling music drowns him out and the two leave the stage to laughter and applause.)

Oscars Add Lustre To Idea Of Gore Candidacy (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

The clamour for an Al Gore 2008 presidential candidacy stepped up several decibels yesterday after the evening award of two Oscars to the former vice-president for An Inconvenient Truth, his film on global warming.

Appearing twice on stage - first with Leonardo DiCaprio, who portrayed the former vice-president as something close to a modern prophet, and second to accept jointly with Davis Guggenheim, the movie's director, the award for best documentary feature - Mr Gore was by a long way the most adulated celebrity of the evening.

As the most popular politician in Hollywood, who raised the biggest cheers at two different moments during the awards, Mr Gore put paid to his image as a robotic geek that helped sink his chances of victory against George W. Bush in 2000.

Mr Gore's transformation has been assisted by his readiness to use self-deprecating humour - most recently on Sunday night when he seemed to be embarking on a speech to announce his presidential candidacy, only to be cut short by the orchestra.

Environmental lobby groups say that Mr Gore's Oscar success was the best publicity boost they could have hoped for at a stage when Capitol Hill is for the first time deliberating radical action to impose mandatory reductions on US carbon emissions.

And Democratic party activists who favour a Gore candidacy say the Oscar success, combined with his recent nomination for the Nobel peace prize, would provide the perfect platform for a declaration of his candidacy. Opinion polls put Mr Gore third behind Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama but ahead of John Edwards and Bill Richardson among the Democratic hopefuls.

Senior Democrats say Mr Gore could be catapulted into a frontline position, particularly if he waited until September or October when the public is likely to have become saturated with the increasingly tense contest between Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton. Last year's Nobel peace prize was announced on 13 October.

"If you go to the west coast the big issue is not Iraq - as it is in Washington - but global warming," said Simon Rosenberg, the head of the New Democratic Network, in Washington. "The Oscar -ceremonies offered the spectacle of an exuberant repudiation of the Bush years. It is hard to think of a better platform for Mr Gore's public profile."

Mr Gore's extraordinary reinvention as a cultural icon is likely to be sustained by a series of prominent engagements in the next few months, including his app-earance as the sole witness next month in Senate and House of Representative committee hearings on global warming.

Dubbed by some as the "Goracle", Mr Gore is likely to attract national ratings when he testifies, say climate change lobbyists.

"If you look at where the American public stands on global warming there has been a tremendous shift in the last year which coincides with the popularity of Al Gore's movie," says Emily Frigdor at the Public Interest Research Group.

However, Capitol Hill staff members counsel against expectations of a drastic legislative shift in the near future, particularly given Mr Bush's aversion to any mandatory targets for carbon emission reductions. They point to the likelihood of more modest legislative measures, such as a bill that would require electricity providers to ensure that 20 per cent of power supply comes from renewable energy sources by 2020.

"It is going to be incredibly difficult to combine a bill that takes radical action on global warming with the goal of building a political majority on Capitol Hill," says Dave Hamilton, of the Sierra Club, the environmental organisation. "But events like Al Gore's Oscar success will make it progressively more achievable by building up public pressure."

Meanwhile, friends of Mr Gore are divided on whether he will declare his candidacy. Some rule it out and others say it is scheduled for the autumn. "He could out-finance everybody except Hillary without too much difficulty," said one.

Oscar Victory May Prove Inconvenient For Gore (WT)

By Jennifer Harper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

A gold statuette and a moment of goofiness have garnered Al Gore considerable public buzz after his big night at the Oscars. It's not necessarily presidential buzz, though.

An Academy Award for "An Inconvenient Truth" has further cemented Mr. Gore's name to a single issue: global warming. But Mr. Gore's fame could be fleeting because the issue does not resonate with most Americans.

"Winning an Oscar and making a joke in the pop culture arena will definitely raise his profile. Mr. Gore will get attention over the next few weeks as everyone repeats the question, 'Are you going to run?' " said Morgan E. Felchner, editor of Campaign & Elections magazine.

"But Gore is focusing solely on global warming, which is not topping public awareness polls," Ms. Felchner said. "The popularity bump will last a few weeks, then most likely fade away."

Indeed, global warming is not a "top-tier issue," a Pew Research survey of 1,708 adults found last month. The survey ranked global warming near the bottom in a 23-item list of policy priorities for the White House and Congress. Only 19 percent said they had "deep concern" about climate change.

Regardless of his new ebullience, Mr. Gore does not dominate favorability polls. He ranks fourth among Democrats behind Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina in a Pew survey of 1,509 adults released Friday. Only a quarter of Democrats agreed that Mr. Gore had "a good chance" of winning their vote.

A Harris poll of 3,423 adults released Feb. 14 also found Mr. Gore fourth behind the trio of senators. Such sentiment has some history.

"There are no signs that Gore's high-visibility focus on global warming has produced changes in his standing with the American public," a Gallup survey released in August concluded.

A previous change of image -- hip earth-toned clothes and a Rolling Stone magazine cover -- did not cement a win for Mr. Gore in 2000 either. But he has left a cultural mark, said Robert Thompson, director of the Bleier Center for Television and Popular Culture at Syracuse University. Mr. Gore could ride a "big wave" post-Oscar, he said.

"There's a larger lesson though," Mr. Thompson added. "Al Gore has shown other politicians that they can communicate to the public in ways beyond the traditional podium and microphone."

Meanwhile, "An Inconvenient Truth" made $45 million at the box office. The book sold 300,000 copies last year and 3,000 copies so far this year, according to Nielsen BookScan. The film was released to DVD in November. Yesterday, it was bested on Amazon.com's DVD sales charts by dramatic movies "The Secret," "The Departed," "Babel" and "Casino Royale."

Mr. Gore's efforts to bring his film to public-school systems has not entirely panned out. In December, the National Science Teachers Association declined offers to distribute it free to 50,000 classrooms. Frosty Hardison, a father of seven in Federal Way, Wash., began a campaign in January to ban the film in his local public school system.

"Al Gore's video has no place in my kids' public school classroom any more than condoms," Mr. Hardison said at the time.

Gore Shut The Door On '08. What If Someone Opens A Window? (RC)

By Donna Brazile

Roll Call, February 27, 2007

Back in February 2000, I was in Harlem riding alongside the man who now says, "I used to be the next president of the United States." He looked out the window and said: "This should be a great interview."

Al Gore and I were on our way to an editorial board meeting at the New York Amsterdam News, where I had hoped he would address plans to expand economic prosperity to black families. To my surprise, Gore walked in the room, greeted the editors and reporters, and proceeded to throw my talking points out the window. He wanted to discuss global warming instead.

For a while, I thought the vice president had lost his mind. How dare he discuss environmental issues with one of the nation's leading black newspapers? Black people, I reasoned, had far too many problems, such as lack of affordable housing and limited access to health care, jobs and education, to spend our precious time discussing an issue no one understood. But Gore saw things differently and proceeded without warning to draw a large circle on the blackboard and explain the dangers of global warming and how greenhouse gases were trapped in the atmosphere.

Well, I thought, there goes our endorsement. Former Sen. Bill Bradley (N.J.), who was still very much alive in the battle for the Democratic nomination, likely would get the highly sought-after backing. But, to my amazement, the paper endorsed Gore and I learned a valuable lesson about allowing a candidate to lay out his own agenda.

Gore's political stock is as high as I have seen it in the more than two decades that he's been on the national stage. With an Oscar-winning documentary, "An Inconvenient Truth," that is the buzz of Hollywood and generating the kind of free media that is the envy of any current contender, Gore is sticking to his position that he has no intention to run for president. Perhaps I should just take his word and resume flirting with those who have made the decision to run. But something in my gut tells me that there's still a chance Gore will jump in right before the filing deadlines or as the slating of delegates begins — and win both the nomination and the presidency.

I like the way former President Jimmy Carter said it on ABC's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos": "My favorite Democrat, for a number of years now, has been Al Gore. If Al should decide to run — which I'm afraid he won't — I would support Al Gore." I am sure Gore is a little irritated at me and others who continue to drop his name at every opportunity, but it just doesn't feel right watching Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), Joseph Biden (D-Del.), John McCain (R-Ariz.), Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) run without someone of Gore's stature and leadership also in the race.

At a time when America's stock has dwindled throughout the world, Gore has earned the admiration and respect of many foreign leaders. After eight tumultuous and disheartening years of the current administration, our nation will need someone in the Oval Office who can pick up the phone and ask the international community to join with us in fighting the war on terror, global warming, the rapid spread of HIV/AIDS on the African continent and so many other ills that plague our planet. And here at home, Gore also could lead us back to fiscal responsibility and prosperity so that all families can make ends meet, not just the wealthiest 1 percent.

As one of my friends recently wrote to me in an e-mail: "Al Gore has become a rock star: Oscar and Nobel Peace Prize nominations, selling out 10,000 tickets in 10 minutes for a global warming slide show in bright red Idaho, foreign capitols taking his lead reversing policy related to climate change, mega-corporations like Wal-Mart and General Electric changing the way they do business simply because Al Gore has been so successful shining a light on the impending catastrophic consequences of global warming. The list goes on and on. Al Gore is on fire!"

No, he's actually liberated from the politics that once sunk his chances of becoming our commander in chief.

With so many other qualified people running, Gore's decision or lack thereof may hinge on whether there is an appetite for someone who isn't a "new face," who is ready to take America in a completely different direction and to transform the way we fight the war on terror.

I understand if Gore is unwilling to get back in the fray and distract himself from an international campaign on the threat of global warming. I understand if all he wants is to come to Capitol Hill on March 21 to put more pressure on Congress to act. And I understand if he decides to just wake up each day with his wife, Tipper, at his side and spend his free time with the grandchildren.

After serving his country in Vietnam, on Capitol Hill and in the White House, Gore has earned the right to do just about anything, including passing up a chance to become the next president of the United States.

I am sure Gore will continue to close the door on running in 2008, but what if someone opens a window? If the current contenders continue to pander and play the old politics of yesterday, the opportunity for a late entry may yet present itself on the road to the White House.

An Oscar For His Second Act (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Now, somebody ought to make a movie about Al Gore. I would call it "An Uncomplaining Life."

The movie would be about a man who did not quit, who came off the canvas after a painfully close election -- he won the popular vote, after all -- who accepted defeat graciously and tried to unite the nation, who returned to the consuming passion of his earlier days, the environment, and spoke endlessly on the topic, almost always for free, who starred in a documentary based on his speech and who Sunday night, before a billion or so people, won an Academy Award for his effort. This may or may not be a stepping stone to the presidency, but Gore gives us all a lesson on how to live one's life.

It's a joke, isn't it? I mean, it was Gore who was universally seen as the flawed man, uncomfortable in his own skin and, therefore, in this TV age, incapable of uniting the nation. He was caricatured by some of my colleagues as a serial exaggerator, a fibber, a pretender -- the guy who invented the Internet, who was the model for the novel (and movie) "Love Story," who applied one too many coats of passion to that kiss he delivered to his wife, Tipper, at the Democratic National Convention in 2000. There were so many reasons not to vote for him -- none, in retrospect, much good.

Now it is his jaunty, frat-boy opponent who cannot unite the country. Now it is the towel-snapper, the rancher who does not ride horses, the decider who decides wrongly and whose approval ratings are like the temperature of a dead man. Now it is George W. Bush that the nation does not trust or believe -- and this has and will cost us plenty. What if Bush is right about Iran? What if the Iranians are really helping to kill Americans in Iraq? Whatever you may think of the Iraq war, it is impermissible for anyone to kill Americans and yet it may be happening and may continue because the president is widely disbelieved. Gore could not have gotten us into this.

Gore would not have taken the United States to war in Iraq. He would have finished the job in Afghanistan -- it was al-Qaeda and its Taliban enablers who were responsible for the attacks on us on Sept. 11, 2001, not Saddam Hussein, no matter how vile he might have been. Gore would not have dealt with the Iranians and the North Koreans in such a juvenile fashion -- axis of evil, after all -- and all over the world, wherever you and I went, we would not detect such anger toward America. The last time I saw Gore was at a screening of his now-acclaimed movie, "An Inconvenient Truth." I wrote at the time that, on paper at least, he was the near-perfect Democratic presidential candidate -- right on the war, above all. This observation, hardly original with me, is being echoed elsewhere, and it would be impossible for Gore to ignore it. Jimmy Carter said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that he thought Gore ought to run and had told Gore so insistently. "He almost told me the last time I called, 'Don't call me anymore,' " Carter said. What Gore told me was something similar: "I think there are other ways to serve."

We'll see. After all, Gore -- the son of a senator himself -- was raised for the presidency. But for the moment at least, he is showing all the irritating signs of a man at peace with himself. He abandoned Washington for Nashville. He has made a bundle in his investments, and he has set out to show that there is life after a failed candidacy, a purposeful life in which a man can do some good. His movie and his speeches are -- to paraphrase what Clausewitz said about war -- a continuation of politics by other means. He cannot make war but he can still make a difference.

I know -- and so does Gore -- that all this will change if he enters the race. Maybe that ol' devil of uncertainty will come creeping out of his skin, and maybe he will become shrill, and maybe he will somehow throw his voice so that it seems to be coming from outside his body. But the woman I love tells me that life is a series of little lives, and no one has proved the truth of this better than Gore. With an Oscar in his fist and triumph on his face, Al Gore is a man you can tell your kid about. That, maybe, is even better than being president.

Gore To Bring Eco-friendly Message To UMBC (BSUN)

By Nia-Malika Henderson

The Baltimore Sun, February 27, 2007

Hoping to latch on to the buzz surrounding former Vice President Al Gore's double dose of Oscar, the Annapolis and Anne Arundel Chamber of Commerce said Monday that the Gore eco-friendly train will stop in Baltimore.

Gore, whose documentary, An Inconvenient Truth, took home Oscars on Sunday night for Best Documentary and Best Song, will give a 90-minute speech May 8 on the effects of global warming -- the topic that has turned him into a hip wonk.

DOJ_NMG_0137476

"We snared him a good while ago and it just happened that he got the Nobel Peace Prize nomination and Oscar wins, so that was pretty cool," said Anne Joyner, who handles special projects for the Chamber of Commerce. "I just hope that he doesn't announce that he's going to run for president. We like the 'What if he does?'"

About 1,000 tickets, priced at $35, have been sold. The venue, University of Maryland, Baltimore County Retriever Activities Center, holds 4,000.

Portions of the film will be shown before to the speech, which will also include a question-and answer session.

Since losing his bid for president in 2000, Gore has devoted much of his attention to global warming, traveling the world with a PowerPoint presentation and urging audiences to become "carbon neutral." Coming across as professorial yet likable, Gore has risen to a level of prominence unknown to most former vice presidents.

He scored laughs during a Saturday Night Live appearance and has become a favorite in Hollywood circles. (Yes, that was Leonardo DiCaprio and George Clooney fawning over him at the Academy Awards. And yes, that was Hollywood's elite giving Gore a standing ovation.)

Joyner said Gore could get a similar reception in May.

"He puts great care in accepting an invitation and gives it some personal attention," she said. "And he's recognized that Marylanders are environmentally sensitive and focused, and his mes sage will be well-received."

Clintons' Charity Not Listed On Senate Disclosure Forms (WP)

By John Solomon And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and former president Bill Clinton have operated a family charity since 2001, but she failed to list it on annual Senate financial disclosure reports on five occasions.

The Ethics in Government Act requires members of Congress to disclose positions they hold with any outside entity, including nonprofit foundations. Hillary Clinton has served her family foundation as treasurer and secretary since it was established in December 2001, but none of her ethics reports since then have disclosed that fact.

The foundation has enabled the Clintons to write off more than $5 million from their taxable personal income since 2001, while dispensing $1.25 million in charitable contributions over that period.

Clinton's spokesman said her failure to report the existence of the family foundation and the senator's position as an officer was an oversight. Her office immediately amended her Senate ethics reports to add that information late yesterday after receiving inquiries from The Washington Post.

"The details of the Clintons' charitable family foundation and Senator Clinton's role in it have always been publicly available, but, in an oversight that leaders of both parties have made, it was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, which has been corrected," Hillary Clinton's press secretary, Philippe Reines, said yesterday.

Among the institutions receiving grants from the Clinton Family Foundation were Yale University, where both attended law school; groups named for deceased heads of state in Israel and Jordan; and a charity connected to the Arkansas businessman who helped Hillary Clinton make $100,000 on a commodities trade that stirred controversy a decade ago, Internal Revenue Service reports show.

Hillary Clinton's decision to amend her Senate disclosures comes after several other high-profile politicians came under scrutiny for omitting family foundations from their financial disclosure reports, including former Senate majority leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). They amended their disclosures, and neither was penalized.

Advisers to the Clintons said the family foundation amounted to only a fraction of their overall charitable efforts, which generate millions each year.

The charity is separate from the New York-based William J. Clinton Foundation, which has directed $10 billion in corporate money and resources toward slowing the global spread of AIDS, addressing climate change, and reducing hunger and poverty in developing countries.

The smaller family foundation lists as its address a post office box in Chappaqua, N.Y., where the Clintons live. Hillary Clinton is listed as secretary and treasurer, Bill Clinton as president and the couple's daughter, Chelsea, as a director. None takes any compensation.

The charity has been funded with money from lucrative book deals for both Clintons and from speechmaking by Bill Clinton since they left the White House in 2001. The foundation's tax filings are available on an Internet repository for IRS documents. The only time the Clintons mentioned the foundation on her ethics report was in 2002, in a footnote about their $800,000 donation that year, but it did not disclose as required her position or other information about the foundation. In subsequent years, they made no mention of it.

Between 2001 and 2005, the Clintons seeded the charity with $5.16 million of their money. The foundation's 2006 tax form is not due until later this year.

Tax records show the Clinton Family Foundation was created during Hillary Clinton's first year in the Senate, when the couple gave $800,000 to launch the organization in early December 2001. The charity distributed no funds that year. The next year, the Clintons made $170,000 in donations while adding $100,000 of their own funds.

The Clintons donated much larger amounts in recent years as legal bills from Bill Clinton's impeachment were paid off and their personal fortunes soared. At the end of 2005, the Clinton family foundation had nearly $4 million in cash assets.

Jay Carson, a spokesman for Bill Clinton, said all of the foundation's remaining money will eventually go to charities and other institutions. He said the Clintons' other charitable efforts include raising millions a year for other nonprofits and making donations of their own money. He said the Clintons helped raise nearly $11 million the past two years for other nonprofits.

"It is hard to beat the Clintons' devotion to charitable work, unless you founded Microsoft or are the chairman of Berkshire Hathaway," he said.

The retired chief of the IRS branch that oversees tax-exempt nonprofits said family-run foundations are commonly created by wealthy Americans, allowing them to earn tax breaks by donating to a charity whose future good works they can control. Such charities need only to give 5 percent of proceeds each year to maintain a tax exemption.

"There are certain tax advantages to having your own foundations and not having the money as part of your estate," said Milton Cerny. "They can take the tax deduction up front, as soon as they put the money into the foundation."

Private family foundations vary in amounts they give away each year. The Clintons have given away a quarter of their money. The family foundation of record producer David Geffen, by comparison, has been giving away most of what it takes in -- roughly $1 million a year -- leaving it with a balance of $400,000 at the end of 2005.

The Walton family, heirs to the Wal-Mart fortune, put $415 million in new money into its foundation in 2005. It gave $158 million to charitable causes, leaving the foundation with a $1.3 billion balance.

The Clinton foundation's donations range from $100,000 to the Asian tsunami relief fund in 2005 to causes in the former president's home state of Arkansas.

The Clintons have been generous to their alma maters, with donations going to Yale Law School, Georgetown University, Wellesley College and Oxford University, which Bill Clinton attended on a Rhodes Scholarship.

The foundation has also paid considerable attention to Arkansas, providing the bulk of the support for the Clinton Birthplace Foundation, which maintains the former president's boyhood home in Hope, Ark. They have donated $225,000 to the Little Rock Baptist church they attended, and to organizations devoted to the needs of children in the state.

One Arkansas recipient was the Diane Blair Foundation. Diane Blair is the late wife of James Blair, the businessman who helped Hillary Clinton with controversial commodities trades in the late 1970s that netted her about $100,000. There are two foundations in Diane Blair's name. One is a private family charity; the other funds a center for the study of Southern politics at the University of Arkansas.

The Clintons' tax form indicates the money went to the private charity, but James Blair said in an interview yesterday that the Clintons "miscoded" the entry. The check actually went to the university fund, he said.

"She was Hillary's closest friend," Blair said of his wife, who died in June 2000.

At least three beneficiaries were from the Middle East, where the former president worked to forge an elusive peace agreement during the 1990s. They include $50,000 to the King Hussein Foundation, named in honor of the late Jordanian king, who was a key player in Clinton peace talks; $50,000 to American Friends of Yitzhak Rabin, honoring the assassinated Israeli prime minister; and the American Friends of Peres Center, honoring former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres.

The Clintons also gave $50,000 to the Vital Voices Global Partnership, a group aimed at empowering women worldwide. Hillary Clinton is an honorary chair.

Such omissions deprive the public of the right to scrutinize their political leaders' financial dealings and identify possible conflicts of interest, the former chief of disclosure for the Federal Election Commission said.

Kent Cooper, who retired after two decades overseeing the FEC's public disclosure office, said congressional ethics committees have not enforced the ethics disclosure requirements forcefully. As a result, he said, candidates "know there is no great consequences, and so the habit has developed that people dismiss an omission as a clerical error, when in fact it is a crucial piece of the puzzle about a member's finances that is being hidden."

A Bundle Of Good Moves (WP)

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137478

SEN. HILLARY Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has decided that her presidential campaign will reveal the identities of its major fundraisers, after all. This is welcome news for the conduct of the 2008 race, during which big bundlers -- the well-connected fundraisers who can help collect $100,000, $200,000 or even $1 million in donations -- will be more important than ever.

With Ms. Clinton's change of heart, the top-tier contenders of both parties -- Democrats Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards, and Republicans John McCain, Rudolph W. Giuliani and Mitt Romney -- have agreed to identify their chief campaign underwriters. The Clinton campaign said she would release the names of her big bundlers at amounts such as $100,000 or $200,000. We trust that as those bundles swell in size -- the Clinton campaign has tasked its top fundraisers with bringing in $1 million or more -- the levels of disclosure will rise accordingly, for the Clinton campaign and its rivals. With more private money than ever being raised and spent, this information is critical to campaign finance disclosure.

But it makes no sense for such disclosure to be left to the whim or goodwill of individual campaigns; it should be required by law. The click of a mouse can summon a blizzard of campaign finance data. Yet the most critical information -- the identities of the true financiers of the campaigns and the amounts they have brought in -- remains obscure, available only if campaigns deign to provide it.

In 2008, it appears, most of them will. But it is a shaky campaign finance disclosure system that relies on the good sense of candidates. The law could easily be tweaked and tightened to require candidates to report the information they already possess.

Obama And The Illinois Political Machine (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

CHICAGO -- Democrat Barack Obama piled on the praise last month as he stood beside Chicago Mayor Richard Daley and embraced the mayor's bid for a sixth term.

"I don't think there's a city in America that has blossomed as much over the last couple of decades than Chicago, and a lot of that has to do with our mayor," Obama said, supporting Daley ahead of Tuesday's city election.

It was a switch from a year earlier, when the Illinois senator brushed off questions about endorsing Daley and said reported corruption at Chicago's City Hall gave him "huge pause."

What happened in the meantime? Obama decided to run for president.

The endorsement is one example of the sometimes complicated relationship between Obama -- who offers himself as an untainted, non-traditional alternative -- and Illinois' sometimes tarnished political establishment.

While Obama prides himself as an independent-minded Democrat, he's maintained relations with important parts of the establishment, from remnants of the legendary Chicago Democratic machine to the city's leading black politicians.

Yet as an outsider who came to the city as an adult, he doesn't owe his political fortunes to ward bosses and can claim distance from the political corruption for which the city is famous. He's ruffled feathers in the past by taking on incumbents or bucking his party's anointed candidate in a statewide race, but he has also mended fences and now has Illinois' most important politicians lined up to support his run for president.

"He understands ... about politics and how you make friends in politics," said Rep. Bobby Rush, who Obama unsuccessfully challenged in 2000 for his seat in Congress.

Rush said Daley, for one, can be helpful to Obama because of his national reputation. Daley's brother, William, who headed Al Gore's presidential campaign in 2000, has already signed on as an Obama adviser.

Rush is also backing Obama's bid for the White House.

Growing up in Hawaii and Indonesia, Obama didn't come up through the ranks of traditional Chicago Democratic politics.

Obama writes in his book "The Audacity of Hope" that he got into his successful first race for the Illinois Senate at the encouragement of friends who thought his work as a civil rights lawyer and experience as a community organizer made him a good candidate.

That 1996 election put him in conflict with the incumbent, Alice Palmer. She planned to run for Congress and endorsed Obama as her successor. But when Palmer lost the congressional primary, Obama would not step aside so she could keep her state Senate seat.

Once he got to the state Senate, Obama was no radical. He became a political protege of current Senate President Emil Jones, a 35-year veteran of the legislature and one of the state's most influential black lawmakers.

Obama was in the Illinois Senate just a few years when he went after the congressional seat held by Rush.

In his book, Obama calls it an "ill-considered race," and he and another state senator who challenged Rush were trounced in the primary. Rush had the support of the powerful Cook County Board president and widespread support in his district.

Obama also was viewed as a long shot in his 2004 bid for the U.S. Senate. He decided to run even though most party leaders were backing the state comptroller, who was the son of a powerful Democratic leader. Other candidates included Mayor Daley's former chief of staff and a millionaire who had helped elect the Democratic governor. Obama's candidacy gained momentum when the millionaire businessman, who had once led in the polls, acknowledged striking his ex-wife and calling her names.

Once Obama's fortunes started rising with his starmaking address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and his Senate win, he found almost uniform support from Illinois Democrats.

Yet Obama still didn't always stick to the party line, most notably last year when he rejected the party-backed candidate for state treasurer to support a political newcomer, putting him at odds with the state Democratic chairman, Illinois House Speaker Michael Madigan of Chicago.

Over the summer, Madigan derisively referred to Obama as "the messiah" in a published report. But by early this year, Madigan was proposing moving up the state's 2008 primary from March 18 to Feb. 5 to give Obama more momentum early in the presidential race.

For his part, Obama has lined up with party leaders in some recent local races. He supported the party's choice to become the new Cook County board president, despite allegations of political nepotism surrounding the man, who was the son of the previous board president.

Obama also endorsed Daley, saying he was still concerned about City Hall corruption but thought Daley had taken steps to clean it up. And he supported the November re-election of Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich, whose administration is under federal investigation for hiring fraud.

Attorney Gery Chico, the Daley former chief of staff who lost to Obama in the 2004 Senate primary, said Obama has been under increasing pressure to play a role in local races and it's smart for him to get in the mix.

"You don't want to go the route of Al Gore," Chico said. Gore famously didn't win his home state of Tennessee in his failed bid for president in 2000.

But the Daley endorsement in particular -- featured in one of the mayor's campaign mailers -- isn't sitting right with some people in this city known for its legendary political machine.

Daley's father, the late Mayor Richard J. Daley, built the once-mighty machine that doled out jobs and favors in exchange for support for Democrats on Election Day. The courts have mostly dismantled the machine by outlawing political patronage, but the city's powerful Democrats -- like Daley -- can still turn out the vote.

Obama's decision to support Daley turned off voter Alan Dobry, who's part of a Chicago independent-voters group.

"He's trying to play with the machine," Dobry said. "I'm very unhappy about it."

They Rush For California's Gold (LAT)

By Dan Morain

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

A UCLA linebacker shells out $11,100 to help a Republican senator in Pennsylvania.

A businessman from the small northern California town of Eureka spends $515,000 to defeat a powerful Democrat in South Dakota.

A Silicon Valley couple funnels cash to elect Democratic secretaries of state in swing states such as Ohio who will oversee voting in the coming presidential election. Those tidbits from campaign finance reports demonstrate why California lately feels like Iowa or New Hampshire next winter. For politicians, including presidential candidates, it's where the money is.

Last week alone, Democrats Barack Obama, Hillary Rodham Clinton, Christopher Dodd and Joseph Biden made the trek. Republican Sen. John McCain was also here, following his rival, Rudolph W. Giuliani, who had been here the week before, while Republican Mitt Romney will be here next month.

"It is the place you go to get political money," said Sheila Krumholz, director of the nonpartisan Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, D.C.

Californians spent at least $502 million on federal campaigns in the last four years, federal campaign records show -- 24 percent more than runner-up New York and about 13 percent of all federal campaign funds raised nationally.

At the Los Angeles Times' request, the center compiled a list of California's top 100 donors to federal campaigns. The Times supplemented that effort by interviewing contributors and reviewing Federal Election Commission documents and other records.

The donations were for the 2003-2004 election cycle, which included the latest presidential campaign, and the 2005-2006 races for the U.S. House and Senate.Donors' motives vary. They might be trying to gain an edge in business, or access to powerful officials. Some win perquisites, such as ambassadorships. Many are ideologues whose passions run high on the war or health care or taxes.

Federal law restricts donors from giving more than $4,600 directly to a single candidate in a year. But many give far larger sums to independent campaign committees. Others leverage their money by organizing fund-raising events.

DOJ_NMG_0137480

In the past four years, Deborah Rappaport and her husband, venture capitalist Andrew Rappaport, of Woodside, have spent $5.2 million on federal politics, much of it to encourage young people to vote. They held a fund-raiser for White House candidate John Edwards of North Carolina earlier this month, raising more than $100,000.

"The stakes are huge," Deborah Rappaport said, describing herself as "an old lefty."

In one of the more unusual uses of campaign money, Silicon Valley Democrats Michael and Frances Kieschnick helped fund a successful campaign in 2006 to elect Democrats as secretaries of state who will oversee balloting in five swing states -- a reaction to perceived bias by Republican officials in Florida and Ohio in the 2000 and 2004 presidential vote counting.

Los Angeles-area developer Rick Caruso has a goal of raising $1 million for Massachusetts Gov. Romney's bid for the Republican nomination.

"I'm on a big Republican list," said Caruso, who has given $315,000 since 2003 to federal campaigns. "Politicians ... never lose your number."

Californians had a significant role in the 2006 fight for control of Congress, donating $6.6 million directly to candidates in the six U.S. Senate races that tipped control to Democrats, campaign records show.

In Montana, Democrat Jon Tester ousted Republican Sen. Conrad Burns by 3,600 votes, aided in part by Richard and Marilyn Mazess of Montecito. They gave $50,000 to the independent group Campaign Money Watch, which aired a commercial ridiculing Burns for his ties to "big oil."

Hollywood moguls Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg and other Californians donated $500,000 directly to Tester. Burns collected $460,000 from such Californians as Los Angeles venture capitalist Elliott Broidy and Edward Atsinger III, of Camarillo, chief executive of Christian radio network Salem Broadcasting.

"The money -- the California and New York money -- was very important to Tester," said political scientist Craig Wilson of Montana State University, Billings.

In addition to familiar California sources of political money -- defense, energy and aerospace companies, developers, unions, Hollywood and Silicon Valley -- the top donors include numerous lawyers, heirs and heiresses, and little-known financial, agricultural and other players scattered around the state.

(Among the big-name donors who don't make the latest list: Hollywood mogul David Geffen and investor Ronald Burkle.)

California is widely seen as a bastion of Democrats. But its greenbacks often are shaded Republican red.

One such Republican is Robin Arkley, who owns a finance and real estate firm in the far Northern California town of Eureka.

In 2004, Arkley had a hand in upending the Democratic power structure nationally when he spent $515,000 on independent campaign ads attacking then-Democratic Senate minority leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota. Daschle was ousted by Republican John Thune, who raised $1.29 million from California, more than any other state, including South Dakota, according to Political Moneyline.

One of the Taylors' sons, Christian, plays football for UCLA. He donated $45,000, much of it to such Republicans as Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

There was one savvy exception to the Taylors' Republican ways. They gave $20,000 to the Green Party of Lucerne County, Pa., including $9,000 from Christian. The goal: to help a Green Party candidate steal votes from Bob Casey, the Democrat challenging Santorum.

The strategy failed; Casey unseated Santorum. The Taylors did not return calls.

In addition to raising millions directly for President Bush, the state's Republicans have funded Progress for America, a group based in Washington that has countered the liberal MoveOn.org. In 2005, it aired television ads urging senators to confirm John G. Roberts Jr. for the Supreme Court. It also has run ads supporting the war in Iraq.

A. Jerrold Perenchio, chairman of Univision, the Spanish language television network, has given the group $9 million since 2003. Stockton, Calif., developer A.G. Spanos gave another $5 million, as did Los Angeles billionaire Roland Arnall and his wife, Dawn. Caruso chipped in $100,000 to help Roberts, now chief justice.

Bush has bestowed ambassadorships on five Californians, including Los Angeles car dealer Robert Holmes Tuttle, United Kingdom; Orange County investor George Argyros, formerly to Spain; Los Angeles venture capitalist Ronald Spogli, Italy; and investor Frank Baxter, Uruguay. Combined, they have given $1.6 million to the GOP since 2000, including donations to Bush's inaugurals.

The fifth, Arnall, is the biggest donor-ambassador. He represents U.S. interests in the Netherlands. Since 2004, Arnall and his wife, Dawn, have given $5.5 million primarily to Republican candidates and organizations, and another $1 million to Bush's 2005 inaugural. Arnall owns home mortgage lender Ameriquest Capital Corp. At $14.1 million, Los Angeles movie producer

Stephen L. Bing was the state's largest single donor to federal campaigns during the past four years, most of it to Democrats. Bing, who declines interviews, spent another $49 million on a failed California initiative in 2006 to boost alternative energy. He likely will support Clinton's candidacy.

Sen. Clinton, D-N.Y., has taken $7.7 million from here for her U.S. Senate campaigns, second only to the $26.5 million she has raised in her home base. After Illinois, California has been the second largest source of money for Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., Federal Election Commission records show.

Sacramento Democrat Eleni Tsakopoulos-Kounalakis and her father, Angelo Tsakopoulos, have helped organize events for many Democrats, but are "Hillary people all the way."

"We want to see the White House restored to competent hands," she said.

She explained her family's political involvement by telling her father's story. He came here at age 15 from Greece with nothing, made a fortune as a developer and hosted a president, Bill Clinton, at his home. Tsakopoulos never could have attained such success in the old country. These days, Democratic politician all come courting.

"Everybody calls and we love it," she said. "What an incredible honor and privilege."

Liberal Lobbying Groups Target 'Power Corridor' (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

Liberal lobbying groups are trying to flex their newfound muscle on K Street after a dozen years in exile, promising to avoid the same tactical mistakes that led to the downfall of, and jail sentences for, some Republicans last year.

"Washington has been congested with conservatives abusing their power for far too long," said Toby Chaudhuri of the Campaign for America's Future (CAF), a progressive lobbying organization.

"We're cleaning out the stables on Washington's K Street power corridor, opening the back rooms to the public light," he said. "We have an opportunity to challenge the grip the right has had on our imaginations and our policies over the past quarter-century."

Part of that effort includes lining up prime real estate along the K Street corridor of Northwest Washington, which has been the traditional home of lobbyists in the nation's capital. The group yesterday announced it is moving to K Street while simultaneously doubling its office space. It has traditionally relied on grass-roots support for its campaigns.

Mr. Chaudhuri said CAF has signed a 10-year lease for the new office space, which will be shared with fellow liberal activist organizations including the Progressive Majority, the Ballot Initiative Strategy Center, Americans United and USAction.

"Maybe they are moving over to K Street so they can get their contributions more directly from the AFL-CIO headquarters," said Grover Norquist, president of Americans for Tax Reform, a conservative organization with close ties to K Street. "They are a front group for organized labor. These are the anti-reformers."

Despite their deep ideological differences, CAF and other liberal organizations are trying to emulate some of the tactics used by Mr. Norquist in helping the conservative movement rise to power. For instance, Mr. Norquist hosts the "Wednesday meetings," a weekly gathering of conservative activists, strategists and Republican congressional staffers.

The CAF now hosts its own biweekly patchwork of ideological allies that they call the "Tuesday Group."

"After the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994 and the White House in 2001, Norquist and a network of conservatives tightened their hold on power by dominating lobbying firms on K Street and building upon patronage, contracts and one-party rule. The changeover in Congress last month has helped alter this political culture," Mr. Chaudhuri wrote in the release.

"Yes, it's flattering, except it doesn't work for them," Mr. Norquist said of the comparison. "What unites our various causes is the desire to be left alone by the government. They can't sit around the campfire, because the only thing that unites their coalition is the desire for more government funding."

Nonetheless, CAF helped to organize and fund a successful advertising campaign last year against several Republican lawmakers, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and former Ohio Rep. Bob Ney.

After stepping down from his leadership position, Mr. DeLay decided against seeking re-election and now runs a Web site that focuses on issues of importance to the conservative base. Mr. Ney also decided against running for re-election after pleading guilty to charges of conspiracy and making false statements stemming from his connections to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Last year in January, Mr. Abramoff pleaded guilty to three felony counts for his role in defrauding American Indian tribes and charges of corruption of public officials.

CAF says it hopes to use its new location to focus on energy independence and to "create a national conversation about providing health care coverage for everyone in America."

Court Upholds Calif. Stem Cell Agency (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise

USA Today, February 27, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — Three years after California passed a $3 billion stem cell initiative, a state appeals court has upheld the creation of the agency that will distribute the money, rebuffing legal challenges from abortion opponents and anti-tax activists.

The 1st District Court of Appeal Monday upheld a decision by a lower court judge who had ruled in favor of the California Institute for Regenerative Medicine (CIRM) last year.

The agency was created when 59% of voters passed Proposition 71 in 2004. In addition to creating the institute, the proposition authorized it to sell $3 billion in bonds to fund stem cell research over 10 years.

"Once again, the judiciary has upheld the constitutionality of California's innovative stem cell research project — in its entirety, without equivocation, and with absolutely no room for further argument," said Robert Klein, chair of the CIRM's Independent Citizens Oversight Committee. "We are grateful that the court rendered this decision so quickly, as it speeds the day when the will of 7 million voters can be fully realized."

The institute has not been able to borrow money pending the resolution of the lawsuit. But it has already received loans of $195 million from the state and philanthropic organizations.

Ten days ago the institute approved 72 grants totaling for $45 million for embryonic stem cell research at 20 institutions. "Another $80 million is teed up for mid-March," said spokesman Dale Carlson. Those grants made CIRM the largest U.S. backer of human embryonic stem cell research.

Robert Tyler, an attorney for Advocates of Faith and Freedom who helped the plaintiffs craft the lawsuit, told the Associated Press he expects the case to be appealed to the California Supreme Court. The plaintiffs are the California Family Bioethics Council and the People's Advocate and National Tax Limitation Foundation.

Among the arguments rejected by the court was the plaintiff's contention that officials from three university systems who sit on the oversight committee could benefit because their schools are applying for millions in research funds. The proposition dictates that those officials must withdraw when the board is considering an application from their schools.

The court also rejected arguments that the agency isn't under the exclusive control of the state. The plaintiffs argued that because University of California officials on the agency's oversight board aren't public officials, they have no authority to spend state money.

The plaintiffs have 40 days to file their petition, said Carlson. "(The) Supreme Court has 60 — 90 days to decide whether or not to take the case. If they don't, we can begin issuing bonds. If they do, case is probably resolved by year end."

Human embryonic stem cells are harvested from 3 to 5 day old embryos and are capable of becoming all tissues in the body. Researchers hope that one day they can be used to treat diseases ranging from Parkinson's to Alzheimer's to cancer.

But current techniques require the destruction of the embryo to harvest the cells, which is opposed by those who feel the destruction of the early embryo is the destruction of a human life.

In 2001, President Bush issued a decision limiting all federal funding of stem cell research to those projects using cell colonies, or lines, created prior to his August speech. California's Prop. 71 was in part a reaction to that decision.

School Lawsuit Gets Green Light (KCS)

The Kansas City Star, February 27, 2007

A lawsuit brought by one of eight former radiography students who sued career school Sanford Brown College in North Kansas City for fraud has been allowed to proceed.

Senior U.S. District Judge Scott Wright last week denied the college's motion for summary judgment, finding that there were disputed facts that needed to be resolved by a jury.

Although Wright's ruling technically applied to just one of the eight cases, he noted that all of the plaintiffs had made similar allegations, suggesting he will hand down identical rulings in the other cases.

Sanford Brown is a subsidiary of publicly traded Career Education Corp., which operates career colleges. The company posted $1.79 billion in revenues last year.

The lawsuits, which were filed in early 2005, charge that college admissions representatives lied to the plaintiffs about the cost of tuition, the availability of grants and loans, the jobs and starting salaries they could expect to get upon graduating, and the experience and preparedness of the school's instructors.

The lawsuit in which Wright ruled last week was brought by Darla Roberts, who alleged that the admissions representatives had sales quotas and were paid on the basis of how many leads they converted to interviews and enrollments.

One college admission representative, Maddy Koehler, stated in her deposition testimony, “It’s like any sales job, either you can sell it or you can’t.”

After getting her associate degree in December 2003, Roberts says she obtained a job at KU Hospital but had to be retrained because her supervisor said she did not know what she was doing.

Roberts and the other former students are represented by North Kansas City attorney Gene Graham of White Allinder Graham & Buckley, who declined to comment.

Kathryn G. Lee of Husch & Eppenberger, Sanford Brown’s attorney, said that Roberts’ claims concerned conduct that occurred before Career Education owned Sanford Brown.

Sanford Brown “believes that the allegations made by Ms. Roberts and the other plaintiffs are meritless, and it will continue to vigorously defend the case at trial.”

The lawsuits are among a host of legal headaches for Career Education Corp. Last May, the company disclosed that it was being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice after a false-claims lawsuit charged that some of its colleges had obtained federal funds to which they were not entitled. The company said it was cooperating with the investigation.

In mid-2005, the U.S. Department of Education imposed a moratorium on new company campuses, saying it was concerned by CEC’s “history of noncompliance” with federal laws governing financial aid.

The moratorium was imposed just months after CBS’ “60 Minutes” ran a scathing piece on the company’s Brooks College in Long Beach, Calif., which offers courses in fashion merchandising. Former students said that college officials lied to them about tuition costs, the quality of instruction, and the kind of jobs they could expect to get after graduation.

States Consider Tobacco Tax Hikes (USAT)

By Richard Wolf

USA Today, February 27, 2007

More than a dozen states are considering higher tobacco taxes this year, most often to help millions of uninsured people get health coverage.

Four of the most closely watched proposals call for tax hikes of $1 per pack or more, an increase attained by only four states in the past. Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle wants a $1.25 increase. Iowa, Maine and Maryland are considering $1.

The number of tax hike efforts isn't unusual: 21 states boosted tobacco taxes in 2002 and 17 in 2003 to combat the recession. Many of the new proposals are noteworthy for their size and link to helping some of the nation's nearly 47 million uninsured people.

"The amounts you're seeing are larger than we've seen in recent years," says Harley Duncan of the Federation of Tax Administrators. Expanding health insurance, he says, is an "expensive proposition."

Forty-two states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico have increased taxes since 2002 — 10 of them more than once, says the Campaign for Tobacco-Free Kids. Since 2000, tobacco sales in the USA have declined 15%, falling more steeply (27%) in the 19 states and the District of Columbia that tax cigarettes at $1 per pack or more, industry data show.

Taxes are rising in six states this year, pushing the average price of a pack of brand-name cigarettes to $4.26, up from $1.95 a decade ago, according to the economic consulting firm Orzechowski and Walker.

State tobacco taxes range from 7 cents a pack in South Carolina to $2.58 in New Jersey. They raised $14 billion in 2006, up from $7.3 billion a decade earlier. The 39-cent federal tax, last increased in 2002, raised $7.5 billion last year.

Industry officials say taxing tobacco to fund statewide initiatives is discriminatory. "It's asking one small minority group to fund a program to benefit the entire state," says Steve Kottak of R.J. Reynolds Tobacco. "Our view is, the smokers have paid enough."

Many states link tobacco taxes to helping people who don't have health insurance:

·In Oregon, where Gov. Ted Kulongoski has made this a top priority, Democrats must win five Republican votes in the House next month. The goal is to cover most of the state's 117,000 uninsured kids.

·Maryland House leaders want to double the state's $1 tobacco tax and help nearly one-third of the state's 780,000 uninsured.

Iowa Gov. Chet Culver wants a $1 boost to close the gap between $100 million raised from the existing tax and $277 million spent on smokers' health care.

Tax proposals have been made in at least 19 states this year, although some are not likely to pass. There are, however, a dozen advanced by governors.

GOP Firm Bucks Lobbying Trend (POL)

DOJ_NMG_0137484

By Jeanne Cummings
Politico.com, February 27, 2007

The rise of new Capitol Hill chairmen is turning lobbying shops across town into shades of Democratic blue and bipartisan purple, but one notable powerhouse is sticking with brilliant Republican red.

Barbour Griffith & Rogers was founded by political infighter and now Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour (R), and his old partners are now bucking the post-midterm trend of bringing in a Democrat.

It's a counterintuitive strategy that carries obvious risks, not the least being diminished access to the emerging power centers on Capitol Hill. But the firm's path, which plots a decidedly different course than most other GOP shops in town, also rests on a gamble: that at a time of razor-thin partisan margins in Congress and increasingly complex public policy, what you know can be as important -- and lucrative -- as who you know.

That helps explain why Barbour Griffith & Rogers was signing on a handful of policy experts last year when many Republican-controlled lobbying shops were scooping up key Democratic aides and operatives.

Among the firm's new hired guns: Stephen Rademaker, former Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist's national policy director; Mary Lacey Reuther, a health care expert from the Bush administration; and Celeste Ward, a military operations and Iraq expert who worked at the Pentagon.

Sure, they are all Republicans, making them easy fits inside the firm. But the firm's chairman, Ed Rogers, is banking on their depth of knowledge to attract corporations and other interest groups.

By year's end, Reuther, a former special assistant to Bush's one-time Medicaid and Medicare director Mark McClellan, was already toiling away on the interests of drug makers Eli Lilly & Co. and Bristol-Myers Squibb -- whose combined payments to the firm amount to $160,000 for six months work, disclosure reports show.

The firm saw a similar dynamic when it hired former U.S. Ambassador to India Robert D. Blackwill to head its international operations. Corporations interested in breaking into the fast-growing Indian economy flocked to the firm to get Blackwill's help in navigating the nation's complex regulatory system.

Loren Monroe, the firm's chief operating officer, said the firm isn't ruling out the notion of hiring a Democrat someday. But "we can't change our business plan in anticipation of an election." Their clients "know we're Republicans and we're not going to try to fake it."

The more business-oriented shift toward lobbying began some time ago. No longer can you "take Jamie Whitten (the former Appropriations Committee cardinal from Mississippi) to the Palm Restaurant and get your deal done" as you could in the late 1970s, says Rogers.

But the post-Abramoff era and the fear of future lobbying scandals have accelerated the pivot. Many lobbying experts say they must tinker with their tactics by relying more heavily on "white papers" and policy justifications rather than their own personal relationships with lawmakers to make a case for their clients. The changed leadership on Capitol Hill -- with Democrats' vow to curb K Street's influence -- has made tactical changes all the more vital.

Barbour Griffith & Rogers' unorthodox strategy looks beyond simple partisan balance to give itself maximum flexibility in creating coalitions to support client needs.

"Depending on the issue, you may need a Democrat, a lawyer, a public relations expert or a media handler. It's best to go out and find the person with the best skills to handle troubles rather than associating with any one Democrat," Rogers explains.

It's a corporate plan based in part by watching and working with Democratic lobbying firms that managed to survive the last six years of Republican dominance. Among them is Ricchetti Inc., whose namesake is Steve Ricchetti, a former Clinton White House deputy chief of staff.

Ricchetti says his firm succeeded by offering clients an array of services, from issue expertise to public relations advice to grass-roots organizing. Corporate clients with big Republican contracts also threw work his way, recognizing the value added in having bipartisan support for their legislative wish list. That balance not only can pad the vote in their favor but also insulate them from becoming poster children for pork in the political season.

Of course, when all the knowledge and strategizing isn't enough, a firm aligned with a filibuster-strong minority can work to deploy their most potent weapon: Kill the legislation.

Ricchetti was part of a coalition that blocked passage of Bush's much-coveted repeal of the estate tax. "We sometimes were hired to make sure things didn't happen," he says.

So, in addition to recruiting policy experts, Barbour Griffith & Rogers, with its deep ties to Senate Republicans and the White House, is now poised to become the Republican go-to shop for executing the "block and tackle" play on Capitol Hill, says Monroe.

Adds Rogers: "What's the story that's happened for the last three years? Things pass the House and get bogged down in the Senate. I predict for the next two years, things will pass the House and get bogged down in the Senate, again."

Remaining all-Republican has other advantages: It makes the personal and political relationships a lot simpler.

The firm's client list doesn't set off internal squabbles because of the philosophical goals of the clients they attract. But a token Democratic hire or two might squirm at working for a firm that's paid $360,000 every six months to protect the oil interests of Iraq's Kurdish population at a time when their congressional allies argue that Iraq should solve its own internal divisions. Or one that banks another $100,000 semiannual payment to track any congressional efforts to regulate tobacco for Lorillard Tobacco Co., maker of Newports and Kents.

The strategy also squarely aligns the firm with the us-against-them Senate Republicans. When those politicians are feted at fundraisers at the firm's well-appointed Pennsylvania Avenue offices, they can rest assured that a Democrat won't be nibbling on a fresh order of the same hors d'oeuvres the next week. "We don't try to be cute about it or split the baby," says Rogers.

Indeed, the firm is hosting a fundraiser for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky this week; Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada shouldn't wait for his embossed invitation.

Welcome to Pit Boss, a weekly take on money and lobbying in Washington. My plan is to get into the weeds every Tuesday and explain how lobbying shops work, who the players are and how that world intersect with political fundraising and spending. I'll be on the hunt for background brawls, winners and losers, and bundlers extraordinaire. I welcome any comments, advice and, of course, tips for tracking the town's most lucrative industry and its renowned political generosity.

Halliburton Moves To Cast Off Rest Of KBR, Become Pure Play (WSJ)

By Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Halliburton Co. took a decisive step to separate itself from its KBR Inc. unit, which generates a fraction of the company's profit but the lion's shares of headlines and headaches.

Halliburton said it would dispose of its 81% stake in the construction, engineering and government contracting firm by offering Halliburton shareholders the opportunity to trade their Halliburton shares for KBR shares at an unspecified ratio. If the offer isn't fully subscribed, the remaining KBR shares will be distributed through a special dividend to Halliburton owners.

In November, Halliburton sold a 19% stake in KBR through an initial public offering. The company has said for some time that it wanted to separate the KBR unit to raise the market value of its core oil-field-service business.

Halliburton, Houston, is the second-largest provider of specialized oil-field services by market capitalization behind Schlumberger Ltd. Its KBR unit designs and builds energy facilities, especially in remote and inhospitable regions.

KBR is best known for its logistical support contract for the U.S. military. Awarded in 2002, the logistics contract was expected to be fairly small, but it quickly ballooned as the war in Iraq escalated. Halliburton earned billions of dollars in revenue, but fairly thin profit margins. The company became a lightning rod for criticism, in part because Vice President Dick Cheney was Halliburton's chief executive from 1995 to 2000. KBR also drew allegations that it had overcharged the military.

Halliburton first discussed plans to separate KBR in 2004. Wall Street cheered the move as turning Halliburton into a pure-play energy-services company.

In 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading yesterday, KBR shares were at $24.12, up 7%, in anticipation of the decision. The stock is up 16% since its close on the first day of trading in November.

Halliburton To Complete Split With KBR (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

Halliburton, the oil field services provider, said yesterday that it would complete its separation from KBR Inc. by offering current stockholders the remaining 81 percent stake in KBR, its former subsidiary.

Halliburton, once led by Vice President Dick Cheney, will offer its 135.6 million shares of KBR in exchange for its own stock. KBR is the largest American military contractor in Iraq.

If the offer is not fully subscribed, any remaining KBR shares will be given to stockholders as a special dividend on a pro rata basis, Halliburton, which is based in Houston, said.

Halliburton's chief executive, David J. Lesar, first raised the possibility of separating from KBR in 2004. He told investors in January that the company was considering a share swap — called a split-off — rather than the originally conceived spinoff.

Philanthropy Hits Record As Number Of $100 Million Donations Increase (USAT)

By Martha T. Moore

USA Today, February 27, 2007

As the rich get richer, they get more generous. Much more generous.

DOJ_NMG_0137486

The number of individual donations of $100 million or more hit a record in 2006, according to The Chronicle of Philanthropy, which compiles a yearly list of the biggest givers. Last year, there were 21 donations of $100 million or more by individuals to universities, hospitals and charities, compared with 11 in 2005.

The biggest gift by far was Warren Buffett's pledge to donate stock in his investment firm Berkshire Hathaway, now worth $43.5 billion, to several groups, including the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation. Even without this huge donation, the philanthropy of the country's 60 most generous givers hit a record $7 billion in 2006, up from $4.3 billion the year before.

The reason for the increase in mega-gifts is simple: There are more people with deep pockets.

"It's a sign that wealth is growing and people are just raising their sights in terms of philanthropy," says Stacy Palmer, editor of The Chronicle.

Universities and other fundraising institutions ask for more and larger contributions, too. Stanford University, for example, is in the midst of a $4 billion campaign, the largest ever for a university.

Among those swimming in the deep end of the donor pool: Nike co-founder Phil Knight, who gave $105 million to Stanford's business school; David Rockefeller, who gave away $225 million, mostly to the Rockefeller family foundation; oilman T. Boone Pickens, who gave away $172 million, including $160 million to set up his own foundation; and New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg, who gave $165 million to 1,000 groups but would name only five, which combat smoking.

In addition to the amount of money available to be given away, philanthropy experts and the givers themselves say there is a greater consciousness that those who have should give.

"It's sort of gotten out there that it's the right thing to do to be generous," says Stanley Katz, Princeton University professor of public policy and a scholar of philanthropy. "For the moment, that's more of the ethos of wealthy people."

A gift the size of Buffett's does have an influence, one of the top givers says.

"When people see substantial gifts, and they're in the same league, if they haven't given to that level, they start to think about giving," Pickens says.

Backing Abortion Rights While Keeping The Faith (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — Frances Kissling has been called the “philosopher of the pro-choice movement” by her friends and an “abortion queen” by her critics.

But the name Ms. Kissling wears most defiantly, to the consternation of many religious believers, is Roman Catholic. For 25 years, as president of Catholics for a Free Choice, she has angered the church hierarchy and conservative Catholics by criticizing fundamental teachings on sex.

“I’m so Catholic, I can’t get away from it,” said Ms. Kissling, who was once in a convent. “How I construct concepts of life, of justice, it all comes out of being Catholic.”

Though unknown to most lay Catholics, she has inspired and worked with politicians and activists, many Catholic, to speak out in favor of giving women access to abortions and to artificial contraception.

On Wednesday, Ms. Kissling, 63, will step down from her post, relinquishing her role as one of the most vocal of the so-called bad Catholics, those who manage to accommodate the opposing sentiments of love for the church and anger at much of its doctrine.

“The constant refrain in this office is, ‘Are we really Catholic?’ ” Ms. Kissling said here in a recent interview. “I know with every ounce of my being that you don’t have to agree with the positions of the church on issues of abortion and contraception to be Catholic.”

Many Catholics passionately disagree. The United States Conference of Catholic Bishops has issued statements challenging the right of Catholics for a Free Choice to call itself Catholic. Critics dismiss Ms. Kissling’s organization as a mouthpiece for bigger, secular abortion rights groups and a front for anti-Catholic bigotry.

“They could get special attention and get special digs at the church because of their name,” said Helen M. Alvaré, an associate professor of law at the Catholic University of America and a former planning director of the Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities at the Catholic Bishops conference. “They had no grass-roots base among Catholics. There was nothing very different about them from other pro-choice groups in the arguments they made.”

Catholics for a Free Choice says it gives voice to the large percentage of Roman Catholics who disagree with the church’s position on reproductive issues. Its $3 million budget is largely financed by well-known secular foundations, including the Ford Foundation.

Ms. Kissling agrees with her detractors that her organization has not affected church doctrine. Instead, it has focused on working with lay Catholics and others to build momentum for its causes.

DOJ_NMG_0137487

With other groups, it successfully lobbied against the naming of John Klink, a former representative of the Holy See at the United Nations, to lead the State Department Bureau of Population, Refugees and Migration in 2001. Most recently, it worked with staff members for Representatives Rosa DeLauro, Democrat of Connecticut, and Tim Ryan, Democrat of Ohio, to draft legislation intended to decrease abortions, partly by increasing financing for family planning.

Sitting in her Washington office, Ms. Kissling was unequivocal in her distaste for the church hierarchy. "I think that in many ways, the church has become an unjust institution," she said. On one wall of her office was a cherub, on another a Che Guevara calendar. In a corner stood a candle that looked like a bishop's miter, yet to be lit.

Ms. Kissling continued: "It abuses nuns, anyone who thinks, homosexuals, women who have abortions. It sexually abuses children. It treats people badly, and something has to be done to change its abusive nature."

Ms. Kissling was born Frances Romanski into a working-class Polish family in New York, the oldest of four children. When she was a child, her mother divorced and later married a man named Kissling, which in the eyes of the church made her an adulteress, Ms. Kissling said.

Despite her frustration with such beliefs, Ms. Kissling said, she was inspired by the nuns at her Catholic school. In the early 1960s, she joined a convent, at age 19.

Convent life demanded that she look deep inside herself, she said, and she discovered that she did not agree with the church's teachings on divorce and birth control. She left after six months to attend the New School.

Avowedly heterosexual, she said she never had a desire to marry or have children. She became active in the women's movement in the 1960s. Then in 1970, when abortion was legalized in New York, she was asked to direct an abortion clinic in Pelham. She had no experience, she said, but neither did anyone else, so she took the position.

In 1978, she joined the board of Catholics for a Free Choice, and in 1982, she took over as president.

Critics and supporters say Ms. Kissling has a more nuanced view of abortion than many in the abortion rights movement. She said her experience working at an abortion clinic and her upbringing in the church made her believe "there was a certain void in the pro-choice movement around the questions of morality and ethics."

In late 2004, she published an article in her group's magazine, Conscience, titled "How to Think About the Fetus." She said that while the fetus might not be a person, it was part of the continuum of humanity. She wrote that the fetus "is not nothing," and that women who consider abortion know that.

Ms. Kissling said that abortion rights leaders feared acknowledging the value of a fetus because they did not want to further stigmatize abortion. But, she contends, that reticence has cast the abortion rights movement as casual about the emotional realities of abortion.

"Women know that something is inside them, and they know that something will become a baby if they don't act in some way," she said. "I don't think we could say anything to them about the value of fetal life that they haven't thought of already."

Many abortion rights leaders said the article was damaging, especially because it came out while politicians were considering bans on so-called partial-birth abortions. But others, including some in the anti-abortion camp, commended Ms. Kissling.

"With her approach, she has found the real-life stuff," said Representative Ryan, a Catholic who opposes abortion. "Those of us in the debate get hooked on philosophy and theory and dogma, and what Frances brings is reality: that abortion is a difficult decision for a woman."

Ms. Kissling said she had decided to step down because she believed that her efficacy might soon wane, that she was on the "verge of becoming boring or predictable." Jon O'Brien, 41, executive vice president of Catholics for a Free Choice, is to take over as president.

Ms. Kissling hopes to write a book about the value of the fetus, or teach, or finish the house she is building on the coast of Uruguay, she said. She has no plans to leave the Catholic Church.

"There are days when I think I can't be a Catholic and that I want to go join a community where I am welcomed, honored, where I can join a parish," she said. "But in the end, I don't want to be a Methodist. I'm a member of the greatest religion in the world."

Senior Slump (WP)

.

THE TROUBLING condition of America's public high schools has long been recognized. Even so, it was sobering to learn last week that high school seniors, though taking more advanced classes and getting better grades, are performing dismally on national tests.

DOJ_NMG_0137488

The data from the U.S. Education Department revealed a disturbing incongruity between how well schools say students are doing and how well students really are doing. Transcripts show more students taking supposedly more rigorous courses, yet raising their grade-point average from 2.68 in 1990 to 2.98 in 2005. But when these same students had to demonstrate what they learned on nationally recognized tests, only 35 percent scored proficient or better in reading. That's the worst performance since the testing began in 1992.

Why? Advanced classes may have highfalutin course descriptions, but the curriculum has been dumbed down. Pressure to pass students has caused grade inflation. The students hurt most are poor and minority. The Post's Amit R. Paley vividly demonstrated this by visiting two classes supposedly teaching the same material. Students at a more affluent high school faced higher expectations and standards than those at a school with more poor and black students. But even students who typically are seen as doing well in school -- suburban, middle-class children -- showed no gains. And the data don't deal at all with the many children who drop out before 12th grade.

Some states are moving to overhaul high schools and stiffen standards. Twenty-nine states, including Maryland and Virginia, are working with Achieve, a nonprofit group, to raise academic standards and accountability so students graduating from high school are able to meet the demands of college or work. So far, the No Child Left Behind Act has focused mainly on the elementary grades. The national debate over the law's reauthorization must include a robust discussion of how to improve high schools and create national standards. If not, any progress made in boosting achievement in elementary grades will be lost.

A Bad Report Card (NYT)

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

The news from American high schools is not good. The most recent test results from the National Assessment of Educational Progress, commonly known as the national report card, finds that American 12th graders are actually performing worse in reading than 12th graders did in 1992, when a comparable exam was given. In addition, 12th-grade performance in reading has been distressingly flat since 2002, even though the states were supposed to be improving the quality of teaching to comply with the No Child Left Behind education act.

The new scores, based on tests given in 2005, show that only about 35 percent of 12th graders are proficient in reading. Simply put, this means that a majority of the country's 12th graders have trouble understanding what they read fully enough to make inferences, draw conclusions and see connections between what they read and their own experiences. The math scores were even worse, with only 23 percent of 12th graders performing at or above the proficient level.

Marginal literacy and minimal math skills might have been adequate for the industrial age. But these scores mean that many of today's high school seniors will be locked out of the information economy, where a college degree is the basic price of admission and the ability to read, write and reason is essential for success.

Congress, which is preparing to reauthorize both the No Child Left Behind Act and the Higher Education Act, needs to take a hard look at these scores and move forcefully to demand far-reaching structural changes.

It should start by getting the board that oversees the National Assessment of Educational Progress testing to create rigorous national standards for crucial subjects. It should also require the states to raise the bar for teacher qualifications and end the odious practice of supplying the neediest students with the least qualified teachers. This process would also include requiring teachers colleges, which get federal aid, to turn out higher quality graduates and to supply many more teachers in vital areas like math and science. If there's any doubt about why these reforms are needed, all Congress has to do is read the latest national report card.

U.S. Displays Bomb Parts Said To Be Made In Iran (NYT)

By James Glanz And Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 26 — In a dusty field near the Baghdad airport on Monday, the American military laid out a display of hundreds of components for assembling deadly roadside bombs, its latest effort to embarrass the country it contends is supplying the material to armed Shiite groups here: Iran.

Officers of the First Cavalry Division whose unit seized the components said they had been found in a palm grove just north of the Iraqi capital two days earlier, after a tip from a local resident. An explosives expert said the components were made to be assembled into the deadly canisters called explosively formed penetrators, or E.F.P.'s, which explode and hurl out a high-speed blob of copper designed to cut through tough American armor.

"I've lost good friends to these E.F.P.'s," said Capt. Clayton Combs, whose unit turned up the cache of weapons. "And the fact that we found these before they got to the side of the road is just a huge win for us."

The cache included what Maj. Marty Weber, a master explosives ordnance technician, said was C-4 explosive, a white substance, in clear plastic bags with red labels that he said contained serial numbers and other information that clearly marked it as Iranian.

But while the find gave experts much more information on the makings of the E.F.P.'s, which the American military has repeatedly argued must originate in Iran, the cache also included items that appeared to cloud the issue.

Among the confusing elements were cardboard boxes of the gray plastic PVC tubes used to make the canisters. The boxes appeared to contain shipments of tubes directly from factories in the Middle East, none of them in Iran. One box said in English that the tubes inside had been made in the United Arab Emirates and another said, in Arabic, "plastic made in Haditha," a restive Sunni town on the Euphrates River in Iraq.

The box marked U.A.E. provided a phone number for the manufacturer there. A call to that number late Monday encountered only an answering machine that said, "Leave your number and we will call you back."

Anthony H. Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh A. Burke chair in strategy at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington, said that despite those confusing new elements, the United States has been cautious in how it has presented the possible evidence of Iranian involvement.

"The case that has been made has been very careful and very restrained," Mr. Cordesman said. "If this is unrealistic, it can't be blamed on the intelligence community. This has had the highest possible policy level review, and credibility on an international level is clearly the major criteria in reviewing everything that was said."

Other analysts have expressed skepticism that the American military has made a strong case for the Iranian origin of the E.F.P.'s as tensions are running high between the United States and Iran over its nuclear program.

Items in the cache included the concave copper dishes called liners that cap the canisters and roll into deadly armor-piercing slugs when the explosive detonates. There were also various kinds of electronics, presumably for arming and triggering the devices, the PVC tubes, and two types of rockets and mortar shells that Major Weber said had markings and construction that identified them as being Iranian in origin.

The PVC tubes, of several different sizes, appeared to be fittings of the kind of used to splice two stretches of PVC tube together in routine applications.

"It's worth pursuing that it's machine-made and you can track the country of origin," said Maj. Jeremy Siegrist of the First Cavalry Division. "And it's manufactured for a specific purpose."

That raised the possibility that the parts were purchased on the open market and that the liners were then manufactured to the right size to cap the fittings.

Captain Combs said the cache was hidden in buried freezers and an 80-gallon water container. "What they couldn't bury, like the 122-millimeter rockets you see in front of you, was covered in tarps," he said.

U.S. Find Stokes Fears Of Iraqis' Bomb-Making Ability (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- An American military raid in southern Iraq uncovered a makeshift factory used to construct advanced roadside bombs that the U.S. had thought were made only in Iran. The find raises fears that Shiite Muslim insurgents across Iraq may be able to manufacture large quantities of such weapons on their own.

The Saturday raid in the small town of Jedidah marked the first time U.S. forces found evidence that militants inside Iraq are assembling "explosively formed penetrators," or EFPs, which can punch through the armored shells of U.S. military vehicles. U.S. officials said they found components for building about 150 of the devices, one of the largest caches of such weapons found to date in Iraq.

This find -- separate from one made in the southern city of Hilla a week ago -- is forcing U.S. officials to reassess their belief that such bombs were being built in Iran and smuggled fully assembled into Iraq. U.S. commanders briefing reporters here said Iraqi militants appear able to construct the bombs out of materials purchased locally or shipped into the country from Iran.

"We originally thought these came into Iraq already created, and now that intelligence has been totally relooked," said Capt. Clayton Combs, who led the raid. "It's like a playground kit you get in the mail: You can plot the instructions and start putting it together on-site, and that's what we have here."

U.S. commanders said the discovery raises concerns that the weapons could go into wider use, if militants no longer depend on receiving fully assembled devices from Iran or other sources. U.S. officials say the bombs, used mostly by Shiite militants, are more lethal than conventional roadside bombs used by Sunni insurgents.

U.S. military commanders said many of the weapons seized in the Saturday raid -- including mortar shells, rocket-propelled grenades and large quantities of plastic explosive -- had markings indicating they had been manufactured in Iran. That could be used by the Bush administration to bolster its allegation that Iran is funneling weapons to Shiites in Iraq.

The U.S. commanders said they hadn't found evidence linking the weapons to Iran's government, army or paramilitary forces -- a connection the U.S. has yet to firmly establish despite its accusations. Tehran has denied the White House allegations and has accused Washington of fabricating evidence to justify a possible military strike on Iran.

The raid followed a call to a U.S.-run hotline from an Iraqi reporting that weapons were stored in a palm grove in Jedidah, a town near the Shiite city of Baqubah. U.S. forces searching the site found two freezers and a large water container that had been buried up to their lids and covered with palm fronds. Inside were dozens of rocket-propelled-grenade warheads, rocket launchers, mortar rounds and other weapons, U.S. commanders said.

The most important find was a mound of 150 concave copper caps, the main ingredient in EFPs, they said. When EFPs detonate, the caps turn into molten balls that can pierce the armored shells of Humvees or other vehicles, killing or maiming the soldiers inside.

Capt. Combs said the copper caps were smooth and perfectly symmetrical, suggesting they had been made with a high degree of technical precision. He said he didn't know where the caps came from or whether they had been made in Iran. "That's the hard thing about this war," he said.

Army Officers Say Iran Made Bomb Components (LAT)

By David Zucchino

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

BAGHDAD -- In the latest attempt to link the deadliest form of roadside bombs in Iraq to components manufactured in Iran, U.S. Army officers today displayed plastic explosives they said were made in Iran and recovered during a raid Saturday in violence-racked Diyala province.

An Army explosives expert said the C-4 plastic explosives were used to make lethal bombs that the military calls EFPs -- explosively formed projectiles. The explosives were found alongside enough bomb-making materials to build 150 EFPs capable of penetrating heavily armored vehicles, according to the expert, Maj. Martin Weber.

Mortars and rockets found in the same cache also were manufactured in Iran, Weber said. The cache included 150 machine-milled copper plates that form a shaped, concave lid on the projectile. When the weapons explode, those lids form balls of molten metal that can punch through the armor on vehicles.

The cache was believed to be the first EFP manufacturing site found inside Iraq, officers said. They had previously assumed that most EFPs were assembled outside the country and brought in nearly whole.

Officers said they did not know where the copper plates were manufactured, or by whom. They also said they could not prove who supplied the materials or who was building the EFPs.

The briefing was the third in two weeks in which U.S. military officials set forth evidence that they said showed Iran's hand in Iraq's violence.

By contrast with previous sessions, officers at today's display were careful not to accuse the Iranian government of involvement. U.S. officials have had to backtrack from previous assertions of direct involvement by Iran's top government officials.

"I don't think there's any way for us to know if it's tied to any government," said Maj. Jeremy Siegrist, the executive officer for the unit that recovered the materials. "That's a stretch too far."

But by summoning reporters to the display and providing Weber as an on-site expert to assert that some items came from Iran, the military was clearly emphasizing the linkage to that country.

Weber said cutting, stamping and milling the copper plates requires technical expertise, as does arming and triggering the EFPs. He said Iran has the necessary expertise. That country provides weapons and technical support for Hezbollah, which has used similar explosive devices in southern Lebanon.

Referring to the C-4, rockets and mortars, Weber said, "you can establish the country of origin, and that is a fact."

Capt. Clayton Combs, the company commander whose 1st Cavalry unit recovered what officers called "an IED factory," using the military acronym for improvised explosive devices, or roadside bombs, said he found it "interesting" that explosives, rockets and mortars from Iran were including among EFP-making materials. Asked to elaborate, Combs replied, "I'm not willing to go beyond that."

A cache of EFP materials found by U.S. forces in Hilla, south of Baghdad, last week was probably a transit point for materials to be assembled elsewhere, Weber speculated. The Hilla cache – and many others found by U.S. troops – included C-4 explosives made in Iran, Weber said.

DOJ_NMG_0137491

Mortars and rockets are commonly used in other types of IEDs. The rockets and mortars found in Diyala, a province north of Baghdad, were manufactured in 2006 and 2002, respectively, officers said, meaning they were not left over from the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s.

EFPs have killed at least 170 U.S. troops, according to U.S. officials. So far, 3,156 U.S. troops have died in the war.

The Bush administration is mounting a campaign to isolate and discredit Iran over its nuclear program and its alleged role inside Iraq. It has accused the Al Quds Brigade, a unit of Iran's Revolutionary Guard, of supporting Shiite attacks against U.S. forces in Iraq.

Siegrist said U.S. troops were tipped off about the bomb site in Diyala by a local resident. The materials were hidden inside two freezers and a water container buried in a palm grove.

The cache included plastic plumbing pipes cut to form EFP housings, along with metal rings used to secure the devices. Also found were detonation cord, blasting caps, fuses, voltage regulators and ball bearings.

On display today was a fully formed EFP, which Combs said had been found at the site, fitted with a C-4 charge. The device is the size and shape of a large coffee can. It was fitted with what Weber said was a metal sighting device for aiming at a target. It was topped with a copper plate, or disk, the size of a bread plate.

EFPs cause more damage than other types of IEDs because of "the density and speed of two to four pounds of metal [copper] traveling at an extremely high rate of speed," Weber said.

Also recovered from the Diyala site were 15 122-mm rockets, two dozen 120-mm mortar rounds, mines, anti-aircraft ammunition and rocket-propelled grenades, Combs said.

The most significant items were the copper plates, made from 5mm copper sheets, Combs said.

"They're the hardest part to make," he said. "You need good quality copper and it has to be done just right, so this is a major find."

Diplomats To Begin Drafting New U.N. Sanctions On Iran (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 26 — The coalition of six world powers that has been trying to get Iran to rein in its nuclear program will begin drafting a new United Nations Security Council resolution to ratchet up the pressure again, officials said Monday after a meeting in London.

Top officials from the United States, Britain, China, Russia, Germany and France agreed to begin working on the resolution after the International Atomic Energy Agency reported last week that Iran was expanding its efforts to enrich uranium, in continuing defiance of the United Nations.

The State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the United States was willing to join in talks between the Europeans and Iran over the nuclear program, provided that Iran suspended its uranium enrichment activity.

Mr. McCormack added: “Should they choose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences. And those consequences will be diplomatic isolation from the rest of the world.”

Although American and British officials sounded buoyant, the United States discovered last year that there could be a long way between the start of work on a sanctions resolution against Iran and passage by the Security Council.

The first sanctions resolution against Iran took about four months to put together, after much disagreement between the United States and Russia in particular.

The resolution that finally passed, two days before Christmas, was much weaker than American officials had wanted. It banned the import and export of materials and technology used in uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missiles, and froze the assets of 12 Iranians and 10 companies said to be involved in nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

But it did not include a mandatory travel ban on people involved in nuclear activities, as the Bush administration had proposed. To achieve consensus, the Americans dropped their insistence on a travel ban after Russia balked. Moscow also balked over sanctions against a nuclear power plant that Russia is building at Bushehr, in southern Iran.

The resolution gave Iran 60 days from Dec. 23 to suspend uranium enrichment — the first step in making fuel that can be used for civilian power plants or atomic bombs — or face further sanctions.

American and European officials are hoping that this time in the Security Council, things will be different. The United States and Britain would like to see the next round of sanctions include the travel ban, as well as a further freeze on international financial transactions by top Iranian officials.

“We’ve done a lot of the political negotiation that we didn’t do last time,” said one European diplomat involved in the negotiations. He characterized the meeting on Monday in London, attended by the American under secretary of state for political affairs, R. Nicholas Burns, and his five counterparts from Europe, Russia and China, as “one of the best meetings that they’ve had yet.”

But, he added, “I’m sure it won’t be straightforward.”

A second sanctions resolution would be part of the overall increase in oratory and pressure against Iran by the Bush administration, which has also accused the Iranians of meddling in Iraq. Part of the debate on another resolution is bound to reflect concern from Russia over the possibility of American military action against Iran.

Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that “all options are still on the table” for Washington to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, a comment that has heightened fears that the administration is considering attacking Iran’s nuclear sites.

The Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, said Monday, during a conversation with President Vladimir V. Putin that was broadcast on state television, that Moscow was worried about that kind of talk.

Major Powers Work On Iran Resolution (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, February 27, 2007

The five permanent Security Council members and Germany began work Monday on a new U.N. resolution to pressure Iran to suspend parts of its nuclear program, but said they were still committed to seeking a diplomatic solution.

The six nations, meeting in London, said they were seeking the best way to "re-engage" Tehran after it failed to respect a U.N. deadline to halt its uranium enrichment work. However, they said no decisions were made and more talks were needed.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, briefing reporters in Washington after the meeting, said the diplomats would hold a telephone conference Thursday, "at which time they hope to be able to hammer out the elements of a U.N. sanctions resolution."

However, sharp differences appear to remain between the tough U.S. position and what Russia and China, veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are willing to accept.

The U.N.'s nuclear watchdog confirmed last week that Iran had defied a Security Council order to freeze enrichment — a possible path to nuclear arms — expanding its program instead. Iran insists its only interest in the technology is for the production of fuel for nuclear power plants.

John Sawers, the British Foreign Office official who chaired the closed one-day meeting, issued a statement calling Monday's meeting a productive first step.

"We also considered how best to re-engage with Iran. We are all committed to seeking a negotiated solution," Sawers said.

The senior officials from Britain, the United States, France, Germany, Russia, China and the EU Secretariat discussed the possibility of imposing incremental restrictions on trade and arms for Iran, officials said.

Sanctions approved in December ban all countries from supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and froze the Iranian assets of 10 key companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

Russia and China are likely to oppose strict economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition. Before the meeting Monday, a senior British diplomat said officials would examine options including whittling away at export credits made available to companies that trade with Iran.

"I expect the tortuous negotiations will continue and not result in any meaningful compromise anytime soon," said Ray Takeyh, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, a U.S. think tank. "There is a fundamental disagreement about what kind of a threat and how much of a threat Iran poses."

McCormack said U.S. officials want to engage in negotiations with Iran. "But we are equally committed to sending the message to the Iranian government: Should they chose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences," he said.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator on Monday said if the United States made a formal request for talks, Iran would respond positively but would not accept conditions placed on such discussions, the country's official news agency reported.

The Islamic Republic News Agency said Ali Larijani was responding to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's comments Sunday that the U.S. would hold direct talks with Iran if Tehran suspended its nuclear program.

Iran has repeatedly said it would not freeze enrichment as a precondition to holding talks on its nuclear program.

"Setting conditions means indicating the outcome of talks prior to holding them. Therefore, such a policy has not been answerable," IRNA quoted Larijani as saying.

Diplomats Seek Way To 'Reengage' Iran (WP)

By Mary Jordan

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 26 -- Representatives of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council and Germany said after meeting in London on Monday that they were committed to seeking a negotiated solution with Iran, which has defied a U.N. order to halt its uranium enrichment program.

In Washington, meanwhile, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters that the six nations had "agreed on the fact that they will go forward with a U.N. sanctions resolution."

McCormack said the six nations -- the United States, Britain, France, China, Russia and Germany -- wanted Iran to negotiate. But he also said, "We are equally committed to sending the message to the Iranian government: Should they choose not to proceed down that pathway, then there will be consequences."

Last week, the International Atomic Energy Agency issued a report saying that rather than halting its uranium enrichment program, Iran had expanded it.

During a visit Saturday to Sydney, Vice President Cheney told reporters that "all options are still on the table" for dealing with Iran, raising concerns that the United States was considering a possible military strike.

The United States accuses Iran of secretly using its nuclear program in an effort to build atomic weapons. The Tehran government insists its program is solely for energy purposes and that it has no intention of stopping its uranium enrichment as demanded by the Security Council.

Officials at the talks sought to play down any rising confrontation. John Sawers, the British official chairing Monday's meeting, issued a statement saying that the group had "considered how best to reengage with Iran. We are all committed to seeking a negotiated solution."

Not all parties agree on the seriousness of the threat from Iran or how best to contain it. Of the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, Russia and China have resisted tough sanctions.

In December, the Security Council banned countries from supplying Iran with technology that could be used in its nuclear and missile programs and froze the assets of certain companies and individuals. Now wider economic sanctions are being considered, along with a travel ban on some officials.

Officials from the six nations involved in the talks are to continue discussions by phone on Thursday.

UN Action On Iran 'Still Has Time To Work' (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

US and British diplomats yesterday said the west's strategy on Iran - involving a new round of measures at the United Nations - still had time to succeed, despite Tehran's failure last week to meet a UN deadline on its nuclear programme.

"The genie isn't out of the bottle yet but . . . they are working very aggressively to get it out," a US official yesterday told the Financial Times, referring to Iran's efforts to move ahead with uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons-grade material.

Last week the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, said Iran had installed or nearly installed more than 600 centrifuges at a site intended for large-scale uranium enrichment and aimed to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by May.

"They have not perfected running these things, there is still more work to do to master the technology," said the official.

The comments came as officials from the leading powers met in London to discuss whether to toughen the sanctions against Iran agreed last December.

The officials - from the five permanent members of the UN Security Council, plus Germany - will now consult their own governments on next steps.

"We began work on a new Security Council resolution . . . we also considered how best to re-engage with Iran," said the British Foreign Office.

It added that, following their "productive first discussion", the diplomats would resume contacts with one another this week.

The European Union and the US want to persuade Russia and China to sign up to a travel ban against named individuals involved in Iran's missile and nuclear programmes - who are currently subject to lesser measures - and to extend the list of people concerned.

In addition, the US, with some UK support, would like European countries to cut back on export credits to companies doing business with Iran and to restrict arms sales.

These measures may be difficult to agree at UN or even EU level. But for both export credits and arms sales, the big powers may decide to exercise greater voluntary restraint or to back a move at the UN that would call on, but not legally require, states to limit such dealings with Tehran.

France and Germany argue that demand for export credits is already declining because the nuclear dispute makes it less to attractive for companies to trade with Tehran. The incremental nature of the measures under discussion has led some to conclude that the west's approach is unlikely to persuade Iran to change course.

But the US and the EU argue that Iran's leadership has been unsettled by Security Council censure and Washington has sought to increase pressure on Tehran by actions such as dispatching a second aircraft carrier to the Gulf.

Such military moves have been criticised by Russia, perhaps the key countryin agreeing any further international pressure on Tehran.

Sergei Lavrov, foreign minister, said yesterday he was "concerned that forecasts and predictions of strikes on Iran have become frequent".

US Presses For More Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Stephen Fidler

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

US and British diplomats said on Monday the world's big powers had agreed to start work on new United Nations measures against Iran after Tehran's failure last week to meet a deadline on its nuclear programme.

They added that the west's strategy of incremental pressure still had time to succeed despite difficulties in agreeing far-reaching steps.

"We began work on a new [UN] Security Council resolution . . . we also considered how best to re-engage with Iran," said the British Foreign Office, after officials met in London to discuss toughening the sanctions against Iran agreed in December. The officials – from the five permanent members of the Security Council, plus Germany – will now consult their governments.

The Foreign Office added that the diplomats would resume contact this week.

Separately, a US official told the Financial Times there was still time to resolve the dispute diplomatically.

"The genie isn't out of the bottle yet but...they are working very aggressively to get it out," he said, referring to Iran's efforts to move on with uranium enrichment, which can produce both nuclear fuel and weapons-grade material.

Last week the International Atomic Energy Agency, the UN's nuclear watchdog, said Iran had installed or nearly installed more than 600 centrifuges at a site intended for large-scale uranium enrichment, and aimed to have 3,000 centrifuges operating by May.

The US and the EU want Russia and China to sign up to a travel ban on named individuals in Iran's missile and nuclear programmes.

In addition, the US, with some UK support, would like Europe to cut back on export credits to companies doing business with Iran and to restrict arms sales.

These measures might be difficult to agree and the big powers could decide to exercise greater voluntary re-straint or to back a move at the UN calling on, but not requiring, states to limit such dealings with Tehran.

The US and the EU argue that Iran has been unsettled by Security Council censure and Washington has sought to increase the pressure by dispatching a second aircraft carrier to the Gulf.

Such military moves have been criticised by Russia, which is key to agreeing further sanctions. Sergei Lavrov, foreign minister, said on Monday he was "concerned that forecasts and predictions of strikes on Iran have become frequent".

Meanwhile, Javad Zarif, Iran's outgoing ambassador to the UN, told a conference in New York that a deal on the nuclear programme that included a political commitment to peaceful activity, greater monitoring by the IAEA and the participation of an international or regional consortium in its uranium enrichment was still possible.

Mr Zarif told the meeting of the Century Foundation that there was "enough on the table already to find a resolution on the nuclear issue", but described the Security Council as "part of the problem", alleging it had been used as a tool of the US rather than as a genuine way of finding a negotiated deal.

He sidestepped questions about what conditions would be needed for Iran to suspend enrichment but said any demand on it to abandon its right to nuclear technology was "not a good solution".

Iran's Pursuit Of Nuclear Power Raises Alarms (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137495

Iran's mantralike insistence that its pursuit of nuclear technology is an internationally guaranteed right that it will never curtail has countries as diverse as the United States and China worried it is seeking a nuclear weapon.

But the huge increases in energy demand anticipated across the developing world over the next two decades, coupled with a growing urgency about global warming, have nuclear nonproliferation experts focused on Iran's case for broader and even more unsettling reasons. If a sense of entitlement to nuclear power and the fuel that makes it possible is allowed to take root, they say, the world soon could find itself with dozens of nuclear countries with the means to switch from peaceful energy production to building a nuclear arsenal virtually overnight.

Many of those countries would be in such hot spots as the Middle East and Southeast Asia, where a mounting temptation to keep up with worrisome neighbors could be too much to resist.

"It's not too difficult to foresee a world of dozens of virtual nuclear-weapons states, capable of building a bomb because of the nuclear material and technology they have, and Iran represents the danger of this future scenario," says Daryl Kimball, executive director of the Arms Control Association in Washington. "A country that claims it is within its rights defies the international community, and gets right up to the edge of producing bomb-grade uranium."

The question of how to control the spread of nuclear technology – which can supply both civilian electrical energy production and horrendous mass destruction – has been on the international agenda since the early 1950s. A key worry has always been how to control the nuclear fuel, uranium or plutonium, that powers a civilian plant but that also is a key building block for military use of nuclear energy.

Concerns receded in recent decades, as interest stalled in nuclear-power generation. But with the US Department of Energy predicting a 50 percent rise in global demand for electricity in little more than a decade – and with rising concerns about the effect of energy sources that produce greenhouse gases – nuclear is again a "hot" energy solution.

Enter Iran and its repeated claims to a "right" to nuclear technology and power. The UN Security Council's five permanent members plus Germany met in London Monday to consider a second round of sanctions against Iran, which the UN's nuclear watchdog agency last week said was accelerating its uranium-enrichment program. The meeting, not concluded at press time, was expected to produce ideas for additional turns of screws designed to bring Tehran back to the negotiating table.

Since the 1970 Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), international law has acknowledged a universal right to peaceful nuclear energy. But Iran is using a "pick-and-choose" approach to the NPT, many experts say. Even before the part of the treaty that speaks of a right to nuclear energy, they point out, the language first lays out a country's responsibilities to forswear military uses and to provide assurances that its uses are peaceful.

"What we're talking about here is a loose interpretation of a right to something that brings you to within days of having a bomb, but when people say there is a right to that they are wrong," says Henry Sokolski, executive director of the Nonproliferation Policy Education Center in Washington and a former Pentagon nonproliferation official.

It is "sloppy reading" of rules that include safeguards, Mr. Sokolski says, that has allowed Iran to move forward while citing "rights" but not responsibilities. Some countries and some US officials are pressing for a stricter interpretation, he says, that there is "no per se right to technology" without an equal willingness to prove that its use is solely for peaceful purposes.

A problem, though, stems from past practice of the US and other nuclear powers who have looked away as friendly nations with nuclear-energy programs developed their own programs for producing nuclear fuel. That response has allowed a list of nonnuclear-weapons countries like Japan and Germany to nevertheless possess all the material they need to have a bomb in no time (an alternative Japan has occasionally mulled over as North Korea has gone nuclear).

"We have winked at a list of friendly countries like Japan, Germany, Brazil, and others on the question of whether or not they should be able to make their own nuclear fuel, and the result is the idea that if it was true before it must be true for everybody," Sokolski says. The NPT says no such thing about nuclear fuel, he adds, because the international nuclear-fuel regime was never taken up by the treaty.

A problem for the international community is that many developing countries, no matter what they may think of the Iranian regime, perceive that Iran has a point when it speaks of developed-world favoritism, says the Arms Control Association's Mr. Kimball. Other analysts agree.

"Whether we like it or not, Iran is tapping into this issue of fairness and equality," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for America Progress and author of a new book, "Bomb Scare," on the future of nuclear weapons.

Regional fears about Iran's intentions are also a factor. As Iran has asserted a right to nuclear technology, other countries in the oil-rich Middle East have announced plans to develop nuclear energy – something many experts doubt is a coincidence.

"We may still be debating whether Iran's nuclear program is ultimately for peaceful purposes or progressing with the intent of building nuclear weapons, but the countries in the region have made their decision that it is an aggressive program that requires a counter," says Ilan Berman, vice president of the American Foreign Policy Council and an Iran expert.

Noting that at least eight countries in the Middle East have recently declared intentions to develop nuclear technology, he says: "They are looking for some sort of counterweight to the Iranian program, which the Iranians may say is for peaceful purposes but which [these countries] know has the potential of being a nuclear-weapons program as well."

Needed: disincentives to make fuel

Beyond the immediate case of Iran, Mr. Berman says, the NPT poses a problem in that its guarantees of access to nuclear power encourage countries to develop technology "that allows them to come within striking distance of a nuclear-weapons capability."

An urgent need, he adds, is a new international system that creates "disincentives" for countries to move beyond nuclear power to producing nuclear fuel.

Ideas are out there, though no one is jumping at adopting them.

One proposal is to create a privately funded "fuel bank" – a stockpile of low-enriched uranium for use by countries that pledge not to build their own fuel-cycle capabilities. The Nuclear Threat Initiative co-founded by Ted Turner and former US Sen. Sam Nunn has committed $50 million to creating such a bank through the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Others, such as the proliferation education center's Sokolski, say the incentives for nuclear-power production, including huge subsidies that countries give it, must be accounted for so that nuclear programs make economic sense. That would level the playing field as countries look for energy alternatives, and limit the "excuses" for developing a technology with a military adaptation, he says.

Jitters about nuclear rise again

While jitters about nuclear's potential for destructive uses are not new, they are heightened by the need for clean energy sources and new security threats.

America's first National Intelligence Estimate, issued under the Eisenhower administration, noted that countries would choose how to use nuclear technology "depending on how they think the wind is blowing," notes Mr. Cirincione.

"The challenge we face now is this: If we think nuclear energy is part of a global-warming solution, then we have to solve the nuclear-fuel problem to make the world safe for nuclear-power production."

Iran Demonized By U.S. And U.N. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

In response to "Table Talk1 by Michael Rubin and Danielle Pletka (editorial page, Feb. 21): Iran has not violated any of its international obligations by seeking to produce nuclear fuel for its civilian reactors.

While exercising its inalienable rights under the Non-Proliferation Treaty, Iran has cooperated with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), by placing all its nuclear facilities under the full scope of IAEA's monitoring and safeguard mechanisms.

After more than 2,200 days of inspection of Iran's nuclear facilities, the IAEA has time and again concluded that there is no evidence of diversion to non-peaceful purposes.

This raises a question: What grounds are the United Nations using to impose sanctions on Iran, while simultaneously ignoring the absence of disarmament and the proliferation threats posed by Israel, which has a huge nuclear arsenal and has refused the slightest inspections by the IAEA?

The international community must seek an immediate end to this outrageous double standard and discrimination against the rights of Iran.

Unfortunately, the right-wing pundits in the U.S. are blinded to Iran's rights, as well as to the constructive role of Iran in promoting stability and regional cooperation, intent as they are in constant demonization of Iran.

Iranian Leader's Rhetoric Criticized (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

TEHRAN -- Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad faced a new round of sharp criticism at home yesterday after he said Iran's nuclear program is an unstoppable train without brakes, language opponents say only inflames the West as it considers further sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0137497

In London, the United States and five other world powers agreed to begin work on a new U.N. Security Council resolution over Iran's refusal to suspend its nuclear program, but they remained committed to seeking a negotiated solution, British officials said.

The domestic criticism of the hard-line Iranian president came amid signs that Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei is growing discontented with Mr. Ahmadinejad.

Last week, the ayatollah voiced rare criticism of the domestic record of Mr. Ahmadinejad's government, and the president was notably absent when a group of Cabinet members and vice presidents met recently with the Shi'ite cleric, who has the final word in all political affairs in Iran, including the nuclear issue.

The Bush administration has taken a more aggressive stance toward Iran, building up the U.S. military presence in the Gulf and accusing Tehran of backing militants in Iraq. That has increased fears among Iranians of possible U.S. military action.

But on the eve of the London gathering, Mr. Ahmadinejad again struck a defiant tone, telling a group of clerics Sunday, "The train of the Iranian nation is without brakes and a rear gear."

Those comments brought a hail of condemnations in Iran yesterday, not only from reformists who have long opposed Mr. Ahmadinejad, but also from conservatives who once backed him but now see his fiery rhetoric as needlessly provoking the West into confrontation.

The conservative daily Resalat chided Mr. Ahmadinejad, saying "neither weakness nor unnecessarily offensive language is acceptable in foreign policy."

"Our foreign policy must reflect the ancient Iranian civilization and rich Islamic culture of the Iranian nation," the newspaper said.

Few details emerged from the London meeting of the United States and its partners -- France, Britain, Russia, China and Germany -- but State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said they would hold talks by phone Thursday "at which time they hope to be able to hammer out the elements of a U.N. sanctions resolution."

U.S. officials have been pressing for strong action against Tehran but have run into opposition, notably from Russia, over how tough a line to take.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow was "worried that the forecasts and suppositions of a possible attack on Iran have become more frequent."

Mr. Ahmadinejad's critics have grown more vocal since his allies suffered a humiliating defeat in local elections in December. That vote was swept by reformist parties and anti-Ahmadinejad conservatives who said the president has spent too much time castigating the West and has neglected Iran's faltering economy.

The president appeared to have toned down his rhetoric in the past few weeks, insisting Iran would not give up its nuclear program but using a more moderate tone and expressing a desire to negotiate with the West.

Iranian political analyst Iraj Jamshidi said it appeared "the top leadership has cautioned him about his remarks," but he added that Mr. Ahmadinejad's tough rhetoric "is part of his personality."

Iran denies U.S. and Western claims that it is secretly trying to develop nuclear weapons, and the country's political factions have long been united in their stance that Iran has a right to a peaceful nuclear energy program. So far, the criticism of the president has focused on his confrontational tone -- though some reformers have gone further, saying Iran should be more willing to consider at least a temporary suspension of the nuclear program.

At the same time, Mr. Ahmadinejad's top political rival, Ayatollah Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, has emerged as a high-level advocate of a more conciliatory stance toward the West, saying the nuclear dispute needs to be resolved through "dialogue and wisdom."

Mr. Rafsanjani, a top figure in Iran's clerical leadership, lost to Mr. Ahmadinejad in the 2005 election, but Mr. Rafsanjani's allies were among those swept to victory in the December local elections.

Iranian Scholars Denounce Conference That Denied Holocaust (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

TEHRAN, Feb. 26 — A group of Iranian academics, writers and artists has denounced the Holocaust conference held in Tehran late last year, calling it a move that endangered peace and hurt the reputation of Iranian academics.

The Iranian government organized a two-day gathering in December, billed it as a legitimate conference on the historical record and invited notorious Holocaust deniers and white supremacists from around the world. Among those from the United States was the former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke.

The Foreign Ministry held the event after President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said several times that the Holocaust was a myth invented to justify the state of Israel.

In a bold gesture, more than 20 academics, writers and artists, many of whom live outside of Iran, signed a statement that was sent to The New York Times and circulated on the Internet last week, arguing that the gathering was an exercise in propaganda.

The statement said the conference harmed the academic image of Iranian universities and merely provided a pretext for warmongers in the region. It added that the gathering perpetuated the immoral stance of Holocaust denial, a position that seriously endangers world peace.

"The extensive material evidence, the confessions made in the Nuremberg trial and other trials that took place after the war and the testimonies of the survivors established the veracity of the accounts beyond any doubt," the statement said.

"The accuracy of the accounts has been acknowledged by many academic, political and religious authorities, including the Catholic Church."

The statement added that talking inconsiderately about the genocide can only be described as rubbing salt into a historical wound.

"Those who perpetuate the discourse on Holocaust denial ignore the feelings of the people directly affected by this event," it said.

The statement also argued that denying the Holocaust would not help the Palestinian cause. "No matter what political position we adopt regarding the creation of Israel and its further expansion, the historical evidence for the Holocaust remains intact," it said.

"The Palestinians, like all other nations, have a right to enjoy their livelihood in their own independent state," the statement added. "This right has nothing to do with the denial or acknowledgment of the Holocaust."

Given the risk of harassment and repression for those who criticize the government, dissent over the so-called conference had been slow to build. Recently, reformist politicians and several members of Parliament voiced their outrage over the consequences of holding such an event.

Akbar Alami, the parliamentary representative from the northwestern city of Tabriz, had asked Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki to appear in Parliament to explain the ministry's plans for decreasing tension with the West in January and accused Mr. Ahmadinejad of conducting a reckless foreign policy.

"Why did we have to bring up the issue of the Holocaust, which belongs to 60 years ago?" Mr. Alami asked Mr. Mottaki.

Mehdi Karoubi, a veteran politician and a former speaker of Parliament, criticized the event last week, saying that it led to a United Nations resolution against Iran.

"Have we ever asked how questioning the Holocaust has harmed us and what price we had to pay for it?" he asked in a speech at Tehran University, the ILNA Labor news agency reported.

The United Nations reacted to the event in Tehran by adopting a resolution without vote that rejected denial of the Holocaust as a historical event.

Persian Shrug (WSJ)

By Edward N. Luttwak

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Almost everyone in Washington agrees that Iran is the big winner in the Middle East power competition, and the U.S. the big loser. Instead of the irremediably hostile Taliban, Iran now has a friendly Afghan government on its eastern border. Rather than having to face Saddam Hussein's regime, Iran has nothing to fear from an Iraqi government dominated by friends and obedient clients, many of whom lived as protected exiles in Iran for 20 years or more.

Having crushed Tehran's enemies, the U.S. finds itself under attack by Iran's rulers, who no longer have to worry about defending their own borders and can instead challenge American interests all over the Middle East, and as far away as Venezuela. At the same time, Iran continues to build facilities to process, gasify and enrich uranium, in spite of the International Atomic Energy Agency and solemn resolutions by the U.N. Security Council.

For some, including the Baker-Hamilton commission, all this is a compelling argument for negotiations. The hope is that Iran's mighty rulers can be persuaded to stop arming and inciting the insurgents attacking American and British troops in Iraq, and perhaps help to stabilize the country, allowing the U.S. to withdraw less ignominiously. Now there is even talk of a détente with Iran, that being the standard diplomatic method to deal with a hostile country too powerful to be intimidated or defeated, and with which one must simply coexist on the best terms that can be had. In this case, it would mean coexistence with Tehran's continued support for Hamas, Hezbollah, Islamic Jihad and three different Iraqi militias, as well as with Iran's nuclear program.

Back in the 1970s, détente with the Soviet Union was criticized on the grounds that it actually propped up a regime in irreversible decline, and whose power could be confronted successfully. In the 1980s, the critics of that détente led by Ronald Reagan had their opportunity to challenge the Soviet Union, which did not outlast the decade.

There is every reason to believe that history is about to repeat itself. Iran does not resemble the Soviet Union in any other way and certainly does not have even a fraction of its military power, but it too is a multinational state in an age when nations are everywhere asserting their separate identities. In arguing that there is universal support for the nuclear program, regime spokesmen and even many Persians in exile speak of Iran as a unitary state inhabited by "Iranians" who are very nationalistic, even if they oppose the ayatollahs.

None of this remotely corresponds to Iran's ethnic realities. Persians only account for half the population, and the other half includes many different nationalities increasingly resentful of Persian cultural imperialism.

Kurds account for some 7% of the population, and their nationalism is Kurdish and not Persian, having been much strengthened by the successful example of virtual Kurdish independence in Iraq. Their demands for autonomy have become sufficiently forceful to start an insurgency. The same is true of two smaller nationalities that are even more violently disaffected with frequent fire-fights and bombings: the Arabs and the Baluch, which account for another 3% of the population. But the largest of Iran's subject nationalities are the Azeris. While many have been assimilated, at least 20 million still speak an entirely different Turkic language, and increasingly form the core of a united Azeri nation that extends beyond western Iran to include the former Soviet republic of Azerbaijan.

The religious extremism of Iran's regime creates its own divisions. The bloody persecution of the Bahais, the new persecution of the Sufis and the institutional subjection of Christians, Jews and Zoroastrians have attracted greater attention, but the ill-treatment of the 9% of the population that is Sunni is more important politically: In Tehran where more than a million Sunnis live, there is no Sunni mosque as there is in Rome, Tel Aviv and Washington, D.C.

If Iran's economy were more successful, ethnic divisions and even religious resentments would matter less. As it is, with at least 20% unemployment and an annual inflation rate of some 30%, Iran's economy is scarcely a unifying force, especially because most of its minorities are distinctly poorer than the dominant Persians.

Viewed from the inside, Iran is hardly the formidable power that some see on the outside. The natural outcome of increasing popular opposition to extremist rulers, of widening ethnic divisions and bitter Sunni resentment of Shia oppression is a breakup. Certainly there is no reason why Iran should be the only multinational state to resist the nationalist separatism that destroyed the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia, divided Belgium in all but name and decentralized Spain and even the United Kingdom, along with other states large and small.

Once again, there is a better alternative to détente with a repulsive regime, and that is to be true to the Wilsonian tradition of American foreign policy by encouraging the forces of national liberation within Iran.

Germany's Iran Trade (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 27, 2007

Contrary to the impression created by your Feb. 20 editorial "Europe and the Mullahs," Germany's trade with Iran as well as its export credit guarantees have declined sharply in the past year. German exports of goods to Iran in 2004 rose by 33% compared with 2003; in 2005 the increase was 24%, and in 2006 exports fell by almost 8%. A further fall is foreseen for 2007. Export guarantees from 2005 to 2006 declined by 33%, due to the federal government having tightened its policies. A further decline by 40% is predicted for 2007. Over 2006 and 2007 export guarantees will thus have dropped in volume by 60%.

Palestinian Killed In Israeli Sweep Of West Bank City (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 26 — Israeli troops searched for militants and weapons in the West Bank city of Nablus for a third day Monday, going door to door and periodically clashing with gunmen and stone-throwing youths.

One Palestinian man was killed and his son was wounded, Palestinians said, the first fatality since Israel began the operation on Saturday through the warren of homes and shops in the casbah area of central Nablus.

The Israeli troops, in dozens of jeeps and armored vehicles, have placed the neighborhood under curfew and blocked off the surrounding streets with concrete blocks while they conducted an open-ended search.

The Israeli operation has kept tens of thousands of residents confined to their homes.

DOJ_NMG_0137500

"The operation will carry on until we achieve our main mission," said Brig. Gen. Yair Golan, the commander of forces in the city.

Over the past year, more attempted attacks against Israel have originated in Nablus than in any other West Bank city, the general said.

The Israeli military said Monday that soldiers had surrounded a house after they received reports that gunmen were inside.

When two men from the house were seen climbing onto the roof, the soldiers fired, killing one and wounding the other, the military said.

Palestinian witnesses and hospital officials identified the dead man as Anan al-Tibi, who was in his 40s, and said the man who was wounded was his son.

Palestinian medical workers said Israeli troops had stationed themselves outside the city's three main hospitals and were checking ambulances when they arrive to see if they contained suspected militants.

"The doctors keep asking the army to move back from the hospital entrance," said Ran Goldstein, a spokesman for Physicians for Human Rights/Israel, a group that is monitoring events in Nablus. "The soldiers might move 10 meters away, but they keep coming back."

Since Saturday, the Israelis say they have made several arrests and uncovered two bomb-making laboratories. Nablus, the largest city in the West Bank, has been a center for militants since the Palestinian uprising began more than six years ago.

On Sunday, the Israeli military interrupted Palestinian radio and television broadcasts to announce the names of seven wanted militants, and warned residents in the area not to hide them.

On Monday, Israeli authorities also said that they had arrested two Palestinian teenagers in connection with the stabbing death of a Jewish settler on Sunday night near the West Bank settlement of Bat Ayin, several miles from Hebron, and that the two confessed. The Israeli settler, Erez Levanon, frequently walked into the woods near his home to pray and meditate, neighbors said.

Also on Monday, the Hamas political leader in exile, Khaled Meshal, arrived in Moscow and praised Russia for its stance on the boycott in Western assistance to the Palestinian government, which is led by Hamas.

"We value Russia's position toward lifting the blockade from which the Palestinian people suffer," said Mr. Meshal, who is based in Syria, according to Russia's RIA news agency.

Russia is part of the so-called quartet of Middle East mediators, which also includes the United States, the European Union and the United Nations.

The group has demanded that the Palestinian government recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept previous agreements.

However, unlike the United States and the European Union, which have labeled Hamas a terrorist group and have refused to deal with it, Russia maintains ties with the group.

3 French Sightseers Killed Near Saudi Holy City (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 26 — Gunmen killed three French citizens and wounded a fourth near the holy city of Medina in Saudi Arabia early Monday, in a brazen reminder that attacks on foreigners there have not stopped despite an aggressive three-year security crackdown.

The Saudi Interior Ministry said eight French citizens had been traveling toward Medina from Tabuk, a northwestern town, when they came under attack. Two men were pronounced dead at the scene and another died in a provincial hospital later in the day, a Saudi security official said.

A fourth member of the group was listed in critical condition, Maj. Gen. Mansour al-Turki, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said late Monday.

General Turki said the group had stopped by the side of a road typically restricted to Muslims about 10 miles from Medina when a car pulled near them and opened fire.

The group included men, women and at least one child, he said, but only men were struck in the attack.

Two of the victims were identified by colleagues as engineers who worked at Schneider Electric in Riyadh, the Saudi capital.

The colleagues said the group had been returning from a trip to see the Nabatean ruins at Madain Salih, near Tabuk. Jean-Pascal Tricoire, the chairman and chief executive officer of Schneider Electric, expressed his regrets to the families of the victims in a statement on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0137501

The group initially included 17 Belgians who had left for home earlier in the day, while the others planned to go to Medina and Mecca, a security official said.

General Turki said he could not immediately confirm the religious affiliations of the dead. But Medina, where the Prophet Muhammad built a Muslim state and is buried, is strictly forbidden to non-Muslims. The group might have been traveling to another ancient site recently opened to non-Muslims, he said.

Philippe Douste-Blazy, France's foreign minister, condemned the attack as a "horrible act" and said the French and Saudi authorities were cooperating "so that full light is shed and that the perpetrators are arrested and punished."

The motive for the attack was not immediately clear. A French Foreign Ministry spokesman said late Monday that the attack had not been categorized as an act of terrorism.

A Saudi security official said remnants of Al Qaeda were believed to be hiding in the rugged area, where it is easy to find refuge. Police officers and paramilitary units were put on alert as a search for the suspects began Monday night, the official said.

Since May 2003, a wave of Qaeda-led attacks, initially against foreigners in Saudi Arabia and later against government assets and officials, has sought to topple the United States-backed monarchy there with suicide bombings and gun attacks.

The attacks included the beheading of Paul M. Johnson Jr., an American helicopter engineer. At least 75 other people have been killed, among them a BBC cameraman.

Saudi security officials have continued to make arrests and raid militant hide-outs.

French Nationals Killed On Saudi Tour (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, February 27, 2007

Gunmen in Saudi Arabia shot dead three Frenchmen who were working in the country on Monday as they were travelling north of the holy city of Medina in what appeared to be an attack by Islamic militants.

The attack took place as a group of nine French nationals, including women and children, were resting by a roadside, said Major General Mansour al-Turki, the interior ministry spokesman. He said it was too early to determine if it was a terrorist act.

"They are all residents who work in Riyadh and who had gone on a desert trip," he said, adding that the attackers escaped after apparently stalking the group as they camped overnight.

The French foreign ministry said one of the dead was a teacher and two others worked with French company Schneider Electric.

There have been no serious attacks against foreigners in Saudi Arabia since a spate of killings by extremists thought to be linked to al-Qaeda in 2003 and 2004. But western embassies have warned their national that the terrorism threat in the kingdom remains high.

Philippe Douste-Blazy, the French foreign minister, condemned the attack. "French authorities are mobilised along with the Saudi authorities so that light can be shed and that those responsible be detained and punished," he said.

Saudi Arabia's efforts to tackle terrorism have been under intense scrutiny since the September 11 2001 attacks when it emerged that 15 of the 19 hijackers were Saudi citizens.

In 2003 extremists launched attacks against compounds housing foreigners working in Saudi Arabia, killing dozens of people. Militants launched a further wave of attacks against westerners in 2004, including an assault on the US consulate in Jeddah. BBC security correspondent Frank Gardner was seriously injured and cameraman Simon Cumbers died in a Riyadh shooting attack the same year.

But there had been no serious attacks against expatriates since then and diplomats credit Saudi authorities for tough action against the threat of extremists.

Last February Saudi authorities killed five suspected militants believed to be linked to an assault on the Abqaiq oil facility, the world's biggest oil processing plant. In October US-led coalition naval forces moved into Saudi Arabia's port of Ras Tanura to counter a possible maritime threat to the oil facilities.

The British embassy's travel advisory warns that it continues to believe "terrorists are planning further attacks, including against westerners and places associated with westerners in Saudi Arabia".

Millions In Aid Linked To Yemeni Reform (CSM)

By Ginny Hill

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

President Ali Abdullah Saleh was en route to Washington in 2005 for talks on his country's role in the "war on terror" when his entourage learned that Yemen would be dropped from a list of countries hoping for millions in US aid.

DOJ_NMG_0137502

But no one in his retinue dared broach the subject with President Saleh, says a Sanaa source familiar with the trip. The leader, who had long denied that his country has a corruption problem, wouldn't learn until he reached the White House that Yemen was cut from the list of nations eligible to apply for the Millennium Challenge Account (MCA), a Bush administration plan that ties aid to governance benchmarks.

"It came as a real shock," says the source. "It was only then that the scale of Yemen's problems sank in."

While the November 2005 trip was a public embarrassment for Saleh, it marked a turning point in how his government began dealing with corruption.

In the beginning of 2006, he launched an ambitious anticorruption program, and on Feb. 14, the Millennium Challenge Corporation (MCC), which administers the MCA, reinstated Yemen's chance for assistance as a result of an "aggressive reform effort."

Now, this fragile state on the tip of the Arabian Peninsula could gain hundreds of millions of dollars in aid, if it can sustain reform momentum. Yemen is the poorest Arab country – almost half the population is illiterate and 1 in 10 people live on less than $2 a day.

"Our economy is heavily dependent on oil supplies that won't last more than 15 years and the water table is dropping at an alarming rate," says Ali Saif Hassan, director of Yemen's Political Development Forum, an independent think tank. "The current reform program is very welcome, but there's a danger that the speed of the approaching resources crisis will outpace the process of transformation."

Saleh's reward for his U-turn has more political value than immediate financial benefit. The country still has many hoops to jump through before it can claim the prize of full participation in President Bush's aid program.

Yemen is now embarking on a round of negotiations that will force it to define its intentions. If Yemen is accepted to join the MCC's Threshold Program during the next few months, it will receive funds to speed up early reforms that will allow Yemen to apply for full membership, known as compact status, in a few years' time. The process can be suspended at any time.

"Continued participation in the MCA program is contingent upon good performance on the policy benchmarks," says John Danilovich, chief executive officer of the MCC.

In December 2006, Yemen's parliament ratified a law forming the National Supreme Anticorruption Authority. The MCC board will be watching to see if this new body operates effectively before Yemen can progress to the compact stage.

Yemen must also show that revised procurement laws for government contracts are being used and that steps are being taken toward press freedom and respect for the rule of law.

The payoff could be substantial. Ghana is one of 31 countries admitted to the twin stages of the Millennium Challenge and the most recent applicant to qualify for a compact; it was awarded $540 million over four years.

The MCC's nod comes at a time of growing confidence in Yemen among donors. In November 2006, Britain and Yemen's Gulf neighbors pledged $4.7 billion in aid over the next four years. The agreement to increase aid followed the recognition that Yemen was underfunded. It receives just $12 per person in annual development assistance. Its African and Asian peers, on average, receive three times that amount.

British Ambassador Michael Gifford says Yemen is standing at "a crucial point. There are a number of reform-minded ministers responsible for key portfolios and recent pledges of increased aid, including from the UK, demonstrate that President Saleh's government has the good will and support of the international community."

To be sure, there are concerns about Yemen's capacity to spend this extra money wisely. Donors admit that such an extensive reform process will be difficult. In the long term, they emphasize Yemen's need to follow through on its promises.

"Economic reform and stamping out corruption are vital to solving the country's future challenges," says Kevin Rosser, an oil and gas analyst at risk consulting firm Control Risks. "Without them, there can be no progress toward reducing poverty, combating extremism, or strengthening democratic institutions."

Western diplomats and progressive Yemenis hope that this opportunity won't be squandered. Saleh has endorsed the project personally. Observers are hoping that he demonstrates the will to implement the changes in a sustained reform drive that lasts the course of his term in office.

"If Yemen backslides, it will affect the whole region," says presidential adviser Faris Sanabani. "Yemen has huge potential, and the economy is our next battle. Our commitment to reform is going to turn the country around and put us on the right track for the future."

Court Declares Bosnia Killings Were Genocide (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137503

THE HAGUE, Feb. 26 — The International Court of Justice on Monday for the first time called the massacre of Bosnian Muslims at Srebrenica in 1995 an act of genocide, but determined that Serbia itself was not guilty of the enormous crime.

Nonetheless, it faulted Serbia, saying it "could and should" have prevented the genocide and, in its aftermath, should have punished the Bosnian Serbs who systematically killed close to 8,000 men and boys in July 1995.

The ruling resulted from a civil lawsuit Bosnia had brought against Serbia, the first in which one country sued another for genocide.

The 15 international judges who held nine weeks of hearings and deliberated for nearly 10 months relied in part on evidence presented in criminal cases heard by the United Nations Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, which has found two Bosnian Serb officers guilty of genocide for the Srebrenica massacre.

In the end, the lawsuit resolved Monday may have been the most complex case handled in the 60-year history of the World Court, which the United Nations set up to resolve legal disputes between states.

The ruling appeared to give some satisfaction — and frustration — to both sides. It freed Serbia of the stigma of being a genocidal nation and absolved it from having to pay war reparations, as demanded by Bosnia.

At the same time, Bosnia obtained what it said it wanted from the outset: a recognition of Serbia's guilt.

During the war in Bosnia, from 1992 to 1995, the United Nations declared Srebrenica a haven and promised to protect it. But in July 1995, Bosnian Serb forces overwhelmed 370 lightly armed Dutch peacekeepers, seized control of the enclave and killed almost every Bosnian Muslim man and boy captured there.

That massacre led to the ruling Monday, which also stressed that other large-scale killings and abuse of Bosnian Muslims had taken place with the financial and military support of Serbia during the 1990s war that broke up Yugoslavia.

Judge Rosalyn Higgins, the court's president, read the ruling, which described the close ties between Serbia and the Bosnian Serb forces. It said that the leaders in Belgrade, and President Slobodan Milosevic above all, "were fully aware of the deep-seated hatred which reigned between the Bosnian Serbs and the Muslims in the Srebrenica region," and that massacres were likely to occur. Yet the Serbs did nothing to avert atrocities or prevent the killings, "claiming they were powerless, which hardly tallies with their known influence" over the Bosnian Serb forces, the ruling concluded.

Serbia thereby violated the United Nations Convention on Genocide to which it is a party, the ruling found. The ruling, Judge Higgins noted, is binding and final, without appeal. Failing to arrest and hand over the Bosnian Serb military commander, Ratko Mladic, was a further violation, the court said.

The court said that other offenses committed against Bosnians might amount to war crimes and crimes against humanity, but that it had no jurisdiction over those issues. It did not list specific killings or the number of victims. International organizations say more than 100,000 people died between 1992 and 1995, two-thirds of them Bosnian Muslims.

"This is a moral victory, certainly, but less of a legal victory," said Alain Pellet, a spokesman for the Bosnian legal team. "But violations by one state against another have now been determined and many atrocities have been cited. Genocide is not the only atrocity."

After the ruling, the Serbian president, Boris Tadic, urged the Serbian Parliament to condemn the Srebrenica massacre, but that may be difficult to obtain because nationalist groups continue to deny it. He said it was "very important for Serbia and its citizens" that Serbia was not found guilty of genocide, but lamented that once again Serbia was mentioned in the context of war crimes and genocide.

In a statement after the session, Judge Higgins noted that the findings did not completely satisfy either side. "That does not mean, of course, that the court has been seeking a political compromise," she said.

All the same, the ruling, even if strictly based on the law, hews close to the political wishes of Western countries that want to pull Serbia into a wider Western European community, rather than see it isolated as a pariah state, possibly accused of genocide, with its extreme nationalists growing in strength.

NATO last year invited Serbia to join its Partnership for Peace venture and some European Union countries want to start membership talks with Belgrade, with some demanding that it first locate and hand over General Mladic, charged with genocide at the United Nations war crimes tribunal.

The court said Serbia had to abide by the Genocide Convention, requiring punishment of those accused, and urged it to do so immediately. The court's ruling might strengthen the hand of Serbians who want to rid themselves of the burden of keeping General Mladic as a fugitive in Serbia.

But the last word on the role of the Serbian leadership in the Bosnian war has not been said. Although Mr. Milosevic died last year before the end of his four-year trial, other senior Serbian political and military leaders are still facing trial at the tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

The tribunal has part of the war-time records of the Supreme Defense Council, which included the former Yugoslavia's military and political leaders, including Mr. Milosevic. Tribunal officials have said part of the minutes of the meetings were blacked out and some whole sections were missing. But the minutes still provided much information on how the Serb leaders “ran their proxy army” in Bosnia, one tribunal official said.

Serbia made a deal with the tribunal that only its judges and lawyers could see the records, the effect of which was that they were kept out of reach of the lawsuit at the World Court. In their ruling Monday, the judges made the point that they had been prevented from seeing them.

Lawyers for Bosnia had tried to convince the court that the pattern of atrocities across many communities in Bosnia demonstrated the intention to commit genocide, not only by killing, imprisoning and deporting the population, but also by destroying evidence of their presence. Andras Riedlmayer, a historian testifying for Bosnia, said the Serb campaign to purge 26 municipalities of Bosnia of non-Serbs had destroyed or damaged 958 mosques and close to 300 Roman Catholic churches and monasteries.

But the judges ruled that demonstrating a pattern of conduct or of atrocities was “too broad” to qualify for the definition of genocide. The crime of genocide required showing convincingly there was a specific plan or the specific intention to destroy the group or part of it, they ruled.

In essence, they did not answer the question often asked in The Hague: when does ethnic cleansing become genocide?

U.N. Court Clears Serbia Of Genocide (WP/AP)

By Mike Corder

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 26 -- The United Nations' highest court on Monday cleared Serbia of genocide against Muslims in Bosnia's bloody 1992-95 war. But it said the country's former government should have stopped the July 1995 slaughter of more than 7,000 Muslim men and boys in Srebrenica and ordered Serb leaders to hand over the alleged architect of the massacre.

The case marked the first time a state had been taken to court over allegations of genocide, outlawed by a U.N. convention in 1948 after the Nazi Holocaust. Individuals have been convicted in genocide cases linked to massacres in Bosnia and Rwanda.

In a 171-page ruling, the International Court of Justice said the massacre of thousands of Muslims by Bosnian Serb forces at the U.N.-protected Srebrenica enclave was an act of genocide.

But the 15-judge panel rejected Bosnia's claim that the Serbian state was responsible for the killing, saying it did not have effective control over the Bosnian Serb forces it had helped arm and finance. Instead, the judges ruled that Serbia stood by and allowed the massacre to happen.

Serbia, "could, and should, have acted to prevent the genocide, but did not," the court's president, Rosalyn Higgins, told reporters.

The ruling sparked outrage in Bosnia, which filed the case, and among dozens of war survivors who gathered outside the gates of the International Court of Justice.

"Shame on the people who reached such a verdict. How can they say not guilty of genocide when there are photos, video footage?" Zinaida Mujic, of the Mothers of Srebrenica association, said in Sarajevo.

The Srebrenica massacre was the worst mass killing in Europe since World War II and the bloodiest episode in the violent breakup of Yugoslavia into six independent states, including Bosnia, Serbia and Croatia. The fighting started in Slovenia in 1991, spread to Croatia in 1992 and Bosnia the same year, leaving at least 200,000 dead. In the Bosnian war, Muslims, Catholic Croats and Orthodox Serbs fought one another.

Higgins also condemned Serbia's failure to hand over Bosnian Serb Gen. Ratko Mladic, indicted more than a decade ago by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia for the genocide in Srebrenica.

The court said there was "plentiful, and mutually corroborative, information suggesting that Gen. Mladic . . . was on the territory of [Serbia] at least on several occasions and for substantial periods during the last few years and may still be there now."

The order to arrest Mladic and other genocide suspects was part of the binding judgment in the case. Failure to comply can be reported to the U.N. Security Council. However, international officials have been pushing Serbia to hand over Mladic for nearly 12 years without success.

The European Union has made Serbia's hopes for membership conditional on its cooperation in handing over Mladic and other fugitives.

Although Higgins mentioned Mladic by name, his accused accomplice, former Bosnian Serb leader Radovan Karadzic, was not so cited. Karadzic is believed to be hiding in the Serb-controlled portion of Bosnia, out of Serbia's reach.

Last week, international forces in Bosnia raided the homes of Karadzic's son and daughter, saying they were suspected of supporting their fugitive father.

Serbia's president, Boris Tadic, welcomed Monday's court ruling and said cooperating with the Yugoslav war crimes tribunal in handing over Mladic was key to the country's future.

DOJ_NMG_0137505

"Unless Serbia finally wraps up that cooperation . . . I believe, as a state, it will face dramatic political and economic consequences," Tadic said.

Grim Mystery Unfolds In Central America (LAT)

By Héctor Tobar And Alex Renderos

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

SAN SALVADOR -- For more than a week, Guatemalans and Salvadorans have been in the grip of a murky and gruesome mystery story born of Central America's criminal underworld.

It began on the night of Feb. 19, with an SUV burning on a rural road outside Guatemala City. The charred bodies of three Salvadoran legislators and their driver were found at the scene. Among them were Eduardo Jose D'Aubuisson, the son of one of El Salvador's most notorious right-wing leaders.

On Sunday night, the latest chapter played out at a Guatemalan prison, when four officers from a top Guatemalan police unit were slain in their cells three days after they had been arrested and charged with killing the legislators.

Police and government officials in El Salvador and Guatemala said the case may have exposed an unsettling link between drug traffickers and the security and political elite of the countries.

On Friday, Guatemalan President Oscar Berger said drug traffickers were behind the killings of the legislators and promised a "thorough purge" of corrupt elements in the Guatemalan police force.

Berger said he would take the extraordinary step of requiring dozens of high-ranking police and government officials to take polygraph tests, including, "if necessary," Interior Minister Carlos Vielmann, the country's top security official.

The four police officials killed Sunday were all members of Guatemala's organized-crime unit, including the unit's director, Luis Arturo Herrera. There were conflicting reports as to how they were killed.

Some media reports said an armed "commando" unit had entered the maximum-security prison about 40 miles outside Guatemala City. The assailants reportedly disarmed the guards, then slit the throats of the arrested officers.

Other reports said inmates in the prison killed the men in retribution for their actions as police officers.

In neighboring El Salvador, some saw a conspiracy.

"The killing of these officers shows there are more people involved" in the assassination of the legislators, said Rodrigo Avila, head of El Salvador's national police. "They wanted to silence these officers, who were part of a very powerful [criminal] organization.... They're trying to close a Pandora's box."

Avila said top officials in Guatemala's national police had joined forces with an organized-crime group involved in a variety of illicit activities, including drug trafficking, immigrant smuggling and money laundering.

"We are very worried that the top levels of the [Guatemalan] police appear to have been infiltrated by organized crime," Salvadoran Minister for Security and Justice Rene Figueroa said.

Salvadoran officials say they don't know precisely how or why the legislators were slain.

The legislators left San Salvador in a caravan with other lawmakers on the morning of Feb. 19, headed for a meeting in Guatemala City of the Central American Parliament, a body that advocates and regulates regional economic cooperation.

They were last seen alive in Guatemala City on the day of their disappearance, after leaving behind their Guatemalan police escort. Their bodies were discovered on a farm 25 miles outside the city, with gunshot wounds and burned beyond recognition. At least two of the men may have been burned alive, according to news reports.

Guatemalan authorities said the method of the attack clearly suggested it was a "message" killing.

Besides D'Aubuisson, the 32-year-old son of Roberto D'Aubuisson, the late founder of El Salvador's ruling Nationalist Republican Alliance, the dead included two other legislators from the right-wing party, William Pichinte and Jose Ramon Gonzalez.

Salvadoran President Tony Saca called the men national heroes who had died "in the cause of freedom."

But on Sunday, the Guatemala City newspaper Siglo XXI quoted an unnamed Guatemalan police official who said the killers and victims were linked "with a drug trafficking organization made up of Guatemalans and Salvadorans, among them a contact with a lot of political influence" in El Salvador.

The crime was the result of "a business deal gone sour, which is unforgivable among drug traffickers," the police official said.

In El Salvador, the idea that the scion of one of the nation's leading right-wing families may have been involved in drug dealing was unpalatable. Salvadoran police floated a different theory: mistaken identity.

The conservative newspaper El Diario de Hoy quoted Salvadoran police who said the slain lawmakers had been confused for "Colombian drug dealers" and killed when their assailants failed to discover cash or drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0137506

The arrested police officers told investigators that they had been contracted by a group of Guatemalan drug traffickers linked to Salvadoran organized crime. But they would say no more about their orders, because, as one of them said, "I'd rather commit suicide than talk."

Negroponte Expected To Make Mark In China (AP)

By George Gedda, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 27, 2007

The State Department has been lacking a diplomatic heavyweight to handle China issues since last summer, and President Bush's choice to fill that role plans to travel to Beijing this week as part of a three-nation East Asia tour.

John Negroponte, newly installed as the State Department's No. 2 official, is scheduled to visit South Korea and Japan, in addition to China.

Negroponte, 67, began his career as an Asia hand more than 40 years ago and has worked on regional issues periodically since then, including a stint as ambassador to the Philippines. He was director of national intelligence for the past two years, and issues relating to China crossed his desk frequently, including the country's military buildup.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice also will call on Negroponte for advice on Iraq, where he served as ambassador.

For the United States, there may be no foreign relationship as important as the one with China. It is a fellow permanent member of the U.N. Security Council, a major trading partner and an important player on such diplomatic problems as North Korea, Iran and Sudan.

The Bush administration has become increasingly bothered by China's secrecy on its defense spending levels and the goals of what officials call its "rapid military modernization."

China touched off fears of an arms race in space in January when it destroyed a defunct Chinese weather satellite by hitting it with a warhead launched from a ballistic missile.

On the other hand, the Feb. 13 nuclear disarmament breakthrough with North Korea was achieved partly as the result of close U.S.-Chinese cooperation

Negroponte does not qualify as a China expert, but the same could have been said of his predecessor, Robert Zoellick, who nonetheless was admired around the State Department and beyond for his grasp of the China puzzle. Zoellick left the State Department in July to take a job on Wall Street.

Some China experts believe the void created by Zoellick's departure has been costly.

"One has the feeling that the government has been compassless. There is almost a blindness in regards to China," says Orville Schell, director of the Asia Society's Center on U.S.-China Relations in New York.

Jeffrey Bader, a China expert at the Brookings Institution who served on President Clinton's National Security Council, said that no one at the State Department's senior level has been focused on China since Zoellick's departure.

He noted that Christopher Hill, the assistant secretary for East Asian affairs, has been consumed with North Korea since his appointment almost two years ago.

The most prominent China expert in government is Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, who had traveled to China dozens of times on business before joining the Cabinet in July. Paulson expects to make his third trip to China as secretary in early March. His frequent dealings with the Chinese have touched on trade, environmental and economic issues, but not the critical security questions that Negroponte will take on.

As Zoellick was leaving the State Department last summer, Tom Christensen, a China expert from Princeton, was being appointed as a deputy assistant secretary in the East Asia bureau, an important but not top level post. Christensen has written a book on U.S.-China relations and nowadays puts his fluent Chinese to work in discussions with Beijing officials.

He has held teaching positions at Cornell and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The department also boasts a number of China hands at lower levels with strong command of the issues and the language as well.

Broadcast Media In China Put On Notice (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 26 -- Communist Party propaganda chiefs have issued a stern new warning to China's broadcast executives, saying news reports and entertainment should promote socialist loyalty and soothe tensions as the country enters a sensitive political season.

The new guidelines were issued Jan. 12 at a meeting called by the party propaganda department; a written record of the gathering is currently circulating in Beijing.

The guidelines reflect a particular desire at senior levels of President Hu Jintao's government to see a picture of harmony and contentedness in the broadcast media as the Chinese legislature prepares to meet next month and the Communist Party gets ready for its 17th national congress in the fall.

Propaganda officials regularly issue orders to Chinese television, radio and newspaper executives, listing subjects to be avoided or treated with care in the heavily censored media. But the marching orders last month appeared to be part of a concentrated effort to orchestrate the news in the lead-up to this year's major political meetings. They followed guidelines designed to maintain the traditional cultural focus and political correctness of television movies and serials.

"In foreign countries, televisions are privately owned and you can broadcast whatever you want," Wang Weiping, deputy head of the series division at China's State Television, Film and Broadcasting Administration, told the Southern Weekend newspaper recently. "But in China, television is the mouthpiece of the party and the people. This is its main mission, and entertainment is secondary."

The national party congress, held every five years, is especially important to Hu, who has headed the party since 2002. It is the occasion for him to cement his leadership and install his followers in key positions, particularly in a new Politburo and its ruling nine-member Standing Committee.

"To create a proper atmosphere for the 17th party congress, we should sing high praises for socialism," Li Dongshen, deputy head of the propaganda department, told the assembled executives, according to the written record of the gathering. "We should sing loudly the main themes of our nation."

According to the record, Li recalled that he had recently banned eight books because they "ran the red light" of party limits on what is acceptable for publication. He said that the broadcast industry faces similar problems and that "we need to assure the correct leading direction of propaganda and promote cultural richness."

For instance, he urged the executives to continue publicizing the policies of economic reform and opening that began two decades ago and that Hu continues to champion. But he cautioned that there should be "no publicizing of pro-privatization comments."

Li's remarks appeared to be part of an effort to dampen a quiet controversy between the reform-minded people around Hu and disgruntled party conservatives who maintain that the reforms are being pursued too quickly, without concern for the social welfare of millions of Chinese. The pace at which unprofitable state-owned enterprises are being sold off has become one aspect of this debate. A proposed law to establish legal guarantees for private property has become another, likely to be discussed during the annual session of the National People's Congress that begins next week.

Li warned that exposing corruption by party officials, a major topic in government declarations, should be done "positively," with emphasis on the party's efforts to end it. In dealing with corruption, whether in news or entertainment programs, he said, television producers should take care not to emphasize corrupt officials' high living or numerous mistresses.

He also said news reports should avoid "inside stories" about flaws in the legal system and the party's attempts to control the news. "Go all out for articles that preserve social stability and avoid triggering social conflict," he added.

Finally, in the new Year of the Pig, Li warned, executives should take into account the sensitivities of China's 35 million Muslims, who consider pigs unclean and offensive. "In principle, touch on the character of the pig as little as possible," he said.

Chinese County Reins In Birth-rate – Without A One-child Limit (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2007

Behind the high gray walls of this farming village, peasant couples are conducting an experiment that suggests, its designers say, that the most unpopular and costly policy of the past quarter- century may not have been necessary.

For the past 21 years, the citizens of Yicheng County, in the mining province of Shanxi, have been exempt from the "one-child policy" on which the Chinese government has founded its bid to keep a lid on its vast population. They have been allowed to have two children. Yet Yicheng's birth-rate is lower than the national average.

"If the whole country had adopted the Yicheng policy from the start, we could have kept China's population under 1.2 billion," below the official target for 2000, says Tan Kejian, of Shanxi's provincial Academy of Social Sciences. "And this policy was much easier for peasants to accept."

Central government officials chal- lenge Mr. Kejian's conclusions. But the government-sanctioned Yicheng experiment, almost unknown outside family-planning circles, is under increasingly interested scrutiny from Chinese experts as the "one-child policy" approaches what appears to be the end of its life, after 27 years.

"Most scholars are recommending to the government that the one-child policy needs to be turned into a two-child policy," says Chen Wei, head of the Population and Sustainable Development Group at Renmin University in Beijing. "Maybe not now, but in 2010," when the next five-year plan begins.

DOJ_NMG_0137508

Officials at the National Population and Family Planning Commission, which has been responsible for implementing the one-child policy, insist that "the success of China's family-planning policy has been of huge significance," in the words of Yu Xuejun, director of the commission's policy and legislation department. "I am confident our general direction is correct," he says.

But the one-child policy, beyond raising worldwide concerns about the forced abortions and sterilizations that have scarred several generations of Chinese women, has bequeathed a grave legacy.

China's population is aging fast; by 2020, 234 million people, or 16 percent of the population, will be over 60, official figures indicate, up from 9 percent today.

At the same time, 30 million Chinese men will find no brides in 2020; a traditional preference for sons, the spread of ultrasound technology, and the one-child policy have combined to promote widespread sex-selective abortion, officials say.

With male births outnumbering female births by 118 to 100, China is storing up a "hidden danger" that will "affect social stability," a recent government report warned.

Discriminatory abortion is not a problem, though, in Yicheng, which has long applied one of the most liberal of the range of policies imposed around the country.

The "one-child policy" has in fact been much more flexible since the mid-1980s than its name suggests. While it has been strictly enforced in cities, affecting about 36 percent of the national population, parents in most rural areas – accounting for 53 percent of Chinese – are allowed a second child if their first is a girl. In a few cases, families can have three children.

"Overall, it's more of a one-and-a-half child policy," says Professor Chen.

Things are different for Yicheng's 310,000 inhabitants. Parents there can have two children, whatever the sex of their firstborn, if they adhere to certain conditions.

Men may not marry before the age of 25 and women may not before age 23 without being fined. That's three years later for both sexes than the national policy. They must also wait six years before having a second baby. If they don't, they are fined 1,200 RMB (about $160) per year early, or about 20 percent of an average couple's income in the region, says Yang Chunxiang, the family-planning boss here in Ren Wang.

"No one here is rich enough to pay that easily," she says. There have been no third children in the village since the '80s, and few whose birth didn't track the six-year gap.

"The one-child policy ran into strong opposition from people right from the start," says Liang Zhongtang, who designed Yicheng's policy. "I proposed a two-child policy to see if people still opposed that."

From his post as a teacher at the Communist Party school in Taiyuan, the capital of Shanxi, Professor Liang quickly rallied local family planning workers to his cause.

"People were just ignoring the policy and the government had to punish them" with fines and confiscations, recalls An Dousheng, an old man in Mao cap and collar, who headed Yicheng's family-planning unit in the 1980s. "It was difficult work. Ordinary people did not welcome the policy and did not cooperate. Our work was called 'the hardest job under the heavens.' "

"We were delighted by the new policy" when it was introduced in 1985, says Duan Chunmao. the Communist Party secretary in Ren Wang. "People felt it was more appropriate to their situation, and it helped cement links between the people and the party" that had been strained.

Twenty years on, its fruits are clear. Yicheng's fertility rate is below 9 per 1,000; the national average is 12 per 1,000. Yicheng's gender ratio at birth is 106 to 100, showing no distortion. Even more remarkably, large numbers of couples today choose to have only one child. Almost half the families in Ren Wang, for example, have only one child (though some may have a second later.)

"Nowadays, people don't want big families" says Ms. Yang. "It's very expensive – with fewer [kids] you can get richer faster."

Lü Yueping, a village shopkeeper, says she would have liked a grandson but both her daughters have had girls and neither is planning a second child. "My elder daughter is an accountant," she explains. "She is really busy."

"Mind-sets have changed a lot," says Cheng Fakui, former vice mayor of Yicheng in charge of family planning in the '80s. "A lot of people want to live for themselves, not just for their children."

China's economic development – reinforced by the one-child policy – has spread this mind-set across the countryside; children are expensive to educate, no longer so necessary for fieldwork, and increasingly unwilling to care for their aged parents – a prime motivation for having children.

The average Chinese couple now has 1.7 children, according to estimates by Renmin University's Population Studies Institute. That is only marginally more than the average number of children – 1.6 - allowed by current policy.

"Much of the decline in fertility can be traced to social and economic change," says Henry Winckler, a demographer at Columbia University in New York. "Probably relatively little ... resulted from making the small family mandatory and from using heavy-handed techniques to enforce it."

Liang, an outspoken critic of the policy, agrees. "[It] is like tilting at windmills," he scoffs. "If the policy Yicheng adopted was successful there, it could have been successfully adopted anywhere else in China."

Top officials at the National Population and Family Planning Commission dispute that. "Experiments are only experiments." points out Dr. Yu. "We dare not make a conclusion that the success" of Yicheng's policy "can represent other experiences."

Yu doubts that the enthusiasm with which Yicheng's leadership applied the policy – ensuring no third births and enforcing birth spacing – could be matched nationally.

In Yicheng, experts express disappointment at the government's failure to extend their policy elsewhere in China. One senior local official, who asked to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the issue, suggested that Beijing "is worried by population pressures and doesn't want to make any mistakes. They are very cautious."

Liang is blunter. "The leaders who make decisions don't understand the nuances of the Yicheng policy and don't want to learn about them," he complains.

Behind the reluctance, suggests Susan Greenhalgh, an expert on China's birth-control policy at the University of California, Irvine, lie wider considerations. The one-child policy is too deeply embedded in the post-Mao political consensus, she believes. "Advocating change of this ... involves political risks that, so far, no national political leader – or not enough of them – feel in a position to take."

Yicheng's time may now have come, however. Officials say the one-child policy will be maintained until 2010, but it is clear that they are studying alternatives.

"Now that the fertility rate is low, the government has expressed interest in researching directions for future adjustments in family-planning policy," says Yu. "Yicheng's experience should provide a good reference point for us."

U.S. Sends Warship Against Sea Pirates (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 27, 2007

NEW YORK -- A U.S. warship yesterday moved into waters off the coast of Somalia, where pirates have hijacked an empty World Food Program cargo ship.

The MV Rozen was boarded by heavily armed pirates Sunday morning off the coast of Somalia's Puntland region, in the far north of the country.

Officials of the internationally backed interim Somali government said they contacted the U.S. military regional command, based in neighboring Djibouti, to request assistance.

"We have asked the U.S. Navy in the Red Sea ... to help us in the operation, and they told us they have started to move toward the ship," Col. Abdi Ali Hagaafe, police chief of the Bari region, told the Associated Press yesterday.

He said Somali police boats had spotted the hijacked ship, but were told to hang back out of concern for the safety of the ship's crew.

WFP officials said yesterday that the ship had already off-loaded 1,800 metric tons of food aid and equipment before the seizure, and was empty except for its crew of 12 Sri Lankans and Kenyans.

Negotiations for the release of the ship will likely be handled by Motaku Shipping Agency of Mombasa, Kenya, the contractor that owns the ship and employs its crew.

This is at least the third WFP ship to be hijacked by pirates off Somalia's 1,800-mile coastline, reflecting an increasingly difficult environment in which to deliver humanitarian aid to the desperately poor and unstable country on the Horn of Africa.

Such ships are by far the least expensive way to deliver aid to Somalia, a rugged country with few viable roads and airports capable of handling heavy cargo.

If the sea lanes become too dangerous, WFP officials have warned, they will be unable to deliver the hundreds of tons of food aid and other support they say are needed.

Another WFP-chartered ship, the Semlow, was seized and held for more than three months by hijackers in June 2005. It was released only after secret negotiations between the ship's owner and representatives of the pirates.

The United Nations has a clear policy of not negotiating with hijackers or kidnappers who seize U.N. staff, but officials acknowledge that member states or intermediary groups are free to engage such hijackers as they see fit.

James Morris, the outgoing executive director of the World Food Program, indicated in an interview with The Washington Times last week that the Semlow incident was resolved without WFP's direct knowledge.

"I couldn't tell you anything about that," he said. "That was handled by the ship's owners, and we didn't have anything to do with it."

Asked whether the agency maintained a deliberate "don't ask, don't tell" policy on dealing with pirates, Mr. Morris smiled and nodded slightly.

A Land Of Camel Milk And Honey (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 27, 2007

HARGEISA, Somaliland(?)

Here's the ethos of Somalia, as a former Mogadishu resident explained it to me: "If I use a dollar to buy food, then tomorrow I have nothing. If I use a dollar to buy a bullet, then I can eat every day."

That enterprising can-do spirit has turned most of Somalia into the poster child of a failed state, where you feel underdressed without an assault rifle. But wait! Here in the north of the carcass of Somalia is the breakaway would-be nation of Somaliland, and it is a remarkable success — for a country that doesn't exist.

The U.S. and other governments don't recognize Somaliland, so the people here get next to zero foreign aid. And when the "country" was formed in 1991, it had been mostly obliterated in a civil war and was a collection of ruins and land mines.

Yet the clans and elders here formed their own government, held free elections and even established an international airline. Relying on free markets and a general exhaustion with violence, the people of Somaliland embraced tranquillity and democracy and searched for ways to make a buck.

Walk down the streets of Hargeisa, the capital of Somaliland, and instead of gunmen you come across the thriving jewelry and financial market: scores of vendors, most of them women, are hawking millions of dollars worth of gold, precious stones and foreign currency out in the open air. (Don't try that at home!) Continue down the street, and you see that Hargeisa has police cars, DHL service, cable television, orthodontists, a multitude of Internet cafes and traffic jams (including the horses and camels). There are public schools and hospitals — even a public library.

This is a conservative Muslim country, yet it is generally pro-American and tolerant. In the last election, more women voted than men. Women's groups are fighting the traditional practice of genital mutilation, administered to 97 percent of girls here.

The lesson of Somaliland is simple: the most important single determinant of a poor country's success is not how much aid it receives but how well it is run. If a country adheres to free markets and good political and economic governance, it will generate domestic and foreign investments that dwarf any amount of aid.

As President Dahir Rayale Kahin told me: "There is a proverb in our country: 'You can wash your body only with your own hand.' Outsiders can help, but the indigenous people must find a solution themselves."

One lesson is that Western countries should not only increase their financial aid but also their pressure for better governance. It's great to forgive debts, but not graft or antimarket policies.

The U.S. Millennium Challenge aid program, which promotes good governance, is a useful step in that direction. So is Tony Blair's program to battle corruption in Africa.

One useful kind of Western aid is simply support for civil-society groups that battle corruption. Here in Somaliland, the press is generally free, but the president recently tossed three journalists in prison for reporting on corruption in his family. If Western countries speak out strongly in their defense, that effort may be worth a few million dollars in aid by reducing corruption in the future.

More peer pressure from within Africa would also help. Other African countries should stand up to a racist like Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe with the same vigor they once used to stand up to white racist governments.

Another essential kind of foreign aid is supporting market-friendly economic policies, especially those that would nurture manufacturing industries.

In Mauritania, whose location in northwestern Africa would be ideal for exporting clothing to Europe and America, it takes 82 days to start a new business, which would then have to make 61 tax payments each year, requiring 696 hours to calculate and pay. And in the end, the tax would amount to 104.3 percent of the profit, according to the World Bank.

All that explains why you don't have any shirts in your closet labeled "Made in Mauritania."

So let's be more generous with foreign aid, giving more than 22 cents per $100 of national income to development assistance (the average for rich countries is 47 cents). But those of us who call for aid and debt forgiveness also need to push just as hard for recipient nations to improve their governance, for ultimately the best way for poor countries to prosper is to adopt pro-growth policies.

And in the meantime, it's time to recognize Somaliland as a nation. When a place does this well, we should hail it as a model, not shun it.

The Gall To Speak Her Mind (WP)

By Anne Applebaum

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137511

Clearly, there is something about Ayaan Hirsi Ali that annoys, rankles, irritates. I am speaking as one who does not know Hirsi Ali -- the outspoken Dutch-Somali critic of Islam -- but as one who, while living in Europe, cannot seem to avoid meeting her detractors. Most recently I met a Dutch diplomat who positively glowered when her name was mentioned. As a member of the Dutch parliament, Hirsi Ali had, he complained, switched parties, talked out of turn and refused to toe whatever was the proper political line. Above all, it irritated him that she did not share his Dutch faith in political consensus.

For those who haven't encountered her name yet, suffice it to say that Hirsi Ali is a European of African descent with an almost American rags-to-riches life story. As a young woman, she escaped from her Somali family while en route to an arranged marriage in Canada, made her way to Holland, learned Dutch, attended college and eventually won a seat in the Dutch parliament. Along the way, she also made an intellectual journey -- beautifully described in her new book, "Infidel"-- from tribal Somalia, through fundamentalism, and into Western liberalism. After Sept. 11, 2001, horrified by some of the things Osama bin Laden was saying, she reached for the Koran to confirm a hunch: "I hated to do it," she wrote, "because I knew that I would find bin Laden's quotations in there."

Partly as a result she lost her faith, concluding that the Koran spreads a culture that is "brutal, bigoted, fixated on controlling women, and harsh in war," and that should not be tolerated by European liberals. The conclusion led her into a series of controversies -- and to the murder of a Dutch filmmaker with whom she had co-produced a film about the mistreatment of Muslim women. The murderer was the son of Moroccan immigrants, born in Holland; he pinned a letter threatening Hirsi Ali onto his victim's chest. Ultimately, she left Holland for Washington, where she remains, ensconced at the American Enterprise Institute.

Yet even from that distance she continues to provoke Europeans, sometimes without saying anything at all. After a somewhat patronizing review of her first book -- in which British writer Timothy Garton Ash called her a "brave, outspoken, slightly simplistic Enlightenment fundamentalist" -- the French philosopher Pascal Bruckner came galloping to the defense of Hirsi Ali and the Enlightenment. Garton Ash counterattacked, and others joined what turned quickly into a wide-ranging debate (read the whole thing at http://www.signandsight.com) about reason, faith, multiculturalism and the integration of millions of Muslim immigrants into European culture.

Curiously, what seems to rankle Europeans most is the enthusiasm with which Hirsi Ali has adopted their own secularism and the fervor with which she has embraced their own Western values. Though this continent's intellectuals routinely disparage the pope as an irrelevant dinosaur, Hirsi Ali's rejection of religion in favor of reason, intellect and emancipation seems to make everyone nervous. Typical is the British feminist who complained that not only does Hirsi Ali paint "the whole of the Islamic world with one black brush," she also "paints the whole of the Western world with rosy tints," which is, of course, far more objectionable.

Others have compared her unfavorably to the Islamic scholar Tariq Ramadan, who argues that Islam can be made compatible with modern European democracy. He, it is said, offers a way forward for millions of pious European Muslims. By contrast, Hirsi Ali's rejection of religion in favor of Western secularism is said to be a form of integration that works for no one but herself.

I suppose this latter charge might be true. On the other hand, it might not be: Maybe "Infidel" will inspire a generation of Muslim teenagers to study, work hard, join the mainstream -- and then say what they think and spoil the political consensus. Either way, I'm not sure that the impulse to dismiss Hirsi Ali for her lack of utilitarian value reflects well on those who do it. Nor does the underlying assumption: that religious faith must be respected and defended on behalf of the dark-skinned immigrants who live among us, even though we natives no longer seem to require it.

But perhaps it is just a question of time. In America, the phenomenon of the flag-waving first-generation immigrant is familiar. In Europe, such a thing is unknown. Maybe once Europeans get used to the idea -- a Muslim immigrant who embraces Western culture with the excitement of the convert! -- they'll like Hirsi Ali better. And if they're lucky, others will follow in her footsteps.

When It Comes To Gay Rights, Is Cuba Inching Ahead Of USA? (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, February 27, 2007

HAVANA — Years before George W. Bush proclaimed his support for a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriages in the United States, the ideologically rigid government of Fidel Castro made a big move in the opposite direction.

It sanctioned the production and viewing of Strawberry and Chocolate, an Academy Award-nominated film about the awkward friendship between a straight man and a gay man — and the homophobia they both had to battle.

Since this movie debuted in theaters here in the mid-1990s, the Cuban government's intolerance of homosexuals has given way to a more egalitarian treatment of gays and lesbians.

DOJ_NMG_0137512

The public persecution of homosexuals has declined sharply. Two years ago, Cuba had its first gay film festival. Last year, the highest-rated show on Cuba's state-run television was a soap opera in which a married man fell in love with another man. And now this country is on the verge of enacting a law that gives same-sex couples some form of legal status.

"We have to abolish any form of discrimination against those persons," said Ricardo Alarcon, president of Cuba's National Assembly. "We are trying to see how to do that, whether it should be to grant them the right to marry or to have same-sex unions."

Alarcon said he expects Cuba's communist government will soon enact a law to do one or the other. "We have to redefine the concept of marriage," he said. "Socialism should be a society that does not exclude anybody."

This awakening comes less than a year after President Bush renewed his call for a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage. "Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them, and changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure," Bush said in June.

Just one state, Massachusetts, allows gay marriages. And only four permit some form of same-sex union, which falls short of the definition of marriage but lets gay couples have some legal rights.

How ironic is this? While a country that successive U.S. governments have called a totalitarian state is moving toward expanding the rights of gays and lesbians, the president of the United States — the world's leading democracy — wants to restrict their rights.

Cuba is not the Netherlands, no gay mecca, but the attitudes of people in and out of government are undergoing dramatic change, maybe because a leading advocate of gay rights is Mariela Castro, niece of Fidel Castro, daughter of his brother, acting President Raul Castro, and head of the Cuban National Center for Sex Education.

It also might have to do with Cuba's ever-evolving strategy for fending off U.S. attempts to topple its Communist government and replace it with a U.S.-style democracy. A same-sex union or gay marriage law could make Cuba appear to be more tolerant than the USA.

"Because of our historical heritage, Cuban society has been intolerant of homosexuals," said Ruben Remigio Ferro, president of Cuba's Supreme Court. "But there has been a change in thinking. We are developing a program to educate people about sexual orientation. But it is not a problem that has been solved."

It is, however, a problem that Cuba's government seems determined to solve. "I'm part of this country, like it or not. And I have the right to work for its future," Diego, the gay character in Strawberry and Chocolate, told his straight friend.

Cuba's half-century tug of war with the United States is an ideological struggle. It is a contest between this country's socialist ideals and America's efforts to impose its will on this island nation. While this battle plays out largely on the world stage, its outcome will be determined by the trench warfare that Cuba wages for the hearts and minds of its people — those who are straight or gay.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Navy Brig Officials Testify Padilla Not Physically Abused. The AP (2/28, Anderson) reports, "The exterior window in Jose Padilla's 80-square-foot cell in a Navy brig was painted over. At times, he had to sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress. He went months without a clock and was sometimes seen weeping in his cell. But officials at the brig in Charleston, S.C., testified Tuesday that the alleged al-Qaida operative was not physically abused during his 3 1/2 years in military custody, nor did he display serious symptoms of mental problems." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke barred Padilla's lawyers from delving into the details of this testimony unless it was directly related to a competency report prepared by a Bureau of Prisons psychologist. Cooke scheduled closing arguments on the competency issue for Wednesday. It was not clear when she would rule."

USA Today (2/28, 8A, Parker, 2.27M) notes brig technical director Sandy Seymour and brig psychologist Craig Noble "appeared as reluctant star witnesses in a mental competency hearing that became a fierce tug-of-war between prosecutors and defense attorneys over how much about Padilla's detention will be revealed." USA adds that Seymour "provided a glimpse into Padilla's paranoia — a condition described in defense court papers. Padilla feared guards had pumped noxious gas into his cell. He also thought he had been injected with truth serum before meeting with his interrogators. Seymour said that the brig is near a pulp mill, which spews foul odors, and that Padilla received a flu shot. He did not say whether anyone at the brig ever attempted to disabuse Padilla of his misimpressions."

Under the headline "Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed," the Los Angeles Times (2/28, Williams, 850K) notes Padilla's "defense attorneys contend that Padilla's sensory deprivation and treatment were tantamount to torture." The Times adds that Seymour "appeared reluctant to disclose details of the 'special care' ordered by the federal government for Padilla. Prolonged silences by Seymour followed each of…Caruso's questions, as the witness waited for prosecutor…Pell to object, which she did at least a dozen times. When Cooke said he should answer, Seymour said he had 'no specific recollection,' asked to hear the question again, or gave a cryptic response."

The New York Times (2/28, Sontag, 1.16M) reports that yesterday's "scattershot revelations…did not add up to a comprehensive portrait of Mr. Padilla's time in the brig. But they were nonetheless significant, marking the first time Mr. Padilla's military jailers were forced to speak publicly about the conditions of his secretive confinement without charges." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/28, Whoriskey, 690K) reports on the officials' testimony, under the headline "Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told."

Georgia Imam Sentenced To Seven Years For Hamas Funding Scheme. The Rome (GA) News-Tribune (2/28, Gellatly) reports, "A Floyd County man who led interfaith relations after 9/11 and educated students on the virtues of many religions was sentenced Tuesday for supporting a foreign terrorist group." Mohamed Shorbagi "was sentenced…to serve seven years and eight months in prison for funneling money to the militant group Hamas during a four-year period." The News-Tribune notes, "The charges stem from donations Shorbagi made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001. A former member of the Rome-Floyd International Committee and an Imam of a Muslim congregation, he was presented by the defense as an intelligent man much respected by his community."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/28, Torpy, 379K) notes Shorbagi "could have been sentenced to 15 years but received a lighter sentence for helping federal authorities in another prosecution. … Shorbagi, who has been in the United States for 22 years, testified in a Chicago trial last year against Mohammed Salah, who was later acquitted of charges of aiding Hamas. Because of his cooperation in the case, Shorbagi is eligible to get a visa to stay in the U.S and enter the witness protection program, according to court papers." WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/27, Rowson) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "For the first time in the history of the state of Georgia, a defendant has been sentenced for an international terrorism-related crime. … Unites States Attorney David Nahmias said, 'The people who financially support terrorism are not the people who are personally building bombs or setting off bombs.' Nahmias added, 'But, they're the people who make that kind of activity possible.'"

The Atlanta Business Journal (2/27) also reports on the sentencing, as does the AP (2/28, Yee), in a widely-distributed story.

Prosecutors To Investigate Inaccurate Summaries Of FBI Transcripts. Under the headline "False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial," the Los Angeles Times (2/28, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "The mystery of how and why a government wiretap summary falsely attributed anti-Jewish slurs to officials of a Muslim charity remained unanswered Tuesday as federal prosecutors pledged to look into the matter. In court papers filed late Monday, the U.S. attorney's office in Dallas said it was trying to determine how the recently declassified summary of a 1996 FBI wiretap of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development included vitriolic language that was not found in a verbatim transcript of a recorded conversation. … Meanwhile, the unexplained discrepancies have brought potential controversy to the government's biggest terrorism funding case to date." However, the Times notes that "government prosecutors said it was 'an overreaction' to extrapolate that all of the government summaries were useless on the basis of discrepancies found in one set of documents."

Group Wants Information On 16 Allegedly Detained In CIA Prisons. The Financial Times (2/28, Sevastopulo) reports the Bush Administration "was urged on Tuesday to reveal the whereabouts of 16 men who were allegedly detained in secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons." In a letter "to Mr Bush, Human Rights Watch named 16 men it said were held in CIA prisons and another 22 who it said might have been in the secret facilities. The whereabouts of all the individuals concerned was unknown, the group said."

The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Linzer, Tate, 690K) reports in a front page story, "On his last day in CIA custody, Marwan Jabour, an accused al-Qaeda paymaster, was stripped naked, seated in a chair and videotaped by agency officers. Afterward, he was shackled and blindfolded, headphones were put over his ears, and he was given an injection that made him groggy." Jabour's "release from a secret facility in Afghanistan on June 30, 2006, was a surprise" to him, "and came just after the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's assertion that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to prisoners like him." Jabour had "spent two years in 'black sites' -- a network of secret internment facilities the CIA operated around the world. His account of life in that system, which he described in three interviews with The Washington Post, offers an inside view of a clandestine world that held far more prisoners than the 14 men President Bush acknowledged and had transferred out of CIA custody in September." Jabour's "experience -- also chronicled by Human Rights Watch, which yesterday issued a report on the fate of former 'black site' detainees -- often does not accord with the portrait the administration has offered of the CIA system, such as the number of people it held and the threat detainees posed."

Congress Urged To Act Against Foreign Prosecutions Of US Agents. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/28, A19), former Justice Department attorneys David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey say, "An Italian court announced this month that it is moving forward with the indictment and trial of 25 CIA agents charged with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric. These proceedings may well violate international law, but the case serves as a wake-up call to the United States. Overseas opponents of American foreign policy are increasingly turning to judicial proceedings against individual American officials as a means of reformulating or frustrating US aims, and action to arrest this development is needed." The US "must still vigorously resist the prosecution of its indicted agents. If they acted with the knowledge and consent of the Italian government (as The Post's Dana Priest reported in 2005), they are immune from criminal prosecution in that country." Congress should "make it a crime to initiate or maintain a prosecution against American officials if the proceeding itself otherwise violates accepted international legal norms."

Canada Allows Two Anti-Terror Laws To Lapse. The New York Times (2/28, Austen, 1.16M) reports Canada's Parliament "voted Tuesday not to extend two measures that were passed as part of a sweeping package of antiterrorism laws weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States." The measures "will expire Thursday. One allows the police to arrest people suspected of preparing to commit an act of terrorism and hold them for 72 hours without charges, and the other enables courts to compel witnesses to testify at special hearings similar to grand jury proceedings in the United States. Neither has ever been used." The vote "took place just days after the Supreme Court struck down a law allowing the government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations were being considered." The debate "reflected the fractious politics of Canada's Parliament, which is not controlled by any single party, as much as a national reassessment of antiterrorism measures."

PATRIOT ACT:

EFF Sues DOJ For Release Of FISA Court Rules On NSA Program. InformationWeek (2/28, Jones) reports, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation has sued the Department of Justice, demanding the release of records related to court orders authorizing electronic surveillance." IW continues, "The EFF filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking information on changes to the National Security Agency's surveillance program. The program, which the federal government maintains targets communications involving at least one suspected terrorist, was secret until the New York Times reported on it in December 2005." IW adds, "The government acknowledged that it was conducting surveillance without warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and argued that presidential powers and recent legislation authorized the practice. After defending against allegations that the practice was illegal, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced last month that the government changed its practices and would seek court approval to monitor communications. … EFF used the Freedom of Information Act in an attempt to obtain records showing the court's approval, but the Department of Justice didn't respond to a written request. EFF is seeking immediate release of orders allowing the government to monitor communications and any rules or guidelines associated with the orders. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has made public comments that indicate the court issued guidelines or parameters that have allowed the government to continue surveillance with court approval. … EFF refers to those statements in its filing. It's not alone in seeking details about the guidelines. News reporters who have been covering the issue have also pressed to find out the parameters of ongoing surveillance."

Technology News Daily (2/28) reports, "When press reports forced the White House to acknowledge the program in December of 2005, the administration claimed that the massive program could be conducted without warrants or judicial authorization of any kind. However, in January of this year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) had authorized collection of some communications and that the surveillance program would now operate under its approval. EFF's suit comes after the Department of Justice failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records concerning the purported changes in the program. … 'While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications,' said EFF Senior Counsel David Sobel. 'The burden is on the Justice Department to justify its failure to disclose the information we've requested.'" TND adds, "EFF's suit demands the immediate release of the FISC orders regarding the surveillance program and any FISC rules and guidelines associated with such orders."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Will Veto 9/11 Bill If It Contains Labor Provisions. The Washington Times (2/28, Waterman, 88K) reports, "President Bush will veto a proposed bill to implement measures recommended by the September 11 commission if the bill is passed with language granting collective-bargaining rights to airport passenger and baggage screeners employed by the Transportation Security Administration, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told Republican senators yesterday." Chertoff's comments "at a private luncheon were reported by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and confirmed by the Department of Homeland Security and a senior administration official authorized to speak to the press." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said Chertoff "did make very clear that if the bill goes to the White House with the current provision related to TSA personnel authorities, his recommendation, and that of other senior administration officials, would be to veto it." The Times adds, "A letter sent yesterday to Mr. Bush from 36 Republican senators shows that the votes are there to sustain a veto, according to Republican aides."

The AP (2/28, Kellman) reports, "The White House made its displeasure with the union provision clear before the House passed it as part of its Homeland Security bill. Sen. Susan Collins said Chertoff told her that a statement Thursday would include an explicit veto threat." The AP adds, "Casting the provision as a deal-killer would flex Bush's political muscle with the new, Democratic-led Congress on the old battleground of labor rights. It also could throw an obstacle into talks over how to debate and pass the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission."

The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (2/28, D4, Barr) reports Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said yesterday, "We vigorously disagree with the provisions of the Senate legislation that would eliminate the flexibility given to TSA to perform its transportation security missions." The TSA "needs the ability to quickly reassign and move screeners to respond to threats, he said." The New York Times (2/28, Lipton, 1.16M) notes Stanzel also said, "Existing authority permits TSA the flexibility to manage and deploy their work force. … We do think that it is important that TSA maintain that flexibility for personnel performing key homeland security roles."

DHS Data-Mining Program Said To Have Violated Privacy Laws In Testing Phase. The Washington Post (2/28, D3, Nakashima, Klein, 690K) reports DHS "is testing a data-mining program that would attempt to spot terrorists by combing vast amounts of information about average Americans, such as flight and hotel reservations." Analysis, Dissemination, Visualization, Insight and Semantic Enhancement, which resembles "a Pentagon program killed by Congress in 2003 over concerns about civil liberties, …could take effect as soon as next year. But researchers testing the system are likely to already have violated privacy laws by reviewing real information, instead of fake data, according to a source familiar with a congressional investigation into the $42.5 million program. … The privacy violation, described in a Government Accountability Office report that is due out soon, was one of three by separate government data mining programs, according to the GAO. 'Undoubtedly there are likely to be more,' GAO Comptroller David M. Walker said in a recent congressional hearing."

WPost Questions Technological Feasibility Of Nuclear Scanning Around Manhattan. The Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K) editorializes that DHS's recently announced plan to scan large numbers of vehicles entering Manhattan "for radioactive materials without bringing life to a standstill" would "do what many scientists had once thought impossible. … Experts today say that the nuclear weapons are heavily shielded, making detection tricky, and that current front-line scanners have difficulty in reliably detecting even those nuclear materials not encased in a bomb. Nevertheless, DHS is pushing forward with a pilot program to test the feasibility of scanning large numbers of cars and trucks entering Manhattan for radioactivity." If the program is "successful, it would require little or no effort from those being inspected, so it wouldn't snarl traffic in the tri-state area. Another point in its favor is that the pilot program is not very expensive, as Homeland Security projects go, and that even if the resulting system is not perfect, it will foster development of newer and better technologies that will make Americans safer." Still, the Post continues that it is "glad Homeland Security is not breaking the bank on its latest experiment. Based on the available information on the inconsistency of nuclear detection technology, it is fair to wonder whether this is the right time to conduct such a large-scale test and whether such a program may be an inefficient use of government resources."

New Orleans Population Holding Steady As New City Emerges. USA Today (2/28, 1A, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports on its front page that while the decision by celebrities Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie to buy in New Orleans generated international headlines, "each day, in much smaller ways, other people are coming and buying stakes in a city that still has less than half the population it had before Hurricane Katrina. People continue to move out, some after returning here and becoming overwhelmed by the neighborhoods of empty houses, a crime wave and a general uncertainty about the future. Despite all that, New Orleans is finding a way to hold steady. The population, now at about 191,000, hasn't changed significantly in months. … All around, there are signs that New Orleans is coming back, but not quite as the city it used to be. A US government survey reveals a whiter populace: New Orleans was two-thirds black before Katrina hit in August 2005; today it's 47% black and 42% white. It's also more Hispanic, thanks mostly to an influx of workers coming here for plentiful construction jobs."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Increasingly Divided On Iraq. Media reports this morning suggest Democratic divisions on Iraq are keeping the caucus from moving forward with a plan to challenge the President's "surge" strategy. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Levey, Simon, 850K), under the headline "War Bill Divides Democrats," reports this morning, "Democratic lawmakers, who earlier this month nearly unanimously backed resolutions condemning President Bush's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq, are struggling to agree on what to do next in their drive to bring the war to an end." In the Senate, "party leaders who faced dissent in their own caucus have decided to postpone consideration of a binding resolution that would set limits on what US forces could do in the conflict." And in the House, "Democrats are wrestling with even deeper divisions." The Times adds "the apparent deceleration of the legislative drive to end the war is dismaying antiwar activists." McClatchy (2/28, Talev) adds that the "division and confusion over how to proceed could anger voters who put Democrats in control of Congress largely in frustration over the war." But "Democrats are nervous about cutting off money in a way that could undermine soldiers who already are in Iraq - or expose Democrats to Republican charges that they're doing that."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported, "The Democrats ambitious plans to limit President Bush's war authority and force a change of course in Iraq are faltering amidst party divisions over how quickly and aggressively they should act." Senate Democrats beset by divisions set aside the Iraq debate in favor of a bill to fulfill unmet 9/11 Commission recommendations. They denied the onset of political paralysis. … But Senate Democrats are so divided over whether to deny funds for President Bush's troop surge -- while others want to revoke authorization for the war, and still others don't want to do either – that the party now finds its antiwar efforts visibly hobbled." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "couldn't say whether he prefers 'deauthorizing' the war or limiting funds for the troop surge. … Moderate Democrats are already distancing themselves from the newest antiwar strategy -- revoking the 2002 war authorization." Sen. Kent Conrad "opposes the idea." Sens. Ben Nelson and Mark Pryor "lean against it."

The Hill (2/28, Schor) reports, "Senate Democrats reversed course yesterday and vowed to keep the Iraq war out of the ongoing 9/11 Commission bill debate, but the lack of a consensus approach exposed by the new majority's move risks alienating anti-war allies and giving political momentum to Republicans." Democrats "first began eyeing the 9/11 Commission measure as a vehicle for binding checks on…Bush's war strategy during debate on the non-binding resolution billed as their first step in repudiating the White House." Yet "Democrats held off on their second step amid GOP insistence on a symbolic vote on troop funding and calls for a clean bill from Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), who helps maintain their narrow hold on the Senate."

The Washington Post (2/28, A4, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports "House Democratic leaders offered a full-throated defense Tuesday night of their plans to link Iraq war spending with rigorous standards for resting, training and equipping combat troops, saying that they would hold President Bush accountable for failing to meet those readiness tests." But "after a fractious meeting of the House Democratic caucus, Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democratic members still have not united around the proposal." Roll Call (2/28, Yachnin, Stanton) reports "aides said the House Democratic Caucus may hold a second meeting this week to further discuss the proposed spending bill.

The AP (2/28, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back US involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool-–– withholding money in the budget." Instead, "party officials said Tuesday, leaders are weighing a proposal that would attempt to embarrass Bush into abandoning his war strategy. Under a plan discussed behind closed doors, Democrats probably would fund President Bush's entire $93.4 billion request for war spending this year but require that any troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards receive a presidential waiver and that Congress be notified of the shortcoming." The compromise "is an attempt to please members who want to end the war immediately by cutting funding and others who do not want to appear as though Democrats are turning their back on troops."

The New York Times (2/28, Zeleny, Toner, 1.16M) describes the Democratic Congress as "divided over strategy, stymied by ideological divisions, but still hoping to escalate pressure on the White House to change the course of the war." The Washington Times (2/28, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports Congressional Democrats, " especially new members -- are clamoring for action on the Iraq war, citing polls showing that American voters want to change course, but leaders have delayed significant action.

Local TV last night ran a number of stories on Democratic divisions. For example, WMDT-TV Salisbury, MD (2/27, 11:08 pm) said Democrats "nearly all across the board are sure they want to bring the troops home, but they are not sure how. Democrats on Capitol Hill are divided over how quickly and aggressively they should act to force a change of course on the Iraq war."

WLOS-TV Greenville, SC (2/27, 11:08 pm) reported, "At a Senate appropriations committee hearing, key Administration officials sought $100 billion in emergency funds for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan. … Democrats maintain a critical stance on the war. Still, some stopped short of supporting a proposal to use Congress' budget power to put limits on the President's troop surge." KTVU-TV in San Francisco (2/27, 10:23 pm), KVII-TV Amarillo (10/27, 10:17 pm), and WJSU-TV Birmingham (2/27, 10:12 pm), among other stations in various other parts of the country, aired similar reports.

Senate Democratic Leaders Under Fire Inside Their Caucus. The Politico (2/28, Bresnahan) reports "Senate Democrats are accusing their leaders of mismanaging the twin efforts to block…Bush's troop surge in Iraq and force a quicker end to the war." Reid "is facing criticism from both flanks of his party." Sen. Ben Nelson, "a conservative Democrat from Nebraska, said the new Democratic strategy could unfairly hamstring the president and military commanders." Also, Sen. Russ Feingold, "a liberal Democrat from Wisconsin, criticized the latest Democratic strategy as too timid and toothless in stopping the war. Approving a new authorization resolution would be the same 'as voting for a new Iraq war and that I am not going to do.'" Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., who is a "seeking the presidency, and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) wrote the new plan. Senate insiders faulted Biden and, to a lesser extent, Levin, for telegraphing their plans to Republicans prematurely -- before most members were fully briefed on it."

Pelosi Blasts Cheney For Comments On Murtha Plan. In an interview with CNN's Larry King Live (2/28), House Speaker Nancy Pelosi responded to recent criticism from Vice President Cheney, who said, "If we were to do what speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all it would do is validate the Al Qaeda strategy." Pelosi said, "What the Vice President said what beneath the dignity of his office and beneath the sacrifice of our men and women in uniform, to equate our position with the position of the Al Qaeda. The Vice President is in a place that is out of touch with the American people, out of touch with what the former generals are saying, and out of touch with even the bipartisan majority in the Congress of the United States."

Editor Says He, Not Murtha, Coined Term "Slow Bleed." In The Politico (2/28), editor John Harris writes, "With a mixture of pride and remorse, I have a confession: I am the author of the Democratic Party's 'slow-bleed strategy' for ending the war in Iraq. … As it happens, Murtha's idea is itself bleeding support, hit by a barrage of denunciations from people who say it does indeed amount to abandoning the troops. In retrospect, it probably has already occurred to Murtha and his supporters that from a public relations perspective, 'slow-bleed' was not the most winning description. How could they have been so stupid? That's where I come in. 'Slow bleed' is my phrase. Murtha had nothing to do with it. Neither did John Bresnahan, the reporter whose name was on the Politico story in which the 'slow-bleed strategy' made its debut." Bresnahan "wrote an article that was the first to detail the emerging Democratic strategy of challenging Bush on Iraq. Here was the lead paragraph of the draft he submitted: 'Even as the House begins debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more U.S. combat troops to Iraq, leading anti-war groups are preparing a multi-million dollar TV ad campaign and grassroots lobbying blitz designed to pressure vulnerable incumbent lawmakers to end their support for the war.'" Harris changed it to: "Top House Democrats, working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to US involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options."

Some Soldiers Asking Congress To Stop War. The New York Times (2/28, Alvarez, 1.16M) reports, "In a small but growing sign of dissent, a group of active-duty military personnel and reservists, including many who have served in Iraq, is denouncing the war and asking Congress for the prompt withdrawal of troops. The service members, who number more than 1,600, have sent an Appeal for Redress to their Congressional representatives, a form of protest permitted by military rules. Most of those who signed the appeal, at www.appealforredress.org, are enlisted soldiers in the Army, from the lowest to the highest ranks." The Times adds, "While the 1,600 make up a tiny part of the armed services, the appeal is one of the first official signs of protest from people within the military. An estimated 70 percent of those who have signed it are on active duty; the rest are members of the Reserves or the National Guard, and about 100 officers have signed it."

DNI McConnell Says Term "Civil War" Accurately Describes Elements Of Iraqi Conflict. USA Today (2/28, Michaels, 2.27M) reports, "The nation's spy chief said Tuesday that the violence in Iraq resembles a civil war and the Iraqi government has the "close to impossible" job of trying to end the violence. The 'term "civil war" accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict,' Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said in a statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee." The Bush Administration "has avoided using the term civil war to describe the violence in Iraq. McConnell is the highest-ranking administration official to use the term to describe events in Iraq."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported that in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, National Intelligence Director Mike McConnell "says an assessment by the intelligence community suggests sectarian violence has become 'self sustaining' and has political implications." McConnell: "The current level of sectarian animosity will make political reconciliation difficult over the next 12-18 months."

Officials Give Mixed Review Of Iraq Security Plan So Far. McClatchy (2/28, Strobel, Landay, Schoof) reports "top US intelligence officials disclosed that the deployment of Iraqi forces into Baghdad under President Bush's new plan to stabilize Iraq is running behind schedule and that all of the units sent so far have arrived under strength, some by more than half. Top military officials…gave a mixed review on the early implementation of the plan, which is aimed at ending carnage in the capital between Shiites and Sunni Muslims." Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, "said the Iraqi military was 'good for the most part,' but uneven. 'The Iraqi military is coming on very well,' he said, adding that the soldiers should be able to replace U.S. troops by late 2007. 'We should have significant turnover this year,' he said."

Fox News Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported, "As for the surge of U.S. Troops, back in January, here is how President Bush envisioned it working." President Bush was shown saying, "These troops will work alongside Iraqi units and be embedded in their formations." However, Sen. John Warner, "A Republican critic of the surge," said Iraqi forces "just are not participating." Warner: "I do not…have strong evidence that the Iraqi forces are measuring up in any amount to what the President laid down on January 10." Defense Secretary Gates "said to day that the military will be able to assess pretty quickly if the Iraqis are living up to their commitments on the military and security angles. In fact he says he may have more information by Thursday when he briefs members of congress on Iraq in a closed door hearing."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews), said, "We should not be escalating this war. We should be making sure that we develop a plan and we press the president to develop a plan to eventually bring our troops home, and make sure that the Iraqis can stand up on their own and move forward with the democracy that we helped them create."

Violence Continues. NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 4, :40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq tonight we learned today three US soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb south of the city of Baghdad. And there are two very different versions of an incident today in Ramadi, a center of Sunni violence west of the city of Baghdad. According to the Iraqi side, at least 18 boys playing soccer were killed when a car bomb exploded near a public park. The US military however says the explosion was not a car bomb, but instead was caused when US troops intentionally detonated 15 bags of explosives that had been recovered in Ramadi. Some 30 people were injured, the military says. None of the injuries said to be life-threatening."

The Washington Post (2/28, A15, Londoño, 690K) reports, "Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, is a stronghold of the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq. More than a quarter of the US troops killed in Iraq have died in Anbar, where President Bush is sending 4,000 additional Marines as part of a temporary increase of US forces in the country."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) reports, "Two weeks after a new US-Iraqi security crackdown was launched here, bombers struck popular public gathering spots ranging from an ice cream parlor to a kebab shop Tuesday, causing at least eight deaths. Police in the capital also reported discovering the bodies of 31 men who had been shot to death, apparent victims of Shiite death squads. And the US military reported the deaths of five more American troops." The Times adds, "Rage and frustration in Baghdad over the continuing bloodshed was accompanied by a sense of confusion over an afternoon incident in Ramadi."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) editorializes, "There's little surprise that the White House is trying to claim the draft oil law as progress. There is no other good news to report: no security from the security sweep in Baghdad, no visible movement to purge the Iraqi police of sectarian death squads and no effort by Washington to impose benchmarks on Iraq's leaders for achieving national unity. ... In a bow to the reality of a splintering Iraq, the administration says it is now ready to sit down with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. ... But the most important steps need to be taken by the Iraqi government itself. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and his cabinet need to take responsibility for unifying a nation torn apart by decades of dictatorship and insurgency, rather than further inflaming those divisions by exacting vengeance on the formerly dominant Sunni Arab minority. ... And oil, Iraq's principal resource, must be equitably shared without regard to geography, religion or ethnic group."

In Policy Shift, Rice Says US Will Attend Regional Summit On Iraq. ABC World News (2/27, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Bush administration made a "major shift" Tuesday in its policy toward Iran and Syria. The US has "refused contacts with those nations, saying they're fueling the violence in Iraq. But now, the US says it will join with Iran and Syria at a summit. A 'neighbors meeting' in Baghdad, to explore how to stabilize Iraq."

Also calling the move a "major strategy change," the CBS Evening News (2/27, story 4, 1:25, Couric, 7.66M) said the "policy reversal," announced by Secretary Rice, "could bring the US and two bitter enemies together next month at a meeting in Baghdad." CBS (Axelrod) said the conference, which is planned for mid-march, "will focus on reconstruction, economic development, as well as security, which White House aides say will present a chance to press Iran on Iranian IEDs found in Iraq."

Similarly, the AP (2/28, Murphy) says the gathering "could offer a forum for Washington to amplify its concerns about Iranian involvement in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 5, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) said the State Department "would not rule out that Secretary Rice would meet separately with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts" as the "Iraq Study Group and others have been calling for."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) showed Rice saying, "We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve their relationships with Iraq and to work towards peace and stability in the region." And State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "Let's all assume the best intentions for all the states that are going to attend this meeting."

Calling the announcement a "diplomatic turnabout," the AP (2/28, Burns) says the move was "welcomed by Democrats and Republicans alike." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid called it "a first step," but called for "a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East," saying the Administration "cannot again settle for mere half measures."

USA Today (2/28, Slavin, 2.27M) notes that in December, "a bipartisan panel reviewing US options in Iraq urged the administration to open discussions with the two countries as part of an Iraq 'support group' and also one-to-one. James Baker, the former secretary of State who headed the commission, said that the administration's announcement was 'a move in the right direction.'" But the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Kessler, 690K) notes Rice "and other administration officials emphasized…that these conferences would be led and organized by the Iraqi government and not," as the Iraq Study Group suggested, the United States. Still, Democrats "seized on the announcement as a long-overdue change in direction by the Administration." Rice's announcement "appeared intended to assuage congressional concerns about the Administration's Iraq policy."

The Financial Times (2/28, Negus) reports US officials "did not exclude the possibility of bilateral discussions with Iran on the subject of Iraq, but would refuse to discuss the nuclear issue."

The New York Times (2/28, A1,Cooper, Semple, 1.16M) says, "While the newly scheduled meetings may not include direct negotiations between the United States and Iran, and are to focus strictly on stabilizing Iraq rather than other disputes, they could crack open a door to a diplomatic channel." The first meeting, "which will include senior Bush administration officials like the State Department Iraq envoy David Satterfield, will be in Baghdad in the first half of March," administration officials said. Then, in early April Secretary Rice "will attend a ministerial level conference, presumably with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, which will likely be somewhere else in the region," administration officials said.

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A3, King, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Rice's announcement came as many Arab leaders say they see some positive trends emerging in the region, despite the continuing carnage in Iraq. In Lebanon, attempts by the Iranian-backed Shiite militia and political party, Hezbollah, to overthrow the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora have waned. Last month, Saudi Arabia brokered the creation of a unity government in the Palestinian territories between Iranian-funded Hamas and Fatah, in a bid to avert civil war and kick-start a new round of Arab-Israeli peace talks." The Journal adds, "Arab diplomats tie these developments to Saudi Arabia's recent diplomatic offensive, largely aimed at preventing the spread of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite violence across the region. In addition, they said, Tehran is taking a more conciliatory stance toward its Middle East neighbors, in part because of threats by the US, Saudi Arabia and other regional allies to try and contain its growing influence in the region." The Washington Times (2/28, Sands, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/28, Richter, 850K) also report the story.

Rice Warns Of Al Qaeda Comeback If US Fails In Iraq. AFP (2/28) reports Secretary Rice warned "a doubting US Congress" Tuesday that Al-Qaeda will "come back to haunt us" if the US does not pursue its effort to stabilize Iraq. Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee, "If they have a safe haven, a sophisticated and central place like Iraq, I believe strongly that that's going to enhance their capability to do so." Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "underwent a grilling" Tuesday, as Senators "repeatedly questioned the government's rationale for remaining in Iraq amid sectarian violence that borders on civil war."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) editorializes that the move is "a welcome about-face for the Bush administration." Bush and Rice "may have felt that this was a good time to announce talks without appearing weak, given broader developments in the Persian Gulf region. Events within Iraq may not be going well, but the US Navy has been flexing its muscles in the region. Moreover, U.S. diplomacy has helped to win a U.N. Security Council resolution denouncing Iran's nuclear program, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad appears to be in some political trouble with the ruling mullahs in Tehran, partly because of his perceived recklessness."

Taliban Says Cheney Was Target Of Suicide Attack. In continuing coverage of the suicide attack Tuesday outside the US base in Bagram, Afghanistan where Vice President Cheney was staying, killing at least 23 people, ABC World News (2/27, story 3, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "A Taliban spokesperson has claimed responsibility" for the attack, "saying the intended target was, in fact, Vice President Cheney. But the bomber never got anywhere near the Vice President." The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 5, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) notes "US officials insisted" the Vice President's "overnight stay at Bagram was a closely held secret unknown to the enemy, but that didn't stop the Taliban from claiming Vice President Cheney was the target of today's attack."

The Financial Times (2/28, Mojumdar, Bokhari, Sevastopulo) reports, "While his arrival on Monday was shrouded in secrecy, some experts questioned whether a one-day delay in meeting" Afghan President Hamid Karzai, "because of inclement weather had provoked a security breach." The Washington Times/AP (2/28, Tang) says "it was the closest that militants have come to a top US official visiting Afghanistan."

USA Today (2/28, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports Cheney "met with…Karzai in Kabul before heading back to the USA via the Persian Gulf state of Oman. During their private, hour-long meeting, Cheney and Karzai spoke about the 'problems coming from Pakistan,' according to an Afghan government official who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 3, 2:40, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Back at the White House, the President was not awakened with the news, but briefed later. Mr. Cheney kept his schedule, meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Speaking to reporters, the Vice President said the terrorists were trying to undermine the Karzai government. 'Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all.' There are questions for investigators." The White House "insisted this is not a sign of the Taliban's strength." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "I'm not sure it says anything because you've got an isolated attack." However, added NBC, "terrorism experts say the attack packed a psychological punch."

The New York Times (2/28, A9, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) says while the attack "laid bare the rising insecurity in Afghanistan as American and NATO forces battle a growing Taliban insurgency, Afghan and American officials said it fell well short of a serious assassination attempt." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Witte, 690K) says despite the Taliban claim, US officials "disputed the assertion that Cheney was the target, noting that his overnight stay at the sprawling Bagram air base had been unplanned and that he was well away from the blast."

In a front page news analysis titled "Afghan Bombing Sends a Danger Signal to US," the New York Times (2/28, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) says the "audacity" of the attack "underscores why President Bush sent him there -- a deepening American concern that the Taliban and Al Qaeda are resurgent." While it was "more successful at grabbing headlines and filling television screens" than "at getting anywhere near" Cheney, the strike "nonetheless demonstrated that Al Qaeda and the Taliban appear stronger and more emboldened in the region than at any time since the American invasion of the country five years ago." Likewise, the Chicago Tribune (2/28, Silva, Fang, 617K) reports the attack "underscored concerns Tuesday about the resurgence of Taliban militants and other Islamic radicals in Afghanistan --the very reason for Cheney's visit." The Los Angeles Times (2/29, Barnes, Meyer, King, 850K) also reports the story.

Huffington Blog Posters Regretted Attempt On Cheney Wasn't Successful. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that the "liberal Huffington Post Web site (www.huffingtonpost.com) ran a wire story yesterday about the apparent attempt to assassinate Vice President Dick Cheney in Afghanistan. A number of its readers proceeded to make postings in which they expressed regret that the attack had not succeeded." Talk radio host Rush Limbaugh "read about a half-dozen of the foul postings on the air yesterday, and linked to the Huffington Post from his own Web site (www.rushlimbaugh.com). Not long afterward, the Huffington Post removed the most offensive of the missives."

Cheney's Cargo Plane Named "Spirit Of Strom Thurmond." The Washington Post (2/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "To evade detection by terrorists, Dick Cheney parked Air Force Two and flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan in a military cargo plane, the 'Spirit of Strom Thurmond.' (Make up your own joke. We're busy.)"

DNI McConnell Warns Al Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan. The New York Times (2/28, A6, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the new Director of National Intelligence, Mike McConnell, told members of Congress Tuesday that senior leaders of Al Qaeda "were steadily rebuilding the network's bases inside Pakistan and that future attacks against the United States could be planned from Pakistan's remote western mountains." In his first testimony since taking office, McConnell "issued a blunter assessment" of Pakistan's efforts in the war on terror, saying "We believe they could do more." In addition to McConnell, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described the border region as a "haven for Al Qaeda's leadership."

The Washington Post (2/28, A4, Pincus, 690K) reports McConnell said the US is "very concerned" that Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership are attempting to rebuild their terrorist network," but said they lack the experience of the old leadership, nearly three-quarters of which has been killed or captured.

The AP (2/28, Shrader) reports McConnell said the US believes bin Laden and al-Zawahri "are hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base there." McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border "echoed concerns raised" by Vice President Cheney "during a face-to-face meeting Monday with Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Sappenfield, 59K) reports, "Since last summer, when the Taliban seized entire districts in the southernmost provinces and attempted to encircle Kabul, the United States has refocused its attention on Afghanistan. Recently, the Bush administration proposed $10.6 billion in aid, announced the overhaul of its diplomatic mission here, and increased the number of American troops to 27,000 – the highest level since the 2001 invasion." It is, "in part, an attempt to save what has been promoted as the administration's great overseas achievement, even as Iraq slips further into chaos." But "Tuesday's events are indicative of the Taliban's eagerness to escalate the fight, and analysts question whether America's increased commitment to Afghanistan will be sufficient to make the country's democratic experiment successful."

Holbrooke Accuses The Administration Of Ignoring Warnings On Afghanistan. Former US ambassador to the UN Richard Holbrooke, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Mattews), said, " A year ago, I went to Afghanistan…and I wrote a column for The Washington Post. And I said, the situation was deteriorating rapidly. We were facing an upsurge. We had to do something about it. Two of the most senior officials in the United States government, short of the president and vice president, both called me…to say I was too pessimistic about Afghanistan. I am still angry about that. Why? Because I was trying to help create a bipartisan position that said that Afghanistan is indispensable to our national security and should be separated from the Iraq crisis. And, instead, they ignored the warning sounds, until a few days ago. President Bush finally got up and semi-admitted that things were not as good as they ought to be, or as he had said they are. And I remain angry about that."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "There's no need to accuse Pakistani intelligence of tipping off the Taliban about Mr. Cheney's whereabouts to see a connection between decisions in Islamabad and terrorism in Bagram. Mr. Cheney reportedly delivered a stiff message to Mr. Musharraf about the need for Pakistan to deny the Taliban sanctuary along its frontier with Afghanistan. That's a message Islamabad needs to hear, even if an Islamabad spokeswoman did insist after Mr. Cheney's visit that 'Pakistan does not accept dictation.'" However, adds the Journal, "policing its long and mountainous border with Afghanistan has exacted a high price in Pakistani lives and treasure," but "failing to police it may exact a higher one."

Rep. Chris Shays, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews) noted that "the key in Afghanistan is, we have gotten the Europeans to do some lifting there, where they don't want to do it in Iraq. So, we have, I think, more of the world community with us. … But give this administration credit for at least finding a way to engage the Europeans in something. As someone told me, Europe has never had what they call an away game since Afghanistan. They have always depended on the United States."

Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, in the opening segment of his O'Reilly Factor (2/27), contended that the attack "should remind everybody that the global war on terror is still underway and things are not going well. … Right now the Taliban is taking advantage of Pakistan's unwillingness to shut them down. The Taliban killers have a sanctuary in their country. And president Musharraf is basically hiding under his desk."

DOJ:

Critics See Politics Behind US Attorney Dismissals. In an article posted on Salon.com (2/28), Mark Follman writes, "Ever since the Bush administration shocked the legal community by dismissing eight U.S. attorneys in December, Justice Department leaders have vigorously denied that the firings were politically motivated. … But at least three of the eight fired attorneys were told by a superior they were being forced to resign to make jobs available for other Bush appointees, according to a former senior Justice Department official knowledgeable about their cases. That stands in contradiction to administration claims that the firings were related either to job performance or policy differences. A fourth U.S. attorney was told by a top Justice Department official that the dismissal in that attorney's case was not necessarily related to job performance. Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in New Mexico -- who officially steps down from his post on Wednesday, and who says he was never told by superiors about any problems with his work -- plans to go public with documentation of the achievements of his office. … 'I never received any indication at all of a problem' regarding performance or policy differences, Iglesias told Salon on Monday. 'That only leaves a third option: politics.'" Follman continues, "Suspicions about the unusual purge of eight U.S. attorneys in December burst into the open within the legal community and on Capitol Hill after McNulty conceded in Senate testimony on Feb. 6 that the U.S. attorney in Arkansas, Bud Cummins, was pushed out for no reason other than to give someone else a shot at the job. Using a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act allowing interim appointments, Gonzales gave the post to Timothy Griffin -- who had been both an operative for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to senior White House advisor Karl Rove -- in what many believe was a maneuver to sidestep the traditional Senate confirmation process for U.S. attorneys. … While Cummins was first informed of his dismissal last June, it wasn't until Dec. 7 that Michael Battle, a top Justice Department official, informed the rest of the group of U.S. attorneys in phone calls that they would be required to step down. That group included Daniel Bogden in Nevada, Paul Charlton in Arizona, John McKay in Seattle, Carole Lam in San Diego, and David Iglesias in New Mexico -- all of whom had received positive job reviews before they were dismissed and some of whom are viewed by colleagues and law enforcement officials as exceptional leaders. Most of them have said publicly that they were never told of any management or policy problems by their superiors. … According to the former senior Justice Department official, one of the U.S. attorneys in the group was told by Battle on Dec. 7: 'It's hard not to think you did something wrong when you get a call like this, but that's not always the case.' Two other U.S. attorneys in the group, upon seeking clarification from superiors in Washington, were told by a different top Justice Department official that they were being pushed out to give other Bush appointees their posts. A current senior Justice Department official confirmed that one of those two was Bogden in Nevada. Bryan Roehrkasse, a public affairs spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about 'specific personnel matters.' … Former officials, legal scholars and U.S. lawmakers from both parties have publicly questioned the administration's stated rationale for the firings and have suggested troubling theories about the real reasons for the housecleaning, which experts say is without precedent. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe the administration's moves are a politically driven power grab -- aimed not only at a tighter grip on policy from Washington, but also at creating openings with which to reward their friends and build up a bench of conservative loyalists positioned to serve in powerful posts in future administrations." Follman continues, "Administration officials have declined to provide further explanation for any of the attorneys' dismissals, including McKay's. … Questions remain about how the Bush administration will seek to fill the newly vacant posts. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe that the Bush administration has since revised its plans to reward political loyalists with the jobs, due to the backlash against the decision to push out Cummins and hand his post to Griffin in Arkansas. Earlier this month, the administration withdrew Griffin's name from consideration for a permanent appointment, though he remains in office indefinitely."

DOJ_NMG_0137528

DOJ Pilots Federated ID Management System. Government Computer News (2/28, Jackson) reports, "The Justice Department is piloting a federated identity management system that could be used to verify government online identities across different agencies." GCN continues, "The Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program, run by Justice's Office of the Chief Information Officer, could offer validated user credentials to multiple applications across multiple agencies, noted Boris Shur, a Justice IT manager who is working on the pilot. Shur outlined the project at the Collaborative Expedition Workshop, held today in Arlington, Va." GCN adds, "The system works by establishing a trust broker to act as a liaison between applications and providers of user credentials. With a trust broker in place, a user can request access to an application outside his or her own agency, and that application can request credentials from that broker, which has gathered such credentials from the identity providers. … Such a federated approach could cut the complexity that would ensue as more applications are opened to outside agencies. The trust broker could eliminate the need to establish individual handshakes between applications and identity providers. It could also cut down on the format headaches, as both applications and identity providers can communicate with the trusted broker in its own native format and protocol. It is up to the trusted broker to provide all the relevant protocols and formats, Shur said. At present, the LEISP system communicates credentials using the Public Key Infrastructure, the Security Assertion Markup Language and the Web Services Federation Language. It interacts with a number of applications as well as with a number of identity servers, such as the Sun One Identity Server and the Hewlett-Packard OpenView Select Federation."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former McAfee Counsel Charged In Options Probe. The California Recorder (2/28, Scheck) reports, "Kent Roberts, the former chief counsel at McAfee Inc., on Tuesday became the first Silicon Valley lawyer charged in the stock options backdating debacle." The Recorder continues, "Roberts faces six counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and filing false SEC documents in connection with options grants given to himself and ex-McAfee CEO George Samenuk in 2000 and 2002. … The 11-page charging document tracks what Justice Department officials have repeatedly said they're looking for in deciding to charge in options cases: evidence of intentional fraud -- most importantly, concealing options manipulation." The Recorder adds, "The indictment says that in 2000, Roberts, who joined the company then called Network Associates in 1998, changed the grant date -- and thus lowered the price by nearly $10 a share -- on 20,000 options given to him by the board. … According to the charging document, Roberts was concerned that the original price of the options would not have benefited him since McAfee's share price was dropping at the time. … Months later, the indictment said, Roberts 'caused the grant date to be changed to April 14, 2000, and he caused the exercise price to be changed to $19.75, which was the closing price of Network Associates' stock on the new, fabricated grant date,' the indictment says. … While that may have been problematic, the indictment says Roberts exacerbated the situation in 2002, the year he became one of the three company officials on the 'Ethics First Committee,' which the company formed to root out internal problems that had resulted in past legal messes. … In that capacity, Roberts investigated the former controller, the indictment says, looking at allegations that the controller had manipulated options grant prices for employees of the company."

The Financial Times (2/28, Allison, Masters) reports, "If found guilty, he could face up to 20 years in jail and a fine of up to $250,000." The Times adds, "The indictment marked the latest sign that federal prosecutors and the SEC are pressing forward quickly with their cases against individuals involved with stock options backdating. … Earlier this month, the former general counsel of Monster Worldwide, the online jobs site, pleaded guilty to separate backdating charges." The Times notes, "Federal authorities are probing options granting practices at dozens of other companies, including Apple and Broadcom. … In many cases, investigators may be running up against statutory deadlines which require prosecutors to bring securities fraud cases within five years. Much of the options backdating appears to have ceased after the SEC changed disclosure rules for options grants in 2002."

The New York Times/AP (2/28) reports, "The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, accusing Mr. Roberts of deceiving investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books. … Besides shedding more light on the apparent misconduct of Mr. Roberts, the case provides the latest indication that the government crackdown on corporate America's widespread stock option abuses is progressing beyond the evidence-gathering stage." The AP notes, "Mr. Roberts became the third former executive in the last two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former chief executive of the video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for the company that owns the online job search site Monster.com."

USA Today (2/28, 2B, Iwata) reports, "Since the backdating scandal arose last year, criminal charges have been brought against former executives at Brocade Communications Systems, Comverse Technology and Take-Two Interactive Software. About 200 companies have disclosed internal or federal investigations of their options grants. … Several corporate general counsels have resigned or been fired as a result of those investigations." USA adds, "General counsels are expected to monitor a company's legal and financial doings, so the spate of in-house attorneys involved in backdating cases is especially alarming to corporate-governance experts." The AP (2/28, Liektke) also reports this story.

Mutual Benefits Managers Plead Guilty To Securities Fraud. The AP (2/28) reports, "Two managers at Mutual Benefits Corp. pleaded guilty to securities fraud and agreed to pay about $830 million in restitution to investors, authorities said Tuesday. Carol Traina and Bari Wiggins each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud in connection with Mutual Benefits' billion dollar securities offering, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida. Both face up to five years in prison." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/28, 237K) notes, "Mutual Benefits, which was shut down in 2004, purchased life insurance policies from terminally ill and elderly people for less than face value and sold shares in the payouts to investors. Such deals, known as viaticals or life settlements, are profitable if the insured person dies within a particular period of time. Prosecutors said Mutual Benefits cheated investors by using artificially low projections of how long insured people would live and by understating the risk of the investments."

California Broker Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud. The San Fernando Valley Business Journal (2/26) reported, "A former account vice president for a Valencia brokerage firm pleaded guilty today to conspiring to commit securities fraud. Justin Paperny, a resident of Studio City, pleaded guilty that he helped operate the GLT Venture Fund at Capital Management Group in Valencia. … The deception resulted in more than 40 investors losing at least $2.5 million, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. As part of the plea, Paperny agreed to cooperate with investigators in an ongoing criminal probe into Capital Management and the venture fund."

US To Produce Nacchio Witness List On Thursday. The Denver Post (2/28, Vuong) reports, "Federal prosecutors will produce for the first time Thursday a list of witnesses they plan to call during the criminal insider-trading trial of former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio." The Post continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham has ordered the government to compile the list for the defense. It's unclear whether it will be made public. The defense has to submit its witness list by March 16." The Post adds, "James Payne, former senior vice president of Qwest's Government Systems Division, said Tuesday that he expects to be called to testify during the trial, which is set to begin March 19 in federal court in Denver. … 'I'm involved on both sides of the case,' Payne told The Denver Post in a phone interview from Washington, D.C. 'I'll be subpoenaed by one side or the other, and perhaps both.'" The Post notes, "Payne joined Qwest in August 1999 and worked directly with Nacchio on government contracts, including those with clandestine agencies that may play a key role in Nacchio's defense. … Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi and former board member Tom Stephens could be key witnesses for the government. … Payne is the first former Qwest official to publicly disclose that he expects to be involved during the trial. Payne said he has been contacted by prosecutors and defense attorneys a number of times. Court filings suggest he may be more helpful to the defense. … Nacchio is accused of selling $100.8 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were deteriorating. He has pleaded not guilty to 42 charges of illegal insider trading. … Nacchio's attorneys have said he had a positive outlook on Qwest during that time because he alone, among his inner circle of top executives, in Denver knew the company was in line to receive large top-secret government contracts."

Former FDA Commissioner Crawford Given Probation, Fined. The New York Times/AP (2/28) reports Lester M. Crawford, former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, "was ordered to pay about $90,000 in fines for lying about stock he owned in companies regulated by the agency. At his sentencing in federal court…Crawford, was also given three years' supervised probation and ordered to perform 50 hours of community service." Crawford "pleaded guilty last October to having a conflict of interest and false reporting of information about stock he and his wife owned."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Leaders Reach Agreement On Cunningham Probe Subpoenas. The Hill (2/28, Crabtree) reports, "House leaders will not fight subpoenas for information from the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego stemming from a criminal investigation into activities related to the bribery case against Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.), according to a release by Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) office yesterday." The Hill continues, "The chairmen of three committees involved, working with the House General Counsel's office, have been negotiating for the last two months about how to respond to subpoenas for documents the U.S. Attorney sent the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence panels late last year. … It was unclear at press time how much GOP ranking members of the committees were consulted about which documents to hand over." The Hill adds, "A Democratic leadership aide insisted that Republicans were consulted because it involved 'their documents.' … But Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said his boss was not kept in the loop during any part of the negotiation process. … 'We were not party to or made aware of any of the agreements,' he said. … That is a distinct departure to what happened last year after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), when the leadership of both parties invoked the Speech Debate Clause of the Constitution. … '… Because all of the information being provided to the U.S. Attorney is privileged under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution, the committees have agreed to decline to assert the privilege with respect to that information,' the statement from Pelosi's office said. … 'The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities,' the release said. … The negotiations went so smoothly that the U.S. attorney's office withdrew the subpoenas and the committees have already handed over some of the documents requested."

The AP (2/28) reports, "Two committee staffers will appear March 1 before the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence stemming from the Cunningham case, Daly said. … The subpoenas were sent in December and January to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees and the two staffers." The AP continues, "Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to defense contractors. … Earlier this month, the grand jury indicted a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor on fraud and money laundering charges in an investigation that spun off from the Cunningham probe. The defense contractor, Brent Wilkes, was also charged in a separate indictment along with a New York mortgage banker on charges of bribing Cunningham. … The subpoena deal comes after nearly a year of negotiations over the documents that began while the House was still under Republican control."

Gonzales Asked To Probe Smithsonian Official's Conduct. The Washington Post (2/28, C03, Trescott) reports, "A Washington watchdog group yesterday asked the attorney general to investigate whether Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small violated the law by using federal money to pay for travel and other expenses." The Post continues, "The group also asked the Justice Department to determine whether the Smithsonian Board of Regents, which is chaired by John G. Roberts Jr., chief justice of the Supreme Court, broke the law by approving Small's expenses." The Post adds, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the $90,000 in unauthorized expenses that Small accumulated between 2000 and 2005 was 'troubling.' Questions raised by Smithsonian's inspector general about Small's expenses were first reported by The Washington Post on Sunday. … 'Mr. Small's conduct not only diminishes the stature of the Smithsonian Institution, it smacks of self-dealing and self-enrichment at the expense of the general public. The Board of Regents failure to take action against Mr. Small -- incomprehensibly choosing to endorse his conduct instead -- is similarly distressing,' said the letter, signed by Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, a former federal prosecutor. The group describes itself as nonpartisan; it has received funding from liberal Democratic sources." The Post notes, "Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, has asked Roberts, chancellor of the Smithsonian Regents, to review what Grassley has called 'lavish expenditures' by Small. Grassley said the board appeared to be 'rubber-stamping the actions of Secretary Small and turning a blind eye to very serious issues raised by the inspector general.' The senator suggested this week that the Smithsonian's budget be cut because of excessive spending and proposed changing the composition of the Board of Regents."

Colorado Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography. The Rocky Mountain News (2/28) reports, "A 53-year-old Arapahoe County (CO) sheriff's deputy has been indicted by a federal grand jury on child pornography charges." The News continues, "Douglas Morrill Peek of Centennial is charged with transportation, possession, distribution and receipt of child pornography. … He was arrested by the FBI this morning without incident and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Denver this afternoon." The News adds, "If convicted he faces up to 20 years in a federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine. … 'The Department of Justice will pursue and prosecute those who commit crimes involving the exploitation of children, no matter who they are, or what position they hold,' said United States Attorney Troy Eid. … This case is being brought as part of Project Safe Childhood."

Iowa Man Given More Jail Time For Child Pornography. The Iowa City Press-Citizen (2/28, McWilliams) reports, "An Iowa City man already serving 10 years in prison for lascivious acts with a child received an additional seven-plus years behind bars for storing child pornography on his home computer." The Press-Citizen continues, "Jackie Dean Burtlow, 40, pleaded guilty to receipt of child pornography. A federal judge initially sentenced Burtlow to 10 years and two months in prison but gave him credit for 33 months previously served for related state charges, which leaves seven years and five months." The Press-Citizen adds, "According to a news release from the U.S Department of Justice: … The FBI started investigating Burtlow in May 2004 when agents in Cleveland found an e-mail that was later determined to have been sent from Burtlow's computer. Police searched Burtlow's Iowa City residence and seized a computer that contained numerous images, including video clips of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct. … When questioned, Burtlow admitted that he had child pornography stored on his computer and also said he had chatted and sent e-mails to other people about child pornography, according to the release."

Florida Couple Sentenced To Prison For Spying For Cuba. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (2/28, Weaver, 286K) reports, "Convicted ex-Florida International University academics Carlos and Elsa Alvarez apologized Tuesday as a pair of tearful defendants, expressing regret for a secret life of informing on Miami's exile community for Cuba. … U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore slammed Carlos Alvarez with the maximum five-year prison sentence for conspiring to act as an unregistered Cuban agent and Elsa Alvarez with the maximum three years' imprisonment for harboring her husband's illicit intelligence work and failing to report it to authorities." The Herald adds, "In sentencing them, Moore acknowledged the couple's supporters who testified about their honesty, integrity and spirituality as Catholics, but he condemned them for breaking federal law with their 'personal foreign policy.'"

Florida Police Chief Defends Decision To Tell Officials About FBI Probe. The Miami Herald (2/28, DeMarzo, 286K) reports, "Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry, who admitted he leaked information about an ongoing federal probe of his department, defended his decision Tuesday, saying the FBI told him he could use his 'discretion' in discussing the probe with others. Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about the two-year undercover investigation, but insists that he did not tip off the targets of the probe. Scarberry said he 'has his suspicions' who leaked the information to those involved, but doesn't believe it came from within his department or City Hall." The Herald notes that the officers' "arrests could jeopardize more than 60 criminal cases handled by the four detectives. Prosecutors began sending letters to defense attorneys representing clients involved in the cases, advising them of the situation."

Virginia Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty In Corruption Probe. The AP (2/28) reports, "A former officer charged in a federal investigation of corruption in a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of possessing stolen firearms. Patrick Martin, who was a sergeant in the vice unit of the Henry County Sheriff's Department, faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000." The AP notes, "Martin's case had been set for a jury trial but he decided Tuesday morning to plead guilty instead, his attorney, Art Strickland, said. … During the court hearing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant "played a recording from portions of a three-hour interview that an FBI agent and a state police officer conducted with Martin in which he said he was not aware of any drugs or guns stolen from the sheriff's department by officers."

6th Circuit Overturns Georgia Corruption Conviction. The Macomb Daily (2/28, Cook) reports, "A federal appeals court reversed the conviction of a former Warren city councilman on fraud charges because of a federal judge's secret communication with government lawyers during jury deliberations in his first trial. William Barnwell's convictions for theft, embezzlement and conspiracy were dismissed and the case was remanded back to the U.S. District Court, a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday." The Daily notes, "Assistant U.S. attorney Keith Corbett went to the judge after the FBI was conducting a telephone wiretap in an unrelated case and heard a reference to the Barnwell case -- the results of an informal jury vote, which is supposed to be done in secret. An FBI agent said that a juror was the sister of a subject in the unrelated case, and the judge and government lawyers discussed the potentially contaminated juror. … The discussions were kept from the defense attorneys in the case, a move that the appeals court determined tainted the case not only for the first trial but also the second trial in which a new jury found Barnwell guilty."

Washington Woman Admits To Teaching Children To Fake Retardation For Benefits. The AP (2/28) reports from Tacoma, WA, "A woman admitted Monday that she coached her two children to fake retardation starting when they were 4 and 8 years old so she could collect Social Security benefits on their behalf." The AP continues, "Rosie Costello, 46, admitted in U.S. District Court that she collected more than $280,000 in benefits, beginning in the mid-1980s. Most was from Social Security, but the state social services agency paid $53,000. … Costello pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government and Social Security fraud. Her son, Pete, 26, pleaded guilty earlier this month. Federal prosecutors in Seattle said Monday authorities had not yet located her daughter, Marie." The AP adds, "According to the plea agreement, Costello began coaching her daughter at age 4, and later used the same ruse with her son. He feigned retardation into his mid-20s - picking at his face, slouching and appearing uncommunicative in meetings with Social Security officials. … Social Security workers became suspicious and uncovered a video of Pete Costello ably contesting a traffic ticket in a Vancouver courtroom. … Pete Costello is scheduled to be sentenced May 11 and faces from six months to a year in prison, as well as $59,000 in restitution. … Rosie Costello is scheduled for sentencing May 17."

Indiana Men Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The Indianapolis Star (2/24, 268K) reported, "Two Indianapolis men received prison terms Friday for mortgage scams. Federal judges sentenced John Wagner, 46, to 37 months in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to 24 months. Since a federal fraud task force was formed in 2002 to look into the area's rash of mortgage crimes, 58 people have been convicted, including Wagner and Howard, who each had pleaded guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering." The AP (2/24) also reported on the sentencings.

Massachusetts State Trooper Sentenced To Prison For Online Solicitation. The Boston Globe (2/28, Ballou, 413K) reports, "A federal judge gave the minimum sentence to a former Massachusetts state trooper and decorated Army war veteran who admitted trying to solicit sex over the Internet from someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy. Brian O'Hare, 46, of Lancaster was sentenced to the mandatory minimum of five years in prison yesterday in federal court in Boston after he pleaded guilty." The Globe notes that "the person he was chatting with was actually FBI agent Jeremy Morrissey, working in an Internet sting operation. O'Hare was arrested last February when he drove to Meadow Glen Mall…for what he thought was a meeting with the boy." The AP (2/28) also notes, "O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet.

California Transplant Doctor Under Probe In Organ Donor's Death. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Ornstein, Weber) reports, "Police are investigating whether a Kaiser Permanente transplant surgeon attempted to hasten the death last February of a 26-year-old San Luis Obispo man on life support in order to harvest his organs more quickly." The Times continues, "The allegations, if true, would constitute a grave breach of the nation's organ transplant rules, as well as a public relations setback for those promoting organ donation, experts in transplantation said. … San Luis Obispo police and the Medical Board of California are looking into the conduct of Dr. Hootan Roozrokh, who was a surgeon at Kaiser's now-defunct kidney transplant program in San Francisco." The Times adds, "At issue is whether he ordered excessive doses of powerful pain medication to speed the death of Ruben Navarro, according to several sources familiar with the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because investigations are ongoing. … Medical board spokeswoman Candis Cohen said her agency is also investigating the conduct of a second physician present during the incident. That person, Kaiser officials confirmed, is Dr. Arturo Martinez, who at the time was the surgical director of Kaiser's transplant program. … Neither surgeon was attempting to recover the organs on behalf of Kaiser; rather, they were working on behalf of the group that procures and distributes organs in much of Northern and Central California. Transplant surgeons commonly perform such duties."

Judge Asked To Delay Sentencing For Louisiana Hospital Owner. The Shreveport (LA) Times (2/28, Mahfoufi) reports, "The same day Doctors' Hospital filed for bankruptcy last week, owner David LeBlanc's attorneys asked a federal judge to reschedule his sentencing on a charge of illegal campaign contributions." The Times continues, "It will be the third time LeBlanc, who is facing jail time and/or a fine, will have had his sentencing postponed. … 'The defendant is cooperating in an ongoing criminal investigation, and the government cannot make an informed recommendation as to the defendant's sentence until the defendant completes his cooperation,' the trial attorneys with the U.S. Department of Justice Criminal Division Public Integrity Section wrote in an earlier motion. … There was no reference to the ongoing investigation in the latest request to reschedule LeBlanc's sentencing to March 23. … A Department of Justice spokeswoman said she could not comment on the investigation." The Times adds, "LeBlanc pleaded guilty last March after an internal investigation by LifeCare -- the hospital chain he co-founded 15 years ago with two dozen leased beds within Doctors' Hospital -- found he and then-Government Relations Vice President Donald Boucher made federal political contributions in their and their wives' names. … LifeCare used corporate funds to reimburse LeBlanc and Boucher $50,000 through bonuses, salary increases and expense reimbursements. LeBlanc authorized the payments. … LeBlanc and Boucher, both fired by LifeCare, admitted to knowingly and willfully violating the law. LeBlanc agreed to pay a $100,000 civil penalty and Boucher agreed to pay a $50,000 penalty. Both also entered criminal plea agreements with the Department of Justice."

Convicted Ney Aide Made Appearance At Media Party. The Roll Call (2/28, Heil) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Neil Volz, former aide to convicted ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), may have gotten some unwanted headlines when he pleaded guilty in May 2006 to federal conspiracy charges in the ongoing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings on Capitol Hill." But "just a few weeks ago, Volz was mingling — voluntarily — with members of the Fourth Estate. An HOH spy belatedly tipped off HOH that Volz attended the after-party hosted by CQ following the Washington Press Club Foundation's dinner Feb. 6 at the Ritz-Carlton." Volz was "wearing a newly grown beard and a dark suit, which practically constituted a disguise since many of the aides and reporters in attendance didn't recognize him. An acquaintance jokingly asked what Volz was doing walking 'into the lion's den,' said the HOH tipster, who added that the disgraced aide who now faces prison time appeared to be in 'good spirits.'"

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Considers Case On Bush's Faith-Based Initiative. USA Today (2/28, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation has sued to get rid of crosses in city parks, to end Good Friday public holidays and, most vigorously, to thwart President Bush's faith-based initiative. Now, the group that for 30 years has sought a firm divide between church and state will be at the Supreme Court on Wednesday in a case that could affect taxpayers' ability to challenge -- and government's ability to defend -- a multitude of public programs that involve groups with a religious affiliation." The White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives "was set up in 2001 to help religious groups compete with secular organizations for federal grants to provide social services." The case "focuses on regional conferences that promoted the initiative. The Freedom From Religion Foundation likened the conferences to 'revival meetings' and said they boosted the grant prospects for religious groups 'without similar advocacy for secular community-based organizations.'" The legal question "is not whether those conferences violated the constitutional separation of church and state, but more fundamentally when a taxpayer may even get into court to challenge such mingling of government and religion."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Richey, 59K) reports, "Although the case revolves around the esoteric issue of taxpayer standing to sue, analysts say the case could foreshadow a shift in the Supreme Court's church-state jurisprudence." It "marks the first opportunity for the high court to rule in a major religion case since the retirement of key swing voter Sandra Day O'Connor and the addition of Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M), in an editorial titled "Government By Law, Not Faith," says the Administration "is pushing an incorrect view of standing as it tries to stop the courts from reaching the First Amendment issue. Taxpayers can challenge the financing of religious activity, the administration claims, only when a Congressional statute expressly authorizes the spending. There is no statute behind the faith-based initiative. In his decision for the appeals court, Judge Richard Posner of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago, convincingly explained why this argument is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's precedents on the Establishment Clause. … The justices should affirm Judge Posner's ruling so the courts can move on to the important question: Do the Bush administration's faith-based policies violate the Constitution?"

Closing Arguments Made At FBI Wrongful Imprisonment Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/28, Lavoie) reports, "The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit 'acceptable collateral damage' in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday. Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution." The AP adds, "In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent 'Jimmy' Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said." However, "Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution. Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it."

The Boston Globe (2/28, Murphy, 413K) reports that the plaintiffs' lawyers "argued yesterday that the FBI was squarely to blame for withholding critical evidence during their trial and urged a federal judge to order the government to compensate them for the decades they spent in prison. 'It was more important for the FBI to protect their informants than to protect innocent people who had families,' said Victor Garo." However, Lipscomb said, "The United States is not liable to plaintiffs because they were convicted as a result of a state prosecution. The FBI did not initiate this prosecution, and there is no duty of the FBI to submit to state or local governments any of its internal files." The Globe notes, "Three members of Congress who were involved in a two-year investigation of the FBI's mishandling of informants and had condemned the government's handling of the Deegan case were in court yesterday for final arguments, including Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican who spearheaded the probe and formerly chaired the House Committee on Government Reform."

In a Boston Herald (2/28, 184K) column titled "At What Price The FBI's Treachery?," Peter Gelzinis writes, "The story of how a ruthlessly ambitious pair of G-men, H. Paul Rico and Dennis Condon, conspired to protect a psychotic hit man and serial killer…was laid out in linear fashion, with the FBI's own internal documents as road signs. 'When you hear the story presented like that,' Bill Delahunt remarked, 'you gain a real appreciation for the culture of treachery that existed.' And still exists. As sinister and sordid as this 'liability' presentation was, the most haunting aspect of what occurred in Nancy Gertner's courtroom yesterday was when the 'damages' inflicted upon wives, children, grandparents, brothers, sisters, grandchildren -- all the so-called 'acceptable collateral damage' -- was spelled out."

Federal Procurement Fraud Task Force Cracks Down On Contractors. The Legal Times (2/28, Schechter, Cochran, Newell) reports, "As spending on federal contracting reached record levels in recent years -- a reported $400 billion in 2005 alone -- the risks, as well as the rewards, of doing business with the federal government have never been greater." The Times continues, "The U.S. government has vowed to crack down on procurement fraud and other fraud in government programs. Last year's $3.1 billion in settlements and judgments in cases involving fraud against the government was the largest amount ever recovered in a single year. It included $615 million paid by the Boeing Co. to resolve claims relating to its use of confidential competitor information and the hiring of a former Air Force acquisition chief who had responsibility for its contracts; it also included numerous other cases involving defense procurement fraud, health-care fraud and other fraud against the government." The Times adds, "Last fall, the Justice Department launched a National Procurement Fraud Task Force to focus 'resources at all levels of government to increase criminal enforcement' in areas of procurement fraud. The stepped-up attention to this area throughout the government may signal that the $3.1 billion record in federal fraud recoveries in 2006 could soon be broken. More than 50 inspectors general from across all government departments and agencies also are actively pursuing thousands of investigations. … In addition, powerful newly installed Democratic committee and subcommittee chairs in Congress are launching dozens of oversight investigations of alleged government and contractor abuses, focusing on the reconstruction effort in Iraq and in the U.S. Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina, numerous areas of military and homeland-security procurement, the pricing of pharmaceuticals and other significant areas of federal contracting. For instance, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., in the first week of February began one set of hearings on alleged waste, fraud and abuse by government contractors in Iraq and another set of hearings on alleged overcharging by drug companies in federal health programs." The Times notes, "Contractors long have known that the government has a broad range of investigative and enforcement powers that can turn what would be a normal business dispute in a private commercial transaction into allegations of civil or criminal fraud, leading to massive fines and penalties, as well as disqualification from receiving new government contracts. Given the broad sweep of the government's investigative powers and the complexity of procurement rules, companies that are wholly innocent of an intent to fleece the feds may nonetheless find themselves under scrutiny. What is striking about the current environment is the scope and intensity of federal investigative and prosecutorial resources directed at this activity. … The procurement fraud initiative, created by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, was modeled after his 2005 Procurement Fraud Working Group, begun when he served as the U.S. Attorney General for the Eastern District of Virginia and led the prosecution of former Air Force acquisition chief Darleen Druyun and Boeing for contract favoritism in exchange for job offers. The current initiative focuses on virtually all areas of alleged procurement fraud, from pricing irregularities and labor mischarging, to misuse of classified and procurement sensitive information, and ethics and conflict-of-interest violations."
